The REVOLUTION to the Accession of the Illustrious Family of BRUNSWICK-HANOVER, now reigning, containing the Transactions of Twenty-five Years.

P A R T XII.

WILLIAM III. and MARY II. King and Queen of ENGLAND.
A. D. 1689.

DURING the greatest part of the preceding reign, the English had, with unspeakable grief, beheld their religion brought to the brink of ruin, and the papal see on the point of re-assuming her antient tyrannic sway over both church and state in these kingdoms. The Reformation, which had been sealed with the blood of so many martyrs for the true faith, was about to be overturned, and the rights and privileges of the people annihilated. The land of liberty was going to be reduced to an island of slaves. Despotic rule was to lord it over the laws of the country, and the lives and properties of thousands were to be at the mercy of arbitrary power, supported by the unnatural and execrable doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. Such was the situation of the English nation, when James II. unable to withstand the just resentments of an injured people, and lost to all spirit but that of enthusiastic bigotry, abdicated a throne he had so unworthily filled.

The Revolution then may, with justice, be termed the epocha of true English liberty. The nation, represented by its parliament (or what is the same, a free convention of its estates) fixed the long contested limits of royal prerogative, and the rights of the subject; and having prescribed to the prince of Orange the conditions on which he was to reign, chose him for their sovereign, jointly with his consort Mary, the daughter of their late king. From that time this prince was acknowledged by the greatest part of Europe as the lawful king of England, by the name of William III. and the Deliverer of this nation.

There were, however, a party in the nation, who viewed things in a different light, and could by no means be brought to approve the new settlement: these exerted their utmost endeavours from the beginning to overturn it. The reader will readily suppose that the papists made the bulk of this party. They had indeed very substantial reasons to dislike the Revolution; but to these also were joined several protestants, who, either from the strong impressions of the late doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, could not bring themselves to think it lawful to resist James, or who, though they acknowledged the necessity and expediency of an interposition to preserve them a free people, and gladly accepted the prince of Orange in the quality of a mediator, or even as regent in the name of king James, would by no means hear of his being made king, to the prejudice of hereditary indefeasible right, and the direct direct lineal succession. The more violent of these were named Jacobites, the others Nonjurors, from their refusing to take the oaths to the present government. Thus the Revolution, notwithstanding it had been the means of happily preserving the protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom, had from its beginning many enemies to encounter, who were engaged in continual plots to annoy and subvert it.

King William began his reign by a proclamation, confirming all protestants in the offices which they enjoyed, on the first day of December. His next step was to settle his privy-council*; after which, on the twenty-third of February, he gave the royal assent to a bill to "remove and prevent all questions and disputes concerning the assembling and sitting of this present parliament:" by which act the convention, which had settled the crown on the prince and princess of Orange, was changed into a parliament. His majesty opened their session with a speech, in which he thanked them for the great confidence they had reposed in him by chusing him to be their sovereign, assuring them it should be his study to preserve the good opinion they had conceived of his integrity. He laid before them the critical situation of affairs in Europe, and in these kingdoms in particular; and concluded with earnestly requesting them to concur in the most speedy and effectual measures for the welfare of the nation. Soon after the king sent a message to the house, informing them that he had received certain advice of James having set sail from Brest with an armament to invade Ireland: whereupon both houses came to a resolution to assist his majesty with their lives and fortunes: they voted a temporary aid of four hundred and twenty thousand pounds, to be levied by monthly assessment, and both houses waited on the king to signify this their resolution. This complacency however was far from being unanimous in the parliament; for several of the lords, both spiritual and temporal, had absented themselves from the assembly, rather than take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy required. The nonjurors among the prelates were, Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury; Turner, bishop of Ely; Ken, of Bath and Wells; White, of Peterborough; Lake, of Chichester; Lloyd, of Norwich; Thomas, of Worcester; and Frampton, of Gloucester: of whom the four first had been imprisoned in the Tower by king James. The temporal peers who refused the oaths were, the duke of Newcastle, the earl of Clarendon, Litchfield, Exeter, Yarmouth, and Stafford, with the lords Griffin and Stawel.

The friends of the late king began also to stir already against the new government; and several gentlemen of condition of the Scottish nation in England were apprehended for treasonable practices, and sent to the Tower. The commons, informed of these commotions, as likewise that the Scottish regiment of Dumbarton had mutinied, and declared for James (though presently after quelled) impowered the king to dispense with the Habeas Corpus act till the seventeenth of April following. This was done with a view for the more effectual securing all disturbers of the public peace; but was certainly a great stretch of confidence, and gave such a power few princes ought to be trusted with. They also brought in a bill for punishing mutiny and desertion, which in a little time passed both houses, and received the royal assent.

On the eleventh of April 1689, the king and queen were solemnly crowned by the bishop of London, who officiated, at the king's desire, in the room of the archbishop of Canterbury, a declared malcontent. The king now made a thorough change about court. Several who had been driven from their posts by the late administration, were now restored with signal marks of honour and favour. The papists, who had so lately carried all before them, were now forced to give way to their more successful adversaries: the laws against the former were renewed and strengthened, while all such who had been in any manner instrumental in effecting the Revolution, were rewarded in proportion to their services. Among the rest, Charles Paulet, marquis of Winchester, was made duke of Bolton; William Bentinck, esq. earl of Portland; Ralph lord Montagu, earl of Montagu; and John lord Churchill, earl of Marlborough. The earls of Nottingham and Shrewsbury were appointed secretaries of state; the marquis of Halifax, privy-seal; the earl of Danby, president of the council; D'Auverquerque, a Dutch gentleman, who with Bentinck and Zuylestein had accompanied the king from Holland, was made master of the horse, Zuylestein of the robes, and Schomberg of the ordnance: this latter was, not long after, made a duke, as was the earl of Danby marquis of Carmarthen, and admiral Herbert earl of Torrington. Lastly, Dr. Gilbert Burnet, who came over with his majesty as his chaplain when prince, was, upon the death of Dr. Seth Ward, advanced to the bishopric of Salisbury. In fine, not one of the king's friends found themselves forgotten or neglected in this distribution of royal favour: and that even the meanest of his subjects might receive a benefit from his accession, and be thereby the more attached to his person and government, he about this time recommended to the parliament (who readily acquiesced in his desire) the abolition of the hearth money tax, which he understood was a grievous imposition upon the people. This was certainly a very politic measure, and contributed more than any thing to gain the affections of the populace to their new sovereign.

The king was naturally biased to Calvinism, and a declared enemy to persecution. He had been considerably cooled in his regard for the church of England, by the opposition he had met with from some of the members, especially the bishops, who had, by their refusal to take the oaths, and withdrawing from the parliament, openly disowned his authority, and shewn their aversion to his government. He therefore resolved to mortify the church, by admitting the protestant dissenters to a share in posts under the government; by which means he could at the same time oblige many of his friends. With this view he proposed to his parliament the abrogating the old, and appointing new oaths; by which the sacramental test might be declared unnecessary in rendering any person, being a protestant, capable of enjoying any office or employ. The commons were complaisant enough to frame a bill agreeable to his majesty's intentions, but it was rejected by a great majority in the house of lords. Another bill for the same purpose, but expressed in different terms, was proposed by the king's direction, and met with the same fate, tho' in both cases about six or seven lords protested against the resolution of the house.

* The council was composed of the following persons: the prince of Denmark, the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London, the duke of Norfolk, the marquises of Halifax and Winchester; the earls of Danby, Lindsey, Oxford, Shrewsbury, Dorset and Middlesex, Bedford, Bath, Macclesfield, Nottingham; the viscounts Falconbridge, Mordaunt, Newport, Lumley; the lords Wharton, Montagu, Delamere, Churchill; sir Robert Howard, sir Henry Capel, sir John Lowther; Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Sidney, Mr. Powle, Mr. Rufel, Mr. Boscawen, and Mr. Hambden.

The warmth the king discovered in favour of the dissenters on this occasion, greatly excited the jealousy of the churchmen. William would gladly have compromised the matter, by excusing the non-juring clergy from taking the oaths to the government, provided the churchmen would have agreed to dispense with the sacramental test in favour of the presbyterians; but this proposal was rejected with some warmth by the high-flying clergy; and they resolved that all nonjuring clergy should be obliged to take the oaths, or suffer suspension. After a long and warm debate in parliament, this point was carried, and all the indulgence that could be obtained was a clause, empowering the king to grant to any twelve clergymen who should be deprived in virtue of this act, a third part of their benefices during pleasure.

Thus the antient oaths of allegiance and supremacy were abrogated, the declaration of passive obedience and non-resistance, in the act of uniformity, was repealed, and the new oath reduced to its former simplicity, of swearing to bear faith and true allegiance to the sovereign. The clergy were required to take the oaths before the first day of August, on pain of being suspended for six months, and of being entirely deprived of all their ecclesiastical promotions, in case they did not take them before the expiration of that term. Several complied with the times; as the earl of Nottingham, who was made secretary of state, and Dr. Sherlock, who after the victory of the Boyne acknowledged their majesties title, and was made dean of St. Paul's: but many adhered to their old principles, which christian charity and candour would have obliged us to have excused, had they not instigated them to continual plots and conspiracies against the government. Those indeed who did comply, made use of such reservations and distinctions as left them open to much censure, as if they had made their consciences subservient to their temporal interests.

Though the king had been disappointed in his design of repealing the sacramental test, yet he resolved to indulge the dissenters with a toleration; and a bill for this purpose being presented by the earl of Nottingham, was with some difficulty passed into a law, under the title of An Act for exempting their Majesties Protestant Subjects dissenting from the Church of England, from the Penalties of certain Laws; which is commonly called the Act of Toleration to this day.

These matters settled, the legislature next took under their consideration the settlement of a revenue for the support of the government. It must be observed, that before the Revolution, the whole standing income of the state was in the power and disposal of the king, and was called the revenue of the crown. This had given occasion to many notorious embezzlements; and it was found, upon inquiry into this affair, that since the toleration, prodigious sums had been sunk, without being applied to the uses for which they were granted. Effectually to prevent such shameful misapplications in future, the parliament now wisely resolved to allot a separate income for the maintenance of the king's household, and the support of his dignity, which is now called the Civil List, and to put the rest of the public revenues entirely under the command of the parliament. It was also determined that these sums should be granted only from year to year, or at most for a very short term. This was an expedient of the Whigs, who thought it the most effectual way to render the king dependent upon his parliament, and engage him to merit their affection and compliance, by every act of a just or popular administration. It must be confessed, that this appropriation of the revenue was of infinite advantage to the public, and the greatest bulwark imaginable to the liberties of the people, who were now no longer under apprehension of seeing the aids they granted lavished at the will of their sovereign, in articles of profusion, or applied to the nefarious purpose of supporting armies, to wrest from the generous donors their invaluable privileges *.

The civil list was now settled at six hundred thousand pounds, chargeable with the appointments of the queen-dowager, the prince and princess of Denmark, the judges, and marechal duke Schomberg, to whom the parliament, as a reward

* The annual revenue, clear of all charges in the collection, at the time of king James II's abdication, was as follows:

1. Tonnage and poundage, with the wood-farm, coal-farm, and salt-farm	600,000
2. The hereditary and temporary excise, with the additional nine-pence for the year, ending June 24, 1689	666,383
3. Hearth-money	245,000
4. Post-office	65,000
5. Wine-licences	10,000
6. Imposition on wine and vinegar, granted for eight years, ending June 24, 1693	172,901
7. The imposition on tobacco and sugar	148,861
8. The imposition on French linen, brandy, and silk	93,710
9. The small branches (which before the crown-lands were sold, amounted to 130,000 l.)	60,000

Total neat revenue of the crown 2,061,855

Annual disbursements for the public services, during king James II's reign.

1. Maintenance of seamen, and provision of naval stores	300,000
2. Ordinary of the navy and ordnance	50,000
3. Guards and other disciplined troops	200,000
4. Garrisons, contingencies, &c.	50,000
Total expence	600,000

This being deducted out of the whole revenue, there remained for the civil list 1,461,885 l. a sum which rendered him independent of his parliament, enabled him to maintain a numerous army, and might have been sufficient, had he conducted his scheme with common prudence, to effect his wicked design of enslaving the nation. Hence appears the necessity of limiting the grant of the public revenue to a short term, of appropriating certain sums to particular purposes, and of submitting the application of those sums to the inspection and discussion of parliament. See Tindal's Contin. of Rapin.

for his eminent services, had already granted one hundred thousand pounds *. The commons also voted that one thousand pounds should be established for the support of the crown in the time of peace †.

The king was not a little piqued at the Whigs for this measure, which he considered as a mark of their diffidence, by which he was distinguished from his predecessors, and thought it an ungrateful return for the services he had done to the nation. An incident followed upon this, which contributed not a little to increase his jealousy of that party. They introduced a bill into the house for regulating the militia in such a manner as would have rendered it in a great measure independent of the king, and of the lieutenants of counties appointed by him. The bill however was thrown out by the peers, but the king deeply resented the attempt. The Tories failed not to take the advantage of this disposition in their sovereign, and by the mouth of the earl of Nottingham, made his majesty warm tenders of their services; but took occasion at the same time to insinuate, that as they were in danger of being prosecuted for their measures during the late reign, they found their hands tied, and durst not exert themselves so vigorously as they could wish, and intended for the preservation and dignity of the prerogatives of the crown, through the fear of calling down upon themselves the resentment of their avowed enemies. William swallowed the bait thus artfully thrown out for him; he resolved to put these new friends in a condition to make head against the Whig party, from whom he began to think himself in danger of being enslaved, or at best reduced only to the shadow of a monarch. Accordingly, he sent a message to the house by Mr. Hampden, expressing "his earnest desire that they would prepare a bill of indemnity, with such exceptions only as to them should seem necessary, for the vindication of public justice, the safety of him and his consort, and the settlement and welfare of the nation." The two houses thought fit to present an address of thanks to his majesty for this instance of his lenity and humanity. But the Whigs, who saw plainly that the Tories wanted to introduce themselves again into the management of affairs, resolved to baffle their design, and still keep them in subjection. Accordingly, they threw so many obstacles in the way of this bill during its dependence, that it could not be brought to a conclusion before the end of the session ‡.

The next object which engrossed the attention of the parliament, was an act for settling the succession of the crown, agreeable to a former resolution of the house, when only a convention. A bill for this purpose was brought into the house, with a clause disabling papists from succeeding to the crown. When this bill was carried up to the lords, they added the words, "or such as should marry papists," absolving the subject in that case from allegiance. At the same time the bishop of Salisbury (Burnet) by his majesty's directions, moved that the princess Sophia, duchess of Hanover, and her posterity, might be named next in the succession, failing issue to the king and Anne princess of Denmark. The bill thus amended, was sent down again to the commons, where it occasioned great debates, the latter refusing to assent to the lords proviso. The Tories were remarkably strenuous in their opposition, and, what may seem somewhat extraordinary, were joined by several who passed for Whigs, but who were, in secret, of republican principles, and hoped, that in case of the death of the king and queen, and the princess Anne, the monarchy of England might be easily extinguished, and a commonwealth established. The Tories were actuated by motives that would be impertinent to mention, from their obviousness.

The king, who had greatly at heart the effectual settling the succession in the protestant line, left no endeavours untried to induce the lower house to agree with the lords. He declared in council that the queen, and both the prince and princess of Denmark, wished the succession to be settled after the manner proposed: but all his efforts for the present proved ineffectual, and the bill was dropped. Indeed it seemed to be in some manner rendered less necessary, by the delivery of the princess Anne, on the twenty-seventh day of July, of a son, who was christened by the name of William, and was soon after created duke of Gloucester. After this there were debates in the house of commons about settling a revenue on the princess Anne; it was proposed that her income might be advanced from thirty thousand pounds (which was what the king allowed her) to seventy thousand pounds. The court seemed inclined to have this matter left to his majesty's discretion; but the princess and her friends were for a fixed settlement, which was carried in the house; and this affair is thought to have been the occasion of the difference between the queen and the princess her sister, which continued till the death of the former ||.

On the sixteenth of December the king passed the bill of rights and succession, agreeable to the declaration of rights when their majesties accepted the crown, with the addition of a remarkable clause § for excluding papists, and persons marrying papists, for ever from the crown of England.

William, who yielded to few princes in political abilities, and who was well acquainted with the genius of the people he had been called to govern, knew that the most effectual way to preserve peace at home, was to find his subjects employment abroad. The great scheme which he had formed, when only Stadtholder, of a confederacy against France, began about this time to take effect. The princes of the empire assembled at the diet of Ratisbon earnestly importuned the emperor Leopold to declare war against the French king, who had

§ It may not be amiss to transcribe this clause for the information of the reader. It enacts, "That the kings and queens of England should be obliged, at their coming to the crown, to take the test in the first parliament that should be called at the beginning of their reign; and that if any king or queen of England should embrace the Roman catholic religion, or marry with a Roman catholic prince or princess, their subjects should be absolved of their allegiance, and that the crown and government of these realms should from time to time descend to, and be enjoyed by such persons, being protestants, as should have inherited the same, in case the said persons so reconciled to the church of Rome, or marrying a papist as aforesaid, were naturally dead."

in numberless instances broke the several treaties he had made with the German potentates, and had, without any provocation, invaded their countries, and shewn a settled design of making himself the master, or rather the tyrant, of all Christendom. The States-General issued a declaration against Lewis as the common enemy, as did also the elector of Brandenburg; and the marquis de Castanaga, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, in answer to Lewis, who had declared war against his master the emperor, entered into an alliance offensive and defensive with the States-general, binding the contracting parties to co-operate with their whole powers against France and her allies. William, who was strongly pressed to join this confederacy in the quality of king of England, and who wished for nothing more heartily, found no great difficulty in persuading the English to unsheath the sword against their old enemies and rivals; and after the proper steps taken for that purpose by both houses, who joined in a dutiful address to his majesty, desiring him to take such measures as would be sufficient to reduce the French king to such a condition, that it should not be in his power to violate the peace of Christendom, nor prejudice the trade and prosperity of England; and assuring his majesty, that he might depend on the assistance of his parliament therein; the king, on the seventh of May this year (1689) declared war against the French monarch. This declaration was drawn up by the masterly pen of Somers, afterwards lord-chancellor. Lewis is therein charged "with having unjustly invaded the territories of the emperor, and denounced war against the allies of England, in violation of the treaties concluded under the guaranty of the English crown; of having encroached upon the fishery of Newfoundland, invaded the Caribbee islands, forcibly seized the province of New-York and Hudson's-bay, countenanced the seizure of English ships by French privateers, prohibited the importation of English manufactures, disputed the right of the flag, persecuted many English subjects on pretence of religion, contrary to express treaties and the law of nations, and sent an armament to Ireland, in support of the rebels in that kingdom."

Having thus described the progress of the revolution in England, I shall now briefly relate the steps taken in Scotland, in consequence of this interesting event. When we reflect upon the miserable state under which the Scots had groaned during the two last reigns, it will afford no matter of surprize to see that people eagerly concurring in the measures of their sister nation to throw off the yoke of tyranny and superstition, and exerting all their efforts towards the establishment of William on the throne of their kingdom.

William, on his being acknowledged king of England, had written a letter to the estates of Scotland suitable to the subject; in consequence of which they assembled in convention on the fourteenth day of March, 1689, and speedily agreed in voting, "That king James VII. * by having assumed an arbitrary and despotic power, and exercising it to the subversion of the protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of the nation, had forfeited the right of the crown (of Scotland) and the throne was become vacant." This vote was instantly passed into a law, by the title of An Act for settling the Crown of Scotland upon the King and Queen of England; pursuant to which their majesties were solemnly proclaimed king and queen of Scotland, on the eleventh day of April, the day of their coronation in England †.

Soon after the earl of Argyle, and three other members of the convention, were sent as commissioners from the Scottish nation, to make a solemn tender of the crown of that realm, which was done on May 11, their majesties being seated on a throne under a rich canopy, in the Banqueting-house, Whitehall. In the mean time, the estates published a proclamation, "forbidding all persons to acknowledge, obey, assist, or correspond with the late king James; or by word, writing, or sermon, to dispute or disown the royal authority of king William and queen Mary, or to misconstrue the proceedings of the estates, with regard to the transactions of the government, on pain of the severest penalties." Then having settled other matters, they appointed a committee to take care of the public peace, and adjourned for a short time.

It must be observed, that the Scottish bishops had published an abhorrence of the prince of Orange's expedition; and the episcopal party in general in that kingdom, who had been mere creatures of the court, and violent opposers of the presbyterian faction, adhered firmly to king James: but immediately on the success of William, and his declaration in favour of Scotland, the presbyterians had begun to lift up their heads, and to insult their late persecutors in their turn: and now the meeting of the estates was, by a commission from their majesties to the duke of Hamilton, as president, turned into a parliament, whose first step was to abolish prelacy once more, as contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people, to which the king assented: but several violent disputes arising in the Scottish parliament (which more properly belong to the history of that country than the present work) their church was left without any settled form of government; for though hierarchy was abolished, the presbyterian discipline was not yet established, and ecclesiastical affairs were occasionally regulated by the privy-council, which, by a strange contradiction, acted in virtue of the act of supremacy, which, according to the claim of rights, was thought to have been repealed ‡.

It must not be understood, however, as if the Revolution took place in Scotland without any opposition. The duke of Gordon maintained the castle of Edinburgh for his old master; but as he had neglected to lay in a proper store of provisions, he depended entirely on the citizens for subsistence. The partizans of James were headed by the earl of Balcarras, and Graham viscount of Dundee, a brave and gallant officer, who assembled a body of Highlanders, and declared for the expelled monarch. These efforts however proved short-lived and unsuccessful. The duke of Gordon, after sustaining a vigorous siege from the citizens of Edinburgh, and the troops in the interest of king William, was obliged to surrender the castle of Edinburgh on the thirteenth of June, upon condition that he and the garrison should have their lives, liberties, and fortunes secured. The lord Dundee, after having been a short time in arms, was defeated by lieutenant-general Mackay, who commanded their majesties forces in Scotland, in an engagement at Killicranky, some few miles above Dunkeld, and lost his life by a random shot. His death put an end to the whole enterprize; and the whole island of Great Britain was, before the end of this summer, reduced to the obedience of its new sovereign, and submitted to his government. Dismissing therefore the affairs of Scotland, let us next take a short view of what passed in Ireland, which will naturally induce a relation of the proceedings of the unfortunate James, after his abdication.

Ireland was far from following the example of Scotland; and it was more than two years before that kingdom was entirely reduced to obedience. The earl of Tyrconnel, inviolably attached, both by gratitude and a parity of religious sentiments, to the prince to whom he was indebted for his dignity and fortune, exerted himself in the most indefatigable manner for his service. From the first news of James's flight from England, he had secured the most important places in the kingdom, of which he had the government; and joining his natural hatred of the protestants to what he thought motives of policy and prudence, he had treated them in so rigorous a manner, that they were forced to retire to their brethren in the north, who seizing on Kilmore, Coleraine, Inniskilling, and Londonderry, declared for William and Mary. Tyrconnel, finding the ill effects of his cruelty, thought proper to temporize with king William; and several letters were, by his knowledge and procurement, sent over to the English court, giving assurances that the earl was inclinable to treat and submit.

In the mean time, however, he ceased not to solicit James by letter, in the most earnest manner, to transport himself over to Ireland with a powerful body of troops, assuring him that such a step would effectually secure his interests in that kingdom, whereas a neglect or delay in following this advice must utterly ruin his affairs. James, on receiving these notices from his lieutenant, imparted them to his good friend Lewis, and pressed him for his assistance. Neither Lewis nor his ministers had any great opinion of the success of this expedition; but as his honour was concerned in supporting his unfortunate guest, it was resolved to furnish him with five thousand forces, under the command of M. de Lausun, who were embarked in the fleet then lying at Brest, consisting of fourteen ships of the line, six frigates, three fire-ships, and a proper number of transports. Lewis likewise supplied him with arms for forty thousand men more upon his arrival in Ireland, presented him with a large sum of money, superb equipages, store of plate, and every thing necessary for the camp and household. At parting, he embraced him with great affection, making use of this remarkable expression: "Farewel, brother; the best thing I can wish you is, that I may never see you again."

Every necessary preparation being completed, James set sail from Brest on the fourteenth of March, 1689, attended by the count d'Avaux, in quality of ambassador, and several other persons of distinction, as well English as French. On the twenty-second of the same month he arrived at Kinsale in Ireland, from whence he repaired in a few days to Cork, where he was received by the earl of Tyrconnel, who had collected an army of thirty thousand foot and eight thousand horse for his service. James now acted with as little prudence and precaution as if he had no opposition to encounter, or as if, because he had landed in Ireland, he was absolute master of all the rest of his dominions. So far was he from keeping well with, or endeavouring to conciliate the affections of the protestants, which in common reason and policy he ought to have done, that he gave continual proofs of his aversion to their sect, and frequently punished them with death on the most trifling occasions. One of the magistrates of Cork was executed by his orders, for having declared for the prince of Orange. In fine, instead of seeking to win over his adversaries by mildness and popularity, he only exasperated them more deeply by his cruelty and arrogance; and thus by his own conduct effectually ruined his affairs, at the very time he flattered himself with their being in the most prosperous situation.

From Cork James marched to Dublin; into which city he made a triumphal entry, being met at the cattle-gate by a procession of popish bishops and priests in their pontificals, bearing the host, before which he kneeled down in public. Having assembled a council, he dismissed the earl of Granard, the lord chief-justice Keating, and other protestants, who had advised Tyrconnel to acknowledge the new government, and in their room placed Cartwright bishop of Chester, lieutenant-colonel Dorrington, and count d'Avaux the French ambassador, and by degrees all the principal papists who had attended him in the expedition. He published indeed some proclamations, promising protection to all his protestant subjects who should preserve their loyalty: but these had so little faith in his promises, that they universally resolved to stand on their defence. Another proclamation was issued by James for the meeting of the parliament on the seventh day of May at Dublin: at the same time, he created Tyrconnel a duke, and bestowed the royal regiment on Dorrington, in the room of the duke of Ormond.

The disposition which the protestant natives of Ireland shewed to oppose the progress of James, who, after some resistance, made himself master of Coleraine and Kilmore, made him resolve to use those in his power with redoubled severity; in which he was warmly seconded by the duke of Tyrconnel, who seemed to have a more than savage thirst after the blood of those poor wretches; numbers of whom, terrified with this usage, and alarmed by the report of a general massacre, intended to be perpetrated on all of their faith on a certain day said to be already fixed, shut themselves up in Londonderry, the capital of the county of the same name, in the north of Ireland, and sent over to the government of England, imploring immediate assistance. They were accordingly supplied with some arms and ammunition, but did not receive any considerable reinforcements till the middle of April, when two regiments arrived in Loughfoyle, under the command of the colonels Cunningham and Richards. By this time James was come almost in sight of the town, with an army of about twenty thousand men, resolved to force the rebels, as he called them, out of their strong hold; but he met with an opposition he

he little dreamt of, and which was chiefly owing to the resolution and bravery of one man, a protestant clergyman of Donaghmore, who had raised a regiment for the defence of himself and brethren. This man gave Lundy, the governor of Londonderry, notice of the approach of James; upon which Lundy summoned a council of war, at which Cunningham and Richards, the two commanders lately arrived from England, assisted; and they, either from disaffection to the service they were sent upon, or ignorance of the condition of the town, or the disposition of the inhabitants, came to a resolution that the place was not tenable; that it would be imprudent to land the regiments; and that the principal officers should retire from the town, the inhabitants of which would receive the more favourable conditions on account of their departure. They next dispatched a letter to James, with proposals of a negotiation; and lieutenant-general Hamilton, who commanded in that prince's service, undertook that the army should not, during the time of the treaty, advance within four miles of the city. Mr. Walker, the clergyman already mentioned, had in vain used all his rhetoric to persuade the governor to take the field, and come to a general engagement. He was deaf to all his arguments, and listened only to his own pusillanimous apprehensions, which were greatly heightened when he found that James, disregarding the promise that his general had made, was advancing at the head of his troops to the wall of the town. The inhabitants and soldiery in the place were so exasperated at the cowardice of their governor and the two colonels, that they flew to arms, and would have made their lives pay the forfeit of their perfidy, had not the former kept himself concealed in his chamber, and the other two found means to make their escape on board their ships. In the mean time, however, major Baker, the deputy-governor, fired so warmly from the garrison upon James and his troops, that the latter were obliged to retreat to St. John's town in some disorder. Walker and Baker made use of this respite to press Lundy to exert himself as became a loyal subject and a good foldier, and to undertake the defence of the place: but such was the governor's cowardice or treachery, that he absolutely refused to have any thing to do with the government, and soon after made his escape in disguise. He was afterwards seized in Scotland, from whence he was brought to London to answer for his conduct, together with Cunningham and Richards, and were all three dismissed from the service: too slight a punishment for their treachery!

After their departure, or rather desertion, from the town, the inhabitants with one consent bestowed the government of the place on Mr. Walker and major Baker, who immediately prepared for a vigorous defence, determined to bury themselves beneath the ruins of the place rather than surrender it to the enemy, in case the assistance they hoped from England should fail them. They formed the townsmen, amounting in all to seven thousand men, into different regiments: they taught them the proper management of arms, the firing of cannon, and all the other manœuvres requisite for their own defence, or the annoyance of the enemy.

On the twentieth of April the trenches were opened by king James's army, whose batteries began to play upon the town, which in itself was but poorly fortified, having not above twenty pieces of cannon, and those wretchedly mounted. Nevertheless the besieged, animated by the example and spirited harangues of Mr. Walker in particular, held out with surprising resolution, against so much superior a force employed to reduce them. King James having returned to Dublin, to be present at the opening of the parliament he had convened, left the command of the army to the marquis de Rosene, the French general, a man of a more than savage haughtiness and cruelty of disposition. Incensed at the opposition he had met with from an handful of half-starved peasants, as he styled them in contempt, he vented his rage in the most unmanly manner; and sent to acquaint the besieged, that unless they instantly submitted themselves to their lawful sovereign, he would not leave one stone upon another in the town, nor even an infant alive to carry the news of their destruction. True courage always bears with contempt the empty blusterings of arrogance and vanity: the governors and the garrison answered his threats only by redoubling their noble resistance, though their provisions were now all expended, and they were reduced to the dreadful necessity of supporting life by eating the flesh of horses, dogs, cats, rats, mice, salted hides, and every other kind of most loathsome food; yet they kept up their courage, and a proclamation was published, that no person, under pain of death, should talk of surrendering.

The French general, finding that his menaces had no effect on them, bethought himself of a scheme to enforce their compliance, that seemed rather the conception of an infernal fiend than of one invested with the character of a man. He sent detachments of his soldiers throughout the adjacent country, with orders to seize on all the protestants they could find, without distinction of age or sex, to strip them naked, and drive them in that condition under the walls of Londonderry. This order was executed with a brutality equal to that of the giver of it: upwards of four thousand of these miserable objects were thus exposed naked to the view of the besieged, who from their ramparts beheld, with an horror not to be described, the forlorn situation of their miserable fellow-protestants, many of whom were expiring every moment with fatigue, cold, hunger, and the ill usage they had sustained from their bloody persecutors. This sight however had a very different effect upon the garrison to what Rosene had hoped: they felt deep compassion for the distresses of their brethren; but this compassion was mingled with such an indignation against the authors of this inhumanity, such an apprehension of what would be their own fate, if they should fall within his power, that they resolved to perish rather than submit to the barbarian. Thinking themselves no longer bound to observe the nicer rules of war, which had been so flagitiously violated by the foe, they erected a gibbet on their walls, and sent to acquaint the French general, that unless he immediately set at liberty the protestants whom he had driven under their walls, they would hang all the prisoners they had taken in their sallies during the siege. Rosene, convinced by the whole of their behaviour that they would not fail to make good their threats, ordered the protestants to be released, after they had been detained three days without tasting food. Numbers of them died of famine and fatigue in their return to their habitations; and those who survived had the additional misfortune to find their houses and effects mostly plundered and destroyed by the roving parties about the country, so that the greater part of those unfortunate people fell victims to the bloody malice of the popish foe. It is asserted that James was applied to by the bishop of Meath to countermand this order given by Rosene, but without effect. Such, and others that we shall hereafter see, were the expedients that infatuated prince made use of to regain the affection of his old subjects.

The garrison of Londonderry was now reduced from seven thousand men to five thousand seven hundred; and these were driven to such extremity of distress, that they began to talk of preying upon each other. At length, however, they received the wished-for succour: major-general Kirk, the same who made himself so infamous under the late reign, and who had abandoned his former master to be employed in the service of king William, arrived in the Lough with a reinforcement of nine thousand men; and being ordered to relieve the garrison at all events, he sent three ships up the river laden with provisions, under protection of the Dartmouth frigate. The enemy, to prevent any ships from sailing up to the town, had erected strong batteries on both sides the stream, and had thrown a strong boom across its channel: one of the ships, however, taking advantage of a strong gale of wind in her favour, advanced with full sail, broke the enemy's boom; and with them the other vessels anchored in safety off the town, after having passed a most severe fire from the enemy's batteries.

Inexpressible was the joy of the besieged on this occasion, and as great the discouragement of James's army, who now despairing of their succeeding in their enterprize, abandoned the siege that very night (the thirty-first of July) and retired with the utmost precipitation, after having lost about nine thousand men in this fruitless attempt. Kirk next took possession of the town, when Walker was persuaded by the inhabitants to pass over to England with an address of thanks to their majesties for their generous succour. He was received by the king and queen with that honour and respect which was so justly due to his distinguished valour*.

Inniskilling, another town in the north of Ireland, signalized itself no less than Londonderry in the protestant cause: for, upon notice that this latter had denied entrance to the Irish troops in James's service, they resolved not to admit any garrison of his party; and having raised a regiment of twelve companies, they shut their gates, and gave the command of their town to Gustavus Hamilton, a protestant officer of approved courage and conduct; after which they proclaimed king William and queen Mary: and the lord Gilmoy, who had declared for James, and came with a strong force to summon them to surrender, was, by the noble resistance they made, obliged to quit the siege of the place, which he had formed: nor was this all: for the day before Londonderry was relieved, the brave Inniskilliners advanced with their handful of forces against six thousand Irish, whom they defeated at a place called Newton-Butler, killing and drowning near three thousand, with the loss of only about twenty killed, and fifty wounded, on their side†.

The Irish parliament having met at Dublin on the day appointed by king James's proclamation, that monarch opened it by a speech from the throne, in which he cordially thanked them for their zeal and loyalty; lavished the highest encomiums on the humanity and generosity of his good brother and ally the king of France, manifested towards himself, his queen, and his son, in affording them an asylum, after being expelled their lawful dominions, and having now enabled him to visit that part of them in person; declared his fixed resolve to establish liberty of conscience, as the only certain method of securing the welfare and happiness of his people, of all denominations, whose common parent, he said, he considered himself to be; and concluded with assuring both houses of his hearty concurrence with them, in enacting such laws as might tend to the tranquillity and good settlement of the kingdom.

It may easily be conjectured what a kind of parliament this was, and what the nature of its transactions was likely to be. Every method had been used to fill the house of lords with popish peers, so that there were only four or five protestants of the temporal, and four of the spiritual lords among them: and the house of commons was so modelled, that there was hardly a member who deserved the name of protestant. The reader therefore will not be surprized to find the parliament openly professing itself a slave to the king's will, since that man was sure to be looked on as factious, or rebelliously inclined, who should dare to move any thing, after any favourite in the house had affirmed that it was contrary to the king's pleasure. Accordingly, James had no sooner left the house, than the commons came to a resolution to present an address of thanks to his majesty, and that the count d'Avaux should be desired to offer their grateful acknowledgements to the most Christian king, for the friendly assistance he had given to their sovereign. A bill was next introduced to recognize James's title, and to express their abhorrence of the prince of Orange's usurpation, as well as of the disloyalty and treasonable conduct of the English.

Next day, May 10, James published a declaration, addressed to all his loving subjects in his kingdom of England. He there complained of the many false and invidious reports which had been raised against his person and government; insisted on his own impartiality in preferring his protestant subjects to places of trust and profit; his care in protecting them from their enemies, in redressing their grievances, and indulging them with liberty of conscience; promising that he would take no step without the consent and concurrence of parliament; offering a free and full pardon to all persons who should abandon his enemies, and join him in twenty-four days after his landing in Ireland; and charging all the blood that might be spilt, upon those who should continue to persevere in rebellion.

But scarce was the ink dry on this paper, when James gave the world a convincing proof of the degree of dependence to be placed on his promises and assurances, however solemnly urged; for two days only after the publishing of this declaration, a bill was brought into the house of commons by Nugent, lord chief-justice of the King's-bench in Ireland, for repealing the act of settlement, which went through three readings, without the least opposition from the house. By this bill two thirds of the protestants of the kingdom, who held their estates by virtue of the aforesaid act *, were dispossessed of them, and turned out to want and misery, while papists were put into the enjoyment of their fortunes. In the upper house this bill met with some opposition, especially from the bishop of Meath, who, in a most pathetic and eloquent speech, exposed the absurdity and injustice of it; and endeavoured to shew, that it was neither to the advantage of the king nor the public; that it tended not only to ruin the kingdom, and destroy the public faith, but was both impolitic and inconvenient in point of time. Such was the spirit of this parliament, however, and so determined did it appear to ruin the protestants in the most effectual manner, that the bill passed into a law, which received the royal assent.

Yet, as if all these measures were not sufficient to convince James's protestant subjects of the lenity and justice they were to expect from him, if he should be restored by their joint endeavours to the sovereign sway, an act of attainder was passed this session against all persons of that persuasion, of what sex or degree soever, who were absent from the kingdom, as well as against those who entered into any part of the three kingdoms which did not own the authority of king James; or who held correspondence with the rebels, as king William's friends were all termed; or who were anywise aiding or assisting to them, from the first day of August in the preceding year. No less than three thousand protestants were attainted by name in this act; among whom were two archbishops, one duke, seventeen earls, seven countesses, as many bishops, eighteen barons, thirty-three baronets, fifty-one knights, and eighty-three clergymen; all of whom were declared punishable by death and forfeiture: a bloody proscription, which has not its parallel in the records of the most tyrannic governments; especially if we consider that the proscribed were all excluded from the hope of pardon, and all benefit of appeal, unless enrolled by the king's order before the first day of December next following. By another act, the parliament of Ireland was declared independent of that of England.

It would be endless to enumerate the many other instances of James's foolish, tyrannical, and impolitic conduct, during his abode in Ireland. We shall therefore turn our eyes from this unpleasing scene, and attend to the measures taken by William and the English government to oppose the designs of his competitor, to reduce his Irish dominions to due subjection, and relieve his suffering protestant subjects there.

King William being informed of the landing of James, as also that the fleet which brought him over being returned to France was to be replaced by another strong squadron, commanded by admiral Chateau Renaud, as a convoy to some transports laden with arms, ammunition, &c. detached admiral Herbert from Spithead with twelve ships of the line, one fire-ship, and four tenders, in order to intercept the enemy. The English admiral having been driven about for some time by hard and contrary gales of wind, at length got upon the Irish coast; and on the first of May discovered the French fleet, consisting of no less than twenty eight ships of the line, most of them from sixty to seventy guns, and five fire ships, lying in Bantry-bay, who immediately, upon descrying him, weighed anchor, and sailed out of the harbour to give him battle, flushed with their superior force and the advantage of the wind over our fleet. Admiral Herbert having tried for some time, without success, to get the weather-gage † of the French, and finding it impossible, did not chuse to run the hazard of fighting under so great a disadvantage: he therefore stood off to sea, and for some time maintained a running fight, when, evening beginning to approach, Chateau Renaud tacked about, and returned to the Bay. The French, according to their usual custom, represented this paltry skirmish as a signal victory, though with all their superiority and strength they neither took nor sunk a single vessel. It is so seldom indeed that they have had the least shadow of advantage over us at sea, that we may forgive them this piece of vanity. King William was so satisfied with Herbert's conduct on this occasion, that when the latter returned to Portsmouth, his majesty, in an excursion he made thither, to hasten the naval preparations then carrying on in that port, dined on board the admiral's ship the Elizabeth, and declared his intention to create him an earl in consideration of his services: at the same time he conferred the honour of knighthood on captain Cloudesly Shovel, and another sea-officer who had served in this expedition, and bestowed a gratuity of ten shillings per man on every private sailor.

By some unaccountable delay, arising either from the disputes among the ministers, or the neglect of those who had the management of military affairs, James had been six months in Ireland before the army was embarked for that kingdom. At length, eighteen regiments of foot, and five of dragoons, being ready for that service, with a suitable train of artillery, the king was pleased to appoint marechal (now duke of) Schomberg to the chief command, who on the thirteenth of August landed in the neighbourhood of Carrickfergus, with about ten thousand foot and dragoons, and took possession of Belfast, from whence the enemy retired at his approach to Carrickfergus, where they resolved to make a stand; but the duke advancing with intrepidity, made himself master of Carrickfergus in four days. This was followed

* During the Irish rebellion in 1641, many estates had been granted to protestants, upon condition of their giving assistance towards the suppression of that insurrection; and it was chiefly owing to the vigorous efforts of those adventurers, that the rebellion was at last suppressed. At the same time as all the rebels were deprived of their lands, some of them were sold by the crown to protestants at very reasonable, and sometimes at very high, rates. Soon after a bill was passed in the English parliament, entitled, The Act of Settlement, securing the protestants in the possession of the estates which they had thus acquired, and their right to which was universally held to be good and valid.

by other successes: Newry, Dundalk, and other places, yielded to his summons; and he would have made a much greater progress had he not met with disappointments from delays in transporting part of his forces and train of artillery that he had left behind him in England, which were owing to negligence, or something worse, in the persons who had the management of affairs at home, or the slowness in raising supplies. King James having assembled all his forces, advanced towards Schomberg, who lay near Drogheda, and on the twenty-third of September approached within two miles of his intrenchments; but the duke, finding his army every day diminishing through sickness, which had swept off many brave officers, as well as a great number of soldiers, while the enemy, who outnumbered him almost two to one, were in perfect health, and their troops much better disciplined than his, prudently declined an engagement; and James on his side, not caring to attack the duke in his intrenchments, drew off his army. Schomberg was greatly censured by some persons for this inactivity of his, as they termed it; but, all circumstances considered, he seems to have acted according to the dictates of sound policy: the loss of a battle at that juncture might have been followed with the loss of all Ireland. Winter approaching, both armies went into quarters.

Our sea affairs were attended with as little success as those by land, owing to the same causes. Admiral Herbert, now created earl of Torrington, having again sailed for Ireland, at the head of the combined fleets of England and Holland, made an attempt to surprize the city of Cork; but upon a false intelligence, that James with his whole army was in the neighbourhood, he did not dare to land his men; and, after some short stay upon the coast, returned to England, and put into Torbay, his men being for the most part disabled by sickness. There was the greatest reason to ascribe this misfortune to the villainy of those who had the victualing of the navy, for the Dutch seamen were in perfect health during the whole cruise. The French, though they no longer dared to send out a fleet, did infinite damage to our trade by means of their privateers, which swarmed in the Channel: the Dartmouth ship of war had the misfortune to fall into their hands. This appearance of supineness in our government gave great disgust to the nation, and occasioned some strict enquiries, as will be seen in the account of parliamentary affairs, to which we shall now proceed.

To shew the sense of the nation concerning some of the sanguinary and arbitrary proceedings in the late reigns, the attainders of several persons who had suffered capital punishments, were, by acts of parliament, at several times, annulled and made void; as those of William lord Russell, Algernon Sidney, esq; the lady Lisle, and alderman Cornish. The judgment against Mr. Samuel Johnson, chaplain to lord Russell, was reversed; and tho' there were very long and great debates about Titus Oates, whose evidence in general, concerning the popish plot, was held to be satisfactory only in some particulars relating to time and place; yet the parliament addressed the king to take off the remaining part of his punishment, namely, his imprisonment for life, and annual pillorying, which his majesty readily complied with, and moreover allowed him an annual pension. The judgment upon the Quo Warranto against the city of London was also reversed; and the city restored to its privileges; and an act of oblivion at length passed, out of which were excepted some few of the many late instruments of popery and arbitrary power. The earl of Sunderland was excepted only for form's sake, he having, by shifting sides, in time obtained king William's favour*.

As the illegal proceedings of the two last reigns and their authors were enquired into, so the miscarriages of the present were also discussed. The lords having addressed the king to put the Isle of Wight, Jersey, Guernsey, Scilly, Dover Castle, and the other fortresses of the kingdom, into a proper posture of defence, and to disarm the papists, began to make enquiry into the cause of the miscarriages in Ireland; in the course of which enquiry great blame was imputed to the marquis of Caermarthen (late earl of Danby) and the marquis of Halifax†: it was even moved to address his majesty against the latter of those ministers, but a negative was put to the motion by a small majority. In fine, an alarming spirit of rancour and discord began to shew itself between the two parties of Whigs and Tories, which might have been attended with disagreeable consequences, had not some of the warmest on each side suddenly cooled in the course of the dispute.

A bill being introduced into the house of lords for enjoining the wearing the woollen manufacture of this kingdom at certain times of the year, the silk-weavers of London and Canterbury assembled in a tumultuous manner at Westminster, to oppose the passing the said bill. The lords refused to read their petition against it, on account of the manner in which it was delivered; and proper measures being at the same time taken to guard against the consequences of their insolence, the weavers returned home. The bill, however, was rejected by the lords by a very great majority. A bill was brought in for attainting several persons in rebellion against their majesties; but it was not finished this session. One of the last acts of this session was that for raising the sum of 600,000*l.* for the Dutch. The king, thinking it highly reasonable that the States should be repaid as soon as possible what they had laid out to further his expedition, and assist him in preserving the religion and liberties of England, took all occasions to put the commons in mind of it: an account of the charges were accordingly taken, and the above sum voted for that purpose; but it was not till the close of this session that a fund was settled for raising the money. This and some other acts, of which the reader will find an account in the notes, having received the royal assent on the 21st of August, the two houses were adjourned to the 20th of September, and afterwards to the 19th of October.

† The house resolved that an address should be presented to his majesty, declaring, that the succours for Ireland had been retarded by unnecessary delays; that the transports prepared by the government were not sufficient to convey the forces into that kingdom; and that several ships had fallen into the hands of the enemy for want of a proper convoy. Proceedings House of Commons, August 3.

King William having acceded to the grand alliance, did in August this year conclude a new league with the states-general, in which former treaties of peace and commerce were confirmed. It was agreed, that in case the king of Great-Britain should be attacked, the Dutch should assist him with 6000 infantry and twenty ships of war; and if the territories of the state should be invaded, England should supply them with 10,000 infantry and twenty ships of war. About the same time the king entered into an alliance with Christian V. king of Denmark, by virtue of which the English army in Ireland under D. Schomberg were this winter reinforced by 7000 Danish auxiliaries, viz. 6000 foot and 1000 horse. Notwithstanding these confederacies against him, Lewis XIV. abated nought in the prosecution of his ambitious designs: he had suddenly fallen upon Germany, and made himself almost entire master of the three ecclesiastical electorates: he had reduced Mentz, Triers, Bonne, Keiserwaert, Philipsburgh, and Landau; destroyed Mannheim by fire and sword, and made the Palatinate a desert. His generals had burnt the cities of Worms and Spire, and demolished Frankendahl; but his successes were somewhat checked by this year's campaign in Flanders. The marshal d'Humieres commanded an army of French there amounting to 80,000 men, whilst the prince of Waldeck, with a body of 60,000 men, had fixed his rendezvous in the county of Liege. The lord Churchill, lately created earl of Marlborough, had been sent over with 10,000 British auxiliaries to join the Dutch army, which he effected. The two armies passed the summer without any remarkable action till the middle of August, when the city of Liege renounced the neutrality it had assumed, declared for the allies, and put into their hands a large convoy of military stores and money belonging to the enemy. Soon after marshal d'Humieres, thinking to surprize a party of Dutch horse, who were gone out to forage, made a motion with his whole army for that purpose. Prince Waldeck, having notice of this, made the proper dispositions for supporting his men; each side advancing, a sharp engagement ensued, in which the French, after an obstinate resistance, were put to the rout with the loss of 2000 men and several pieces of artillery. Mean while a little army of observation, commanded by the prince de Vaudemont, levelled part of the French lines on the side of Cambray, and raised contributions in the territories of France. This was all that passed worthy notice in Flanders during this campaign.

The arms of the allies were much more successful in Germany. The French had covered their conquests on this side with a numerous army under marshal duke de Duras, assisted by some of the ablest generals and officers in the service of France; but the marshal could with difficulty stand his ground; the different princes of the empire, united by one common interest, and burning with indignation at the cruelties the French had committed in their territories, were determined to leave nothing undone to expel the inhuman invader, and revenge the sufferings of their people on his head. The duke of Bavaria brought an army of 50,000 men into the field; the elector of Saxony appeared at the head of another of 40,000; and a third of 51,000 was formed under the elector of Brandenburg. The duke of Lorrain, at the head of the imperial troops, laid siege to Mentz, which was defended by the marshal d'Uxelles, who, after having held out for two months, surrendered the place on capitulation. The French, by their own confession, had above 900 men slain, and 1900 wounded. The marshal d'Uxelles, at his return to France, was vilified by the populace; but he treated them with the contempt that every wise man must do a populace, who are always bad judges of merit, and whose praise nevertheless is so greedily sought after. His rival, the duke of Lorrain, was so sensible of the bravery and merit of the marquis, that he left him master of the articles of the capitulation. By the taking of Mentz, Franconia, which before lay exposed, was now covered. The elector of Brandenburg laid siege to Keiserwaert, which, after a vigorous attack, and as obstinate a defence, surrendered about the middle of June. He next attacked Bonne, which baron d'Asfeldt commanded. The siege was tedious, and the garrison did not surrender till after fifty-five days blockade, and twenty-six days close siege. The taking of Bonne laid the Rhine open as far as Mentz; the elector of Brandenburg was indebted for his success chiefly to the duke of Lorrain, who, after the surrender of Mentz, marched with his army to the elector's assistance. With this siege ended the campaign on the Rhine. The French had some little success in Catalonia under the duke of Noailles, who had reduced Campredon in the month of May; but he was so hard pushed by the Spaniards, that he was obliged to withdraw the garrison, dismantle the place, and retreat to the frontiers of France with great precipitation*. To return to the affairs of England during the recess of the parliament—

The most remarkable acts passed this session, besides those already mentioned, were these:

An act to vest in the two universities the presentations belonging to the papists. The university of Oxford is to present all popish livings in the southern counties; and the university of Cambridge, to those of the northern: and if any trustee, mortgagee, or grantee of such advowson present without notice to the respective university, he forfeits five hundred pounds to the university. No popish benefice is to be granted to any person having another; and such benefice is to be void by absence of sixty days in one year.

Acts for erecting courts of conscience in Bristol, Gloucester, and Newcastle, which have been much to the benefit and ease of the inhabitants.

An act for abolishing the court of the Marches of Wales, which had been continued by Henry VIII. the president and council whereof had power to determine by their discretion all matters belonging to the court. This had proved an intolerable burden to Wales and the borders at all times, and a means to introduce an arbitrary power, especially in the late reigns, when a new convert family were at the head of it: nor could the earl of Macclesfield, the last president, who kept his court at Ludlow, reduce it to such order as to cease to be a grievance, and therefore it was dissolved.

An act for the relief of the protestant Irish clergy; by which act, those that had been forced from their country, and had benefices there, were enabled to hold any benefice in England, without forfeiting their promotions in Ireland; but were obliged to resign their ecclesiastical preferments in England, when restored to those they had been forced to relinquish.

An act to repeal the statute of Henry IV. against multiplying gold and silver. By this act, the melting and refining of metals, improving them and their ores, and extracting gold and silver from thence (which had been forbidden) are allowed, on condition that all the gold and silver thus extracted, be brought to the Mint in the Tower, to be converted into money: at which place the extractors are to receive the full value of their gold or silver, according to the fineness thereof.

* Vol. I. Age of Lewis XIV.—Contin. of Rapin.

The day appointed for the two houses to reassemble drawing near, and the king proposing to call a convocation, in order to make another effort to establish his favourite plan of comprehension, he thought fit to fill up the vacant sees of Worcester, Chichester, and Bristol, which were bestowed the first on Dr. Stillingfleet, the second on Dr. Patrick, and the third on Dr. Ironside; sir Jonathan Trelawney having been translated from thence to Exeter. In the next place, his majesty, in order that the subject of a general comprehension of his Protestant subjects might be duly digested, granted a commission under the great seal to ten bishops and the same number of dignitaries of the church, authorizing them "to meet, from time to time, to prepare such alterations of the liturgy and the canons, and such reformatations of the ecclesiastical courts as might conduce to the good order, edification, and unity of the church, and tend to compromise all differences among the Protestant subjects of this kingdom *." It soon appeared, however, that there were very little hopes of success from this project. Many of the commissioners were so far from approving of a comprehension, that they would hardly own the reformed churches abroad to be true churches, much less the Dissenters; and at the very first meeting of the committee, the bishop of Rochester (Sprat) started a dispute concerning the authority and legality of the court; alledging the obligations the clergy lay under by an act of parliament of king Henry VIII. not to enter into debates about making any alterations in church-affairs, without the king's special and immediate privacy, and directions first given for such alterations; but the bishop's argument being over-ruled, he retired in disgust from the committee, and was followed by some others of the more rigid ones; namely, Mew, bishop of Winchester, and the doctors Jane, Aldrich, Beaumont, Montagu, Goodman, Beveridge, and Alston. The commissioners, notwithstanding this secession, proceeded with great moderation in the business for which they had assembled.

They began with reviewing the liturgy; and first they examined the calendar, in which, in the room of apocryphal lessons, they ordered certain chapters of canonical scripture to be read that were to the people's advantage. Athanasius's Creed being disliked by many, because of the damnatory clause, it was left to the minister's choice to use it or change it for the Apostles Creed; new collects were drawn up more agreeable to the epistles and gospels for the whole course of the year; and these were composed with that elegance and propriety of expression, and such a flame of devotion, that nothing could more affect the hearts of the hearers, and elevate their minds towards God. They were first drawn up by Dr. Patrick, who was reckoned to have great skill in liturgical compositions; bishop Burnet added to them yet further force and spirit; Dr. Stillingfleet afterwards examined them with great judgment, carefully weighing every word in them; and Dr. Tillotson had the last hand in giving them some free and masterly strokes of his easy and flowing eloquence. Dr. Kidder, who was well versed in the oriental tongues, made a new version of the Psalms, more agreeable to the original. Dr. Tennison made a collection of the words and expressions throughout the liturgy, which had been objected to, and proposed others in their room, that were clear and plain, and less liable to objection. Other things also were proposed, that were left to be determined by the convocation, as, 1. That the cross in baptism might be either used or omitted at the choice of the parents: 2. That a Non-conformist minister going over to the church, should not be ordained according to the common form, but conditionally, much in the same manner as the baptizing of infants is ordered in the church, if there be not evidence of their being baptized before, with the addition of the episcopal benediction, as was customary in the antient church, when clerks were received who had been ordained by heretics †.

In the mean time the enemies of the government did not fail to embrace the favourable opportunity of the dispute between the commissioners and the late secession of a part of their members, to inflame the minds of the people, who already began to entertain suspicions of William's religious principles: they represented him as an enemy to the church of England, and attached to the doctrine of Calvin: they insinuated that this commission, to which they affixed the odious and alarming epithet of "a new ecclesiastical high court," was intended to establish presbytery at the expence of episcopacy, which would, in consequence of the intended alterations in the church-government, become a mere cypher, and soon be abolished.

The populace gave into the deception, the church was generally declared to be in danger, and, what is very extraordinary, the two universities greedily swallowed the ridiculous and malicious reports of the incendiaries, and solemnly declared against all alterations, as well as against those who presumed to promote them. Much the same spirit manifested itself in the convocation on its meeting; the rigid churchmen opposed the friends of the comprehension in the choice of a prolocutor for the lower house; and rejecting Dr. Tillotson, who had been proposed by the king, elected Dr. Jane, who was esteemed the most violent churchman in the whole assembly. The bishop of London, who sat as president in the upper house, in vain recommended candour, unanimity, and concord, and such a reasonable concession as might open the door of salvation to such numbers of straying Christians. His advice had very little effect; the lower house, far from shewing any inclination to make even the necessary concessions, would not consent to the smallest alteration in the liturgy or canons; asserting, that they could not be amended. In fine, the president, finding there was nothing to be expected from the compliance of the house, which on all occasions expressed a settled dislike to any union with the Dissenters, prorogued the session after the convocation had sat about six weeks, and the king suffered it to be adjourned for ten years by repeated prorogations.

The parliament meeting on the nineteenth of October, the king, in a speech of his own composing, explained the necessity of a present supply to carry on the war; desired that they would be speedy in their determinations on that subject, as these would greatly influence the deliberations of the princes and states concerned in the alliance against France, as a general meeting of them, he said, was appointed to be held next month at the Hague. The houses were then prorogued for four days, when they assembled; and the commons taking the king's speech into consideration, unanimously resolved to assist his majesty in reducing Ireland, and in joining his allies abroad for a vigorous prosecution of the war against France: for which purpose they voted a supply of two millions, to be raised by a land-tax of three shillings in the pound, and additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate *.

Several motions relating to grievances having been made in both houses, the marquis of Halifax, who thought himself particularly aimed at, resolved to retire from court, and quit the administration. He therefore resigned the privy-seal †, and reconciled himself to the Tories, of whose party he thenceforth became the chief patron and protector: while the Whigs, between whom and the king there daily grew greater coldness, not to say disgust, on his majesty's side in particular, employed all their efforts to oppose the favour shewn to their adversaries, and thwart their preferment in the state. The miscarriages in the Irish affairs continuing still to be the subject of great complaint, the commons took the same into their consideration, and presented an address, humbly intreating his majesty that he would be pleased to appoint commissioners to go over and enquire into the conduct of the army in that kingdom ‡. In the course of their enquiries, it appearing that the miscarriages in question were wholly owing to the treachery and avarice of John Shales, purveyor-general of the army, an address was presented to the king, intreating his majesty to order Shales into custody, and to empower duke Schomberg to fill his place with a more able and trusty purveyor. The king informed them he had already sent orders to the general for that purpose; and at the same time sent a message to the house, desiring them to recommend a certain number of commissioners, not exceeding seven, to be sent over to Ireland to take care of the provisions, and such other preparations as should be found necessary for that service. About the same time, the commons took into consideration the state of the nation, and several members made great complaints of the late ill conduct of affairs. On this occasion Mr. Hambden made a violent attack upon the ministry, especially the earl of Nottingham, but was as violently opposed by his own father. In the month of December a question was put in the house of commons, "Whether a person having a place in court, or any dependence on the king, should be a member of that house?" This, as may be supposed, occasioned a very warm and obstinate debate; but the placemen carried the day, it being alleged that the exclusion aimed at in the question would debar the ablest men in the nation of an opportunity to serve at the same time their king and their country.

The Whigs, pursuant to their scheme of thwarting the king, made such a party in the parliament this session, that in spite of his majesty's earnest desire to have a revenue settled upon him for life, alleging he could not look upon himself as a king till it was done; the civil list was nevertheless granted but for one year. By this opposition the Whigs lost themselves entirely in the king's favour, who every day shewed a stronger inclination to join himself with the Tories, who made him the most pompous promises of supplies, and an attention to all his inclinations, if he would only dissolve the parliament and call a new one. The Whigs soon discovered that their adversaries were tampering with the king; and to frustrate their designs, they introduced a bill into the lower house for restoring corporations to their antient rights and privileges; in which they inserted a clause that they hoped would make themselves masters of all future elections, by denouncing great penalties against those who had been any way concerned in delivering up the charters. This clause, the substance of which the reader will find in the note ||, was opposed by the Tories with their utmost force, and was at length rejected; but the Whigs prevailed so far, that the bill passed the commons in its original form by a great majority: the house of lords was so equally divided on this occasion, that the bill passed there by one voice only. Both parties now made the warmest court to the king to bring him over to their several interests. King William was under the greatest perplexity how to determine: the behaviour of the Whigs had made him look upon them as a set of people infected with republican principles, continually jealous of the kingly power. He thought, that by giving his assent to the bill, he should in a manner make himself entirely dependent on them, and live only the pageant of a sovereign. On the other hand, to repose too unlimited a confidence in the Tories, appeared to him replete with the most alarming consequences, as he knew their attachment to the principles of the divine indefeasible right of kings. If we may believe Burnet, and some other historians, he was in this dilemma on the point of taking a desperate resolution, no less than that of leaving the government in the hands of the queen, to whom he thought the Tories would be true, and withdrawing himself into Holland. He was however persuaded from the execution of this rash purpose by the marquis of Caermarthen, the earl of Shrewsbury, and some other noblemen most in his confidence; and he resolved to change this fatal design for another of more service to the nation, that of going over in person to Ireland to finish the war there.

As soon as this intention of his majesty came to be known, by the preparations ordered for his voyage, a strong party was formed to oppose it. The friends of the Revolution were against it, from the apprehension that the fatigues of a campaign, and the bad climate of the country, might, exclusive of the chance of war, have a fatal effect on the king's weak and tender constitution, whose death must unavoidably involve the nation in all the horrors of a civil war. The Jacobites, on the other hand, dreaded William's taking the field in person against their old master; and thus both houses resolved to address against the intended expedition. William was apprized of their design; and to prevent the execution of it, came to the parliament-house on the seventeenth of January, 1690, and in a speech formally notified his resolution of going in person to Ireland, telling them, that as he had already ventured his life for the preservation of the laws and liberties of the nation, he was willing again to expose it, to secure them the great enjoyment of these blessings. Having ended his speech, the lord-chancellor prorogued the parliament to the twenty-second of April; but on the sixth of February the king dissolved it, and writs were issued for a new one to meet on the twentieth of March.

In this session was passed the declaration of rights and the act of settlement, of which we have already spoken. The affair likewise of the princess of Denmark's revenue was now compleated, which had been left unfinished the last session. While the two houses were sitting, a conspiracy, real or pretended, against the government, and a design to invite over king James, was discovered by bishop Burnet; the particulars of which are not sufficiently interesting, nor were the consequences of importance enough to induce us to detain our readers with a detail thereof: indeed this discovery was in general laughed at, being looked upon as a fiction of the court, and the city of London entertained a very ill opinion of the king upon this occasion.

Towards the close of the year, general Ludlow, who at the Restoration had been excepted out of the act of indemnity, as one of those who sat in judgment upon king Charles I. arrived in England, and offered his service in reducing Ireland, where he had formerly commanded under Cromwell. He was however soon obliged to retire; for sir Edward Seymour, who was in possession of a seat and estate at Maiden-Bradley in Wiltshire, which had belonged to Ludlow, and on its being forfeited came to sir Edward by a grant, represented to the house of commons in very warm terms, "the infamy that would be fixed on the character of the nation, should any of the murderers of that king, whom the church of England had so justly dignified with the title of Martyr, be allowed to live in the kingdom:" whereupon the house addressed the king to issue a proclamation for apprehending general Ludlow. This was accordingly published, but not till it was known for certain the general was safely landed in Holland, from whence he afterwards retired to Vevay in Switzerland, where he ended his days, after an exile of thirty years.

While these things passed in England, a strong party was forming against king William in Scotland. The Scots, who had come up to London to give an account of their proceedings in their parliament, had been disgusted by the reserved behaviour of the king, and thought themselves and their brethren the presbyterians neglected and ill treated. On their return to their own kingdom, they represented those matters in such a manner as soon to kindle distrust and animosity against the new government. In short, a coalition was formed between the discontented presbyterians and the original Jacobite party. Colonel Cannon, who succeeded the viscount Dundee in command, after having made several unsuccessful efforts in favour of king James's interest, retired into Ireland, and the Highlanders chose sir Hugh Cameron for their leader; who taking advantage of the absence of a great number of the regular troops, which had been sent over to Ireland to reinforce duke Schomberg, renewed their incursions with success for some time; but at length a party of fifteen hundred of them, headed by colonel Buchan, being surprized and routed by sir Thomas Livingstone, the Highlanders were obliged to retire, and conceal themselves amongst their hills and inaccessible fastnesses. Experience having shewn the friends of James the little success to be hoped from any services they could do him in the field, it was resolved to direct all their attention to the proceedings in parliament, where they imagined their interest to be much stronger than it turned out upon trial. The Jacobites hoped, by the assistance of their new allies the presbyterians, to be able to embroil the government in such a manner, that the majority of the people would declare for a restoration. They accordingly took the oaths necessary for qualifying them to seats in the parliament without the least hesitation, and hugged themselves in the prospect of certain success; but it soon appeared that the views of these two lately connected parties were totally incompatible. Notwithstanding their concurrence in parliament, the earl of Melvil, high-commissioner from William, procured a small majority. The opposition was immediately discouraged: some individuals retracted, from apprehension of ill success to their cause, and mutual jealousies began to prevail. The leaders of the coalition treated separately with king James, made inconsistent demands, reciprocally concealed their negotiations; in a word, they distrusted and hated one another with the most implacable resentment.

The earls of Argyle, Annandale, and Braidalbin, withdrew from them. The earl of Annandale came up to Bath, on pretence of ill health; and Argyle and Braidalbin went to Chester, with an intent, as they afterwards declared, to discover the whole matter to the king. Sir James Montgomery, who was at the head of the discontented presbyterians, looked upon their design as ruined by this desertion, and therefore reconciled himself to the earl of Melvil, to whom he hinted something of the plot, and solicited a pass to the king, which was refused. Annandale having received information that Montgomery had disclosed all the particulars of the negotiation, threw himself upon the king's mercy, and discovered all he knew of the conspiracy. Montgomery lurked for some time about London, soliciting a pardon; but finding he

he could not obtain it unless he made a full discovery, he chose to quit his country and die in exile, rather than betray his confederates. By this disunion of the conspirators, and the discovery of the plot, the court interest at length triumphed over all opposition in Scotland; though, to effect this, the high-commissioner was obliged to make several great concessions to the fanatic presbyterians in parliament, particularly in the articles of patronage, and the supremacy of the crown, which he agreed to give up, in lieu of which the parliament indulged the king with the tax of chimney-money; and an act, obliging all persons in office and parliament to take a test oath, declaring William and Mary their lawful sovereigns, and renouncing the pretended title of James. There was at that time a prevailing faction in Scotland, called the Cameronian party, from one Cameron, formerly their leader, and who was slain in rebellion: they were a sort of rigid presbyterians, or rather Fifth-monarchy-men, who valued neither king William nor king James, further than as those princes happened to please them. Some designing heads in the council and parliament made use of those men to bring their ends about, whose weakness was otherwise discernible: they took all occasions to inspire the people with a detestation of episcopal government, and the worship of the church of England, which they represented as very little removed from popery, and her clergy ignorant and scandalous livers. These furious fanatics proceeded with ungovernable violence to persecute the church of England ministers, and at length obliged the earl of Melvil, apprehensive that king William's interest in Scotland would otherwise be irreparably damaged, to consent to lodge the government of the church in their hands; the consequence of which was, that all the laws in favour of episcopacy were abolished. About sixty presbyterian ministers, who had been ejected at the Restoration, were still alive, and declared by the parliament the only sound part of the church and presbytery. Having thus trampled the hierarchy again under foot, they exercised the very same tyranny over the church of England clergy, against which they themselves had so loudly exclaimed in the former reign.

While the presbyterian interest thus prevailed in Scotland, the two parties that divided England employed their whole influence and attention in managing the elections for the new parliament; and the Tories obtained the victory, to whom the king was every day giving fresh instances of his partiality in their favour. By the interest and address of the bishop of London, the marquis of Caermarthen, and the earl of Nottingham, the chiefs of that party, several of them were admitted into the commission for the lieutenantcy of the city of London, from which they had been excluded: and farther to gratify them, Charles Mordaunt earl of Monmouth, and Booth earl of Warrington, were dismissed from their seats in the council*.

The new parliament meeting on the twentieth of March, 1690, the commons chose sir John Trevor, a flaming Tory, for their speaker, who was approved by the king. William, in his speech to both houses, gave them to understand, "That he still persisted in his resolution of going in person to Ireland: he desired they would settle the revenue on him, as they had done on his predecessors, or establish it as a fund of credit, upon which he might raise the necessary sums to serve his present occasions: he told them he would send them an act of grace, with some few exceptions, being desirous to have no colour of excuse to any of his subjects for raising disturbances during his absence: he advised them to avoid dissensions, recommended to their consideration a union with Scotland, and said he should leave the administration in the hands of the queen during his absence, and desired they would prepare an act for that purpose, if it was thought necessary; concluding with an exhortation to them to use dispatch in the business for which they were assembled, as the season of the year, and his intended journey to Ireland, would admit of but a short session; adding at the same time, that he hoped it would not be long before he should meet them again, to perfect what the time would not now allow to be done†."

As both Whigs and Tories now vied with each other to court the king's favour, by obliging him in money affairs, the commons proceeded to settle the revenue, and make it a fund of credit for the supplies which were still wanted for the next campaign. They began with voting a supply of one million two hundred thousand pounds between that time and Michaelmas, of which two hundred thousand pounds was to be raised by a poll, and a million by a clause of credit in the revenue bills. Here however they stopped; for William could not prevail to have the revenue settled on him for life: all he could obtain was to have the hereditary excise settled for life, and the customs to be continued only for four years, from the twenty-fourth of December next ensuing‡.

There was a violent contest this session between the two parties on the import of a bill, requiring all subjects in office to take an oath, abjuring king James, on pain of imprisonment. The Tories however prevailed so far with the king, that, under various specious pretences, his majesty sent an intimation to the commons, desiring them to drop the debate, and proceed to matters that were more pressing. This interposition on the part of the king greatly disgusted the Whigs; and the earl of Shrewsbury, a man of acknowledged integrity and talents, who had interested himself warmly in behalf of the bill, insisted on resigning his office of secretary of state; nor could all the remonstrances of the king, who well knew his abilities, engage him even to keep the seals until he should return from Ireland. The abjuration bill was thrown out, after having received a second reading. The parliament being sensible that his majesty was in haste to go over to Ireland, dispatched the business before them as soon as could be expected; and the royal assent being given to several money-bills, the act of indemnity, and some other acts, as also an act for investing the queen § with the administration of the government during the king's absence; on the twenty-third day of May, his majesty closed the session with a short speech, in which he thanked his parliament for the supplies they had granted; told them, that though he only proposed to adjourn them for a short time, yet he did not mean to call for their attendance without some pressing necessity, till the beginning of winter; and earnestly recommended to them the faithful discharge of their duties in their respective counties, that the peace of the nation might not be disturbed during his absence *." The parliament was then adjourned to the second day of July, and afterwards underwent several adjournments and prorogations.

During this session there were the following promotions among the nobility; Richard, lord viscount Lumley, was created earl of Scarborough; Henry lord Delamere, earl of Warrington; Henry lord Grey of Ruthyn was created viscount Longueville; and the lord Willoughby of Eresby, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, was, by virtue of his majesty's writ of summons, called up to the house of peers; and on the third of June sir John Trevor, speaker of the commons, sir William Rawlinson, and sir George Hutchins, were constituted commissioners of the great-seal.

In the mean time, king James's affairs in Ireland wore a very untoward aspect: Lewis XIV. had indeed promised him a reinforcement of five thousand men under the count de Lausun, besides those he carried over with him; so that James had in all about seven thousand French, and as many Irish, most of them accounted good troops: the rest, which amounted to ten or twelve thousand men more, were new-raised, undisciplined, and not to be trusted to. King William, on the other hand, had increased his army in Ireland to near fifty thousand men, all regular forces, under experienced generals: which superiority gave him an assurance of success, and he had determined to have the honour of driving his enemy out of Ireland himself.

On the fourth of June he embarked at Highlake near Chester, and on the fourteenth landed at Carrickfergus, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough, and Manchester, and many other persons of distinction; and the same evening went to Belfast, where he was met by duke Schomberg, the prince of Wirtemberg, major-general Kirk, and other general officers.

The king's arrival immediately gave a new face to affairs: the military operations had for some time been at a stand, through the address of duke Schomberg, who carefully avoided coming to an engagement with the enemy before his majesty's arrival to head his troops in person: but now every thing appeared in motion. James, on his side, wearied with fluctuating in a continual state of uncertainty, seemed desirous to determine his fate by one decisive blow: king William was equally desirous to put an end to all competition for the sovereign sway. Thus disposed, the two rivals, as by mutual consent, moved towards each other in order to give battle. King William having reposed himself for two or three days at Belfast, repaired to Lisburne, where duke Schomberg had fixed his head quarters, and from thence to Hillsborough.

He ordered the whole army to encamp at Loughbrillan, where, upon a review, he found it amounted to thirty-six thousand effective men, all well equipped in every particular. King James being apprized of his arrival, immediately committed the guard of the city of Dublin to a body of militia, commanded by Lutterel; and setting out with the reinforcement of five thousand infantry lately sent him from France, joined the rest of his forces, which were now nearly equal to the English in number, exclusive of about fifteen thousand men, who remained in different garrisons.

James having advanced to the banks of the river Boyne, there took post in a very advantageous situation, having his front defended by that deep and rapid river, by a rising ground, and by a morass or bog: in a word, it was impossible for the English to attack him without manifest danger to themselves. On this consideration the officers in the Jacobite army were very pressing with James not to hazard a battle, but rather reinforce his garrisons, withdraw to the Shannon, and wait the issue of the naval preparations which Lewis XIV. was then hastening, in order to attack the English fleet, and succour his old ally: but James, burning with impatience, as I before observed, to decide the fate of his crown by a speedy and decisive engagement, could not brook these tame counsels, and prepared to give his adversary battle. William, on his side, was equally ready to receive him: however, he thought proper, before the fight, to take a view of the enemy's situation. Advancing for that purpose to the opposite side of the river, he was singled out by the enemy, who brought down two field-pieces by a hidden pathway, and planted them against his person: at the first shot they killed a man and two horses close by his side, and the second bullet rebounding from the ground, grazed his right shoulder, and produced a considerable contusion. William betrayed not the least emotion on this occasion; but having caused his wound to be bound up, he remounted his horse, and kept on his pace, only saying in French, "Il ne falloit pas que le coup fut tiré de plus près: There was no necessity the bullet should have come nearer." This accident, however, though of no great moment in itself, occasioned some confusion among his majesty's attendants; which being observed by the enemy, and they no longer seeing the king on horseback, concluded their cannon had taken the desired effect, and that William was killed. Upon this they set up a general shout, which was re-echoed through their camp: the news even spread to Dublin, from whence it was carried to Paris, where, contrary to the custom of the French court, the people were encouraged to express their joy by bonfires and illuminations.

The king having got his slight wound dressed, returned back to shew himself to his army, in order to quiet their apprehensions. About nine at night he called a council of war, and declared his resolution to pass the river the next day, and give the foe battle. This measure was strongly opposed by duke Schomberg; but the king shewing himself absolutely determined, and declaring that "he did not come there to let the grass grow under his feet," his plan was adopted by the majority of the council; upon which duke Schomberg acquiesced, and proposed that part of the army, horse and foot, should be sent that night towards Slane-bridge, in order to pass the Boyne there, and so get between the enemy and the pass at Duleck. This advice, which was a piece of consummate generalship, and must, if followed, have ensured a speedy and certain success to the English, was objected against and over-ruled by the Dutch officers; at which the duke was so disgusted, that he retired to his tent, whither the order of battle, after being settled in the council, was sent to him. He considered this as an additional affront: however, the respect he owed to his sovereign kept him from complaining: he only said, with some marks of discontent, that "it was the first order of that kind that had ever been sent to him." By the concerted disposition it was agreed, that early the next morning lieutenant-general Douglas, with the right wing of infantry, and Munhardt count Schomberg the duke's son, with the horse, should pass the river at Slane-bridge, in order to get between the enemy's camp and Drogheda, whilst a body of foot were to force their way at the pass of Old-Bridge.

King James also called a council of war on his side, when it was proposed by lieutenant-general Hamilton to send a strong party of dragoons to take possession of a ford which was below the town of Drogheda, the securing of which he thought to be, as it really was, of great importance. James, however, by a strange perverseness, would have only sixty dragoons sent thither. The cannonade on both sides, which had continued pretty warm ever since the two armies had come in sight of each other, ceased towards the close of the evening. William rode quite through the army by torch-light, and then retired to his tent, after having given order for the proper dispositions, and directed that his soldiers should wear green boughs in their hats during the ensuing action, to distinguish them from the enemy's men, who wore pieces of white paper in theirs.

The next day, July 1, about six o'clock in the morning, general Douglas, with young Schomberg, the earl of Portland, and Overkirk, marched towards Slane-bridge, and passed the river without any great opposition. Having gained the opposite bank, they found themselves confronted by a considerable number of the enemy, formed into two lines, behind a deep morass that secured their front. General Douglas, on sight of their disposition, thought it advisable to halt for the coming up of a fresh reinforcement, which he knew to be on its march to join him. No sooner was this arrived than he gave orders to the foot to move towards the morass or bog that lay between them and the enemy, while count Schomberg with his horse, who could not possibly march that way, was sent round it, to fall upon the Irish in flank. These latter no sooner perceived the motion made by the English, than they wheeled about, and retreated towards Duleck; but being pursued by the cavalry under young Schomberg, numbers of them were cut in pieces in their retreat, or rather flight. In the mean time king William, who knew not what had passed between this part of his army and the enemy, but supposed that his men had by this time effected their passage over the river, ordered his main body, composed of the Dutch guards, the French protestant regiments, the Inniskilling foot, and four battalions of English, to pass the Old-Bridge ford, and attack the enemy. They accordingly passed the river, which was waist high; and having gained the opposite bank, in spite of the resistance of a body of musqueteers sent to oppose them, they drew up into files, and then charged the Irish with such fury, that, unable to stand the shock of the onset, these latter abandoned their entrenchments, and retreated. King James had imprudently removed his cannon from the side of the river, which greatly facilitated the landing of the English: but before all the battalions could form, they were charged with great impetuosity by general Hamilton, at the head of a considerable body of horse and foot, and the dispute was for some time very obstinate: but the Irish foot, who that day behaved shamefully, soon gave way, and left their horse to sustain the whole fury of the combat, who were vigorously repulsed by the French protestants and the Inniskilliners. In the first of these onsets La Caillemote, the bosom friend and inseparable companion of the gallant duke Schomberg, received his mortal wound, at the head of the French protestants; and as he was carried back by four English soldiers to the English camp, he encouraged those of his countrymen who were still crossing the river, by calling out to them, "A la gloire, mes enfans! a la gloire! To glory, my good lads, to glory!"

Duke Schomberg perceiving the furious attack made upon the regiments that had forded the river, and being informed that the French protestants were without a commander, immediately passed the stream to head them, and with so much hurry, that he would not suffer himself to be persuaded to put on his armour. As soon as he had gained the opposite shore, he rode full gallop up to the French protestants, and putting himself at their head, called out by way of animating them, "Follow me, gentlemen; those are your persecutors," pointing at the same time to the French papists in the enemy's army. These words were scarcely pronounced, when the duke found himself attacked on a sudden by a party of king James's guards, who, on their body having been routed, were returning full gallop to the main guard of the army: the French refugees, mistaking them, from their language, for some of their own troops, suffered them to pass; and some of them riding up to the duke, fell upon and gave him two severe wounds on the head. The French protestants perceiving their error, and eager to save their general, made such an indiscreet fire upon these assailants, that they at the same time shot the duke dead upon the spot: the small party of the enemy's guards were indeed quickly cut in pieces; but this was a poor recompence for the loss of so great a commander as duke Schomberg, who thus fell in the field of honour, at the age of eighty-two, after a long life replete with military glory. Besides, this accident so disconcerted our troops, that they seemed to have lost all their courage: their arms remained inactive in their hands: they gave ground apace; while the enemy, elated with this advantage, recovered fresh spirits, and returned to the charge with an ardour that seemed to insure the victory in their favour.

They were just ready to fall upon the centre, when king William, who, during the whole of the action, might be said to be every-where, since he directed all by his conduct, passed in a critical time with the left wing, consisting of the Danish, Dutch, and Inniskilliners horse, and advanced on a full trot to attack the enemy on the right, who were by this time come within musket-shot of the centre of our foot. The sight of William, advancing in that regular and undaunted manner to take them in flank, so disconcerted the Irish, that they made a sudden halt, faced about, and retreated to a little village called Dunmore, about half a mile from the pass: there they made such a vigorous stand, that the Dutch and Danish horse, though headed by the king in person, unable to sustain their fire, gave way; the Inniskilliners themselves shewed a backwardness to advance. William, shocked at this, rode up to these latter, and asked, in a sharp tone, "If this was a behaviour he ought to expect from them?" Stung by this reproach, and being acquainted that it was his majesty who now did them the honour to head them, they instantly resumed their wonted courage, and returned to the charge with redoubled vigour; the Dutch horse rallying at the same time, the enemy, after an hour's bloody conflict, were beaten back with considerable loss. In this action, lieutenant-general Hamilton, who had been the life and soul of the Irish during the whole of the fight, was taken prisoner. This accident so dispirited them, that they now abandoned the field with precipitation, though the French and Swiss guards, who acted as auxiliaries, retreated in good order; king William not thinking fit to venture the pursuit beyond the field of battle.

In the mean time young Schomberg, having been informed of his father's death, was inspired with such an ardour to revenge his fate, that nothing could oppose the fury of his arms. Inspired at once with a just resentment, and a noble thirst of honour, he drove the enemy several miles beyond the village of Duleck, strewing the ground with their dead carcases; nor can it be said when he would have desisted, had he not received positive orders from the king to give over the slaughter, and return to the place where the foot had halted, and where they remained under arms all that night.

Thus ended the famous battle of the Boyne, in which the loss on the side of king James, was generally computed at 1500 men, amongst whom were the lord Dongan, the lord Carlingford, sir Neile O'Neile, the marquis d'Hocquincourt, and several prisoners; the chief of whom was lieutenant-general Hamilton, who behaved during the fight with the most exemplary bravery, and kept the victory in suspense, till he was overpowered by numbers, and taken prisoner. On the side of the English fell about 500, an inconsiderable loss for the gain of so important a battle, had not the renowned duke Schomberg, the most illustrious general in Europe, been of the number. William himself was very near sharing the same fate; for a cannon-ball carried away a part of his boot, and broke a horse's leg close by him. All writers concur in giving king William the highest praise for the admirable conduct, courage, resolution, and presence of mind, he displayed throughout this memorable action; and the Irish themselves are said to have declared, "That if the English would change king with them, they would fight the battle over again."

As for James, he remained an inactive spectator of an action, on the success of which every thing

dear to a king or a man of honour depended. During the whole fight, he stood with some squadrons of horse upon the hill of Dunmore, till the count de Lausun, after the retreat of the French and Swiss troops, came up to him; and representing to his majesty that he was in imminent danger of being surrounded, desired him to think of an instant retreat. This advice James readily took; and being attended by the regiment of Sarsfield, he marched off to Duleck, and from thence in all haste to Dublin. When he came there he immediately assembled the magistrates and council of the city, and in a short speech resigned them to the fortune of the victor. He complained of the cowardice of the Irish, by whom he said he had been betrayed: he declared his resolution of quitting the kingdom immediately; and as, he said, it had often been debated, in case the fortune of the field should declare against his arms, whether, upon deserting the city of Dublin, the same should not be fired? he did therefore charge them on their allegiance, that they should neither plunder it nor destroy it in any manner, which in all kingdoms would be deemed an act of brutal barbarity, and might be believed to be done by his orders; and if done, there would be little mercy to be expected from an enraged enemy.

After a stay of one night in Dublin, the next morning he set out for Waterford, attended by the duke of Berwick his natural son, the earl of Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis: there he went on board a vessel which he had ordered sir Patrick Trant, the commissioner of the Irish revenue, to hold in readiness for him in case of a defeat, and getting safely over to France, fixed his residence at St. Germain's. He had no sooner left Dublin, than it was abandoned by all the Papists of any consideration; the Protestants assumed the government of the city, and sent an account of these transactions to William, accompanied with a petition, entreating him to honour that capital with his presence. The king readily complied with their request; and after detaching Mr. de la Melionere with a sufficient force to reduce Drogheda, which he speedily effected, his majesty set out at the head of his army on the 4th day of July (three days after the battle) for Dublin. On the 6th he made his triumphal entry into that capital; and being Sunday, he immediately repaired to the cathedral, where he returned God thanks for his victory, and heard a sermon preached by the learned Dr. King, afterwards archbishop of Dublin.

William's next step was to publish a declaration of pardon to all the common people, who either remained at home, or who having fled from their dwellings, should return to their places of abode by the first day of August, provided they delivered up their arms to such justices of peace as his majesty should appoint: but with regard to those desperate leaders of the rebellion, who had violated the laws of the kingdom, called in the French, authorized the depredations which had been committed upon the Protestants, and rejected the gracious pardon offered to them in the king's proclamation published on the 22d of February, 1689; as his majesty was now in a condition to make them sensible of their error, he left them entirely to the event of war, unless by evident demonstrations of their repentance they should deserve his mercy, which should never be refused to those who were truly truly penitent*." On the tenth of the month, the king issued a proclamation, reducing, to its intrinsic value, the brass money which James had coined, and which he had raised to three hundred times its real worth.

It is now time to turn our attention towards England, and take a view of the transactions there during the king's absence. The queen, who had been left regent, soon found that she stood in need of all her prudence and discretion to preserve her authority. Her council, which was a mixture of Whigs and Tories, by their perpetual jarrings embarrassed all public affairs; the French threatened the nation with an invasion from abroad, and the Jacobites were continually at work to stir up insurrections at home. In the midst of this critical and alarming situation, Mary behaved with a spirit and resolution little common to her sex; and her conduct was the more admired, as it was generally known that the king had been always upon the reserve with her in what related to public affairs. As soon as she heard the king was safely landed in Ireland, she began to exercise the power vested in her by parliament in two seasonable proclamations; one "commanding all Papists, and reputed Papists, forthwith to depart the cities of London and Westminster, and from within ten miles of the same;" the other "for the confining of popish recusants to a distance not exceeding five miles of their respective dwellings."

Advice arriving of a French fleet being ready to sail from Brest, in order to make a descent upon our coasts, admiral Herbert earl of Torrington, who then lay in the Downs, had orders to sail directly for Portsmouth, and there get together such a number of ships as might render him sufficiently strong to go in quest of the enemy, and prevent their design. While the admiral lay at St. Helen's, he received advice from Weymouth, that the French had entered the Channel with seventy-eight ships of war and two fire-ships; upon which he called a council of war to determine what was to be done. He had been lately joined by a squadron of Dutch men of war; but several ships that he expected from Plymouth, had been prevented from joining him by the contrary wind: he thought himself not strong enough to encounter the French, as his own and the Dutch fleet combined did not amount to more than fifty-six sail; but the very day that he called the council, he received express orders from the queen to hazard an engagement at all events, rather than suffer the enemy to proceed up the Channel, all the ports to the eastward being destitute of any shipping to defend them, occasioned by an ill-timed compliment paid by William to the king of Spain, at whose request he had sent admiral Ruffel with a large squadron to convoy that prince's young bride, sister to the queen of Portugal, from Holland to the Groyne.

Lord Torrington, in consequence of these orders from court, put to sea with the combined squadron of England and Holland, with a view to intercept the French at the back of the Isle of Wight, should they attempt to sail up the Channel. The French fleet soon came in sight; and on the 30th of June, the day before the battle of the Boyne, the two fleets engaged near Beachy-Head, on the coast of Sussex. The Dutch squadron, which composed the van, began the engagement about nine in the morning; but their courage being greater than their seamanship, they advanced too far out of the line: however, at the first they had the advantage, the French flying before them. Our blue squadron engaged with great bravery; but admiral Torrington kept his line, and continued to fight at a distance. The French, observing the Dutch had advanced so far out of the line, collected all their force, and hemmed them in on all sides; and, though they fought with great valour, did them considerable damage; and their whole squadron would in all probability have perished (not being in the least seconded by the English under lord Torrington), had not their admiral, Calembourg ordered them to drop their anchors while their sails were all up, there being at that time but very little wind. This manœuvre was not noticed by the French, who were now carried away by the tide, whilst the others lay still; and thus, in a short time, the Dutch were out of danger, after having lost Dick and Brackel, their two rear-admirals, with a great number of men, and being obliged to sink several of their ships, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. In this action the English lost two ships, two of their captains, and about four hundred men. On the next day, in the afternoon, the English admiral called a council of war, in which it was resolved to preserve the remains of the combined fleets by a retreat, and to destroy what disabled ships they had with them, rather than hazard another engagement by protecting them, should the enemy attempt a pursuit. Accordingly Torrington retreated without much interruption to the mouth of the Thames, while the French, after a stay of about five weeks in the Channel, during which they insulted our coasts and burnt the small town of Tintmouth, with several merchant ships in the harbour, retired to their own ports, and were no more seen in the Channel this year. Both the Dutch and our blue squadron, the only ships of ours that were engaged, complained much of Torrington's behaviour; and it was a general opinion, that if the whole fleet had come up to a close fight, we must have beat the French: and considering how far they were from Brest, and that our squadron at Plymouth lay between them and home, a victory might have had great consequences. Both admirals, indeed, were almost equally blamed; ours for not fighting, and the French for not pursuing his victory†. Torrington, on his arrival at London, was deprived of his command, and sent prisoner to the Tower; and commissioners‡ were appointed to examine the particulars of his conduct.

The news of the defeat of our fleet, and of the French lording it in our seas, no sooner reached London, but every mind was filled with the most alarming apprehensions: nothing but a descent was talked of, and the Jacobites exulted in the destruction of a government so obnoxious to them.

‡ These were the lord-president, the lord-steward, the lord-chamberlain; the earls of Pembroke, Nottingham, Monmouth, and Marlborough; Sir John Lowther, vice-chamberlain and first commissioner of the treasury, and Mr. Edward Ruffel. Of these the lord-president and the earl of Nottingham had the chief management of affairs, which made the Whigs dissatisfied with the nomination. Tindal, from MS letter of Mr. Warre to sir W. Colt.

To do the queen justice, she behaved in this emergency with admirable spirit and discretion: she betrayed not the least signs of fear: she made use of every precaution to guard against her enemies, both within and without the kingdom: the principal sea-ports were put in as good a posture of defence as the time would permit: proper orders were issued for refitting and augmenting the navy: she gave directions for raising the militia of the western counties, in order to oppose any attempts that might be made in that quarter; and to strike the greater terror into the domestic enemies of the government, she issued a proclamation for apprehending several disaffected noblemen and gentlemen, who were either suspected or accused of having held correspondence with king James and his party, to disturb and destroy the peace of the realm, and had adhered to their majesties enemies in the present invasion. While the queen was thus wisely and vigorously executing the function of the high department she filled, she had the satisfaction to find her conduct approved by the majority of the nation, and to receive several addresses from the city of London, and many other respectable counties and corporations in the kingdom, who all declared their resolution to defend and preserve her and her royal consort, and their government, with the hazard of their lives, and to the utmost of their power. As for the earl of Torrington, he continued in the Tower till the next session of parliament, when he was ordered to be tried by a court-martial on the nineteenth of December. The president was sir Ralph Delaval, who had acted as vice-admiral of the blue squadron in the engagement. It is asserted by many that the trial was conducted with much partiality; but as the proceedings were never published, we have nothing certain on which to form our decision: we only know that the earl was acquitted, and that the king was so offended thereat as immediately to dismiss him from his service, together with several other sea-officers who had appeared most to favour his cause; and that we were kind enough to repair the losses of the Dutch squadron at our own charge. The agitations occasioned throughout the nation by our ill success at sea, were not a little quieted by the news of the victory gained by the king on the banks of the Boyne: the Jacobites were struck with dismay: they hung down their heads, a sudden check was now put to all their proceedings, and they remained quiet, from a conscious inability of being able to do hurt, while the friends of the Revolution resumed their courage, and enjoyed in their turns the mortification of their adversaries. The queen and council sent to the king, pressing him to come over with all possible haste to England, to compleat by his presence the tranquilization of the government here.

As the news of the victory of the Boyne had been a great comfort to the queen and the English nation, under the distress raised by the misfortunes at sea; so king William, on the day he entered Dublin, had the news of the ill success of his fleet to temper the joy his own good fortune might give him. He had taken all the papers of his father-in-law to Tyrconnel, by which he discovered a design that had been formed against his life. It seems that the enterprize was to have been undertaken by one Jones, before William undertook the Irish expedition: the attempt however was never made, and the conspirator is supposed to have eloped with a large sum of money, which he had procured from Tyrconnel, and Douglas the attorney-general of Ireland, not chusing to incur the guilt and danger of the enterprize he was put upon. A paper was drawn up of this whole affair, in order to be published both in England and Ireland: but it is thought that their majesties, tender of the character of James, which must have greatly suffered, from the imputation of having countenanced so shameful a design, caused it to be suppressed.

Count Lausun and general Sarsfield having still a good body of forces under their command, with which they retreated towards Limerick, the Irish did not shew any disposition to submit; whereupon king William decamped on the ninth of July from Finglass, in the neighbourhood of Dublin, and divided his army into two bodies; with the greater of which he marched to Crumlin, three miles on the south of Dublin, and sent the other, consisting of four regiments of horse, two of dragoons, and ten of infantry, under the command of lieutenant-general Douglas, towards Athlone, who invested that city on the seventeenth, and sent to colonel Grace, the governor for king James, to surrender. Grace was an old and a valiant soldier, of approved fidelity to the master he served, and made no other reply than by firing a pistol, and bidding the trumpeter tell the person that sent him, that those were his terms. Douglas therefore resolved to attack the place; but as it was strongly fortified by nature, and defended by a good castle, and Douglas was deficient in artillery, he was constrained to raise the siege, after a fortnight's fruitless attempt. In the mean time, king William having committed the government of Dublin to brigadier Trelawney, proceeded with the rest of his army westward, and at Carlow detached the duke of Ormond to take possession of Kilkenny, while the army encamped at Carrick; from whence, on the twenty-first of July, major-general Kirk was dispatched against Waterford with two regiments and a party of horse. The garrison surrendered, on condition of being allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, and were conducted to Mallow. The fort of Duncannon, which commands the entrance of the harbour of Waterford, submitted on the same terms. Here the lord Dover and lord George Howard, who had been excepted from the bill of indemnity, petitioned and obtained the king's pardon. On the twenty-seventh of July the king left the camp at Carrick, and went to Dublin, in order to take shipping for England, in pursuance of the request before-mentioned from the queen and council: but here he found other letters of a different and more pleasing tenor, informing him that every thing was now quiet at home, and that his presence was no longer so pressingly necessary. Hereupon his majesty went to Chapel Izard, where he continued for some time, and during his stay published a second pardon, confirming and extending the former: but this declaration had very little effect upon the Irish, who, spirited up by their priests, and elated with the news of the bad success of our fleet against the French, still held out, in hopes that the distractions in England would soon oblige king William to return thither.

His majesty, however, satisfied by his late advices that his domestic enemies were kept in awe, and that the French had retired into their own harbours, resolved not to quit Ireland till he had effectually reduced the Jacobite party, there to perfect obedience, or at least to an inability of doing him any prejudice. With this view he determined upon undertaking the siege of Limerick, which was defended by monsieur Boisseleau, the governor for king James; and the duke of Berwick and colonel Sarsfield, who with their troops had thrown themselves into that place after the defeat of the Boyne, and James's flight, acted as inferior officers. On the ninth of August the king invested the town with his whole army, and immediately sent a trumpeter to summon the governor. Tho' the place was extremely strong, and the garrison very numerous and healthy, there were many, as well of the soldiers as of the inhabitants, who were for capitulating; but the governor, the duke of Berwick, and Sarsfield, opposed it with such vehemence that the others acquiesced, and it was determined to defend the place to the last extremity: upon which monsieur Boisseleau sent the trumpeter back with this answer, "That he imagined he could not more effectually gain the good opinion of the prince of Orange, than by vigorously defending the town, which his royal master had entrusted to his care." Every thing was now prepared for the siege: the king the same evening gave orders for a party of dragoons to pass the river Shannon, at a ford about two miles above the town, which was effected by the valour and conduct of general Ginckle, who, after defeating a body of Irish that guarded the pass, crossed over the next morning with about five thousand horse and foot; but before the siege could be regularly formed, colonel Sarsfield, hearing that the king's artillery was in its way from Kilkenny to the camp, resolved to attempt the taking or destroying it. With this view he passed the Shannon in the night of the 10th, with a body of five or six hundred horse and dragoons, and lurked all the next day in the hills; and having notice that the artillery was a little on this side of Cullen, and that the troops that conveyed it had halted to rest themselves, and were then perfectly unprepared for an attack, he took with him guides who brought him to the very spot, where he fell upon them before they were aware, killed several of the men, split the cannon, destroyed the carriages, waggons, and ammunition, and returned safely to Limerick.

The news of this adventure was very unwelcome in the king's camp, where it gave birth to a warm dispute between duke Schomberg (son to the late marshal) and the earl of Portland, the former accusing the latter and count Solmes of having neglected to send in time a detachment of sufficient strength to secure the train. This quarrel however was soon made up, and the siege pursued. On the seventeenth the trenches were opened, and a battery was raised with some cannon brought from Waterfield. Both sides now exerted their utmost vigor and resolution in the attack and defence of the place, during which the king had several narrow escapes for his life; and it is universally allowed, that on all military occasions William's personal courage was more conspicuous than his prudence or caution. On the twenty-sixth of August, the engineers having assured the king that there was a sufficient breach made in the walls for an attack, he detached monsieur de la Barthe, a brave French (protestant) officer, with nine companies of grenadiers, besides an hundred French officers and volunteers, to begin the attack; which was performed with such bravery and success, that in spite of all the opposition of the besieged, the assailants effected a lodgment on the redoubt or counterscarp: but these brave men not being properly seconded, through the negligence of count Solmes and count Nassau, the enemy returned to the charge with redoubled numbers, and a most bloody and obstinate dispute of four hours ensued; but in the end our troops were repulsed, with the loss of one thousand two hundred men, either killed or mortally wounded on the spot. Notwithstanding this check, it is said that the king would not have quitted the siege, had not the season of the year, and the nature of the country, which in those parts is very subject to be overflowed, proved so bad, that the soldiers could no longer remain in the trenches, half filled with water; which inconvenience no art or industry could remedy. Orders were therefore issued on the thirtieth of August for sending off the heavy baggage and artillery; and the next day the army decamped, and marched towards Clonmel, without meeting the least disturbance from the enemy, either in the decamping or the march. The king now determined to return to England; and having appointed the lord Sidney and Thomas Coningsby, esq. (afterwards earl of that name) lords justices of Ireland, and entrusted the command of the army to count Solmes, his majesty set sail from Waterford with prince George of Denmark, and some other persons of distinction, on the fifth of September, and next day arrived safe in King's-Road near Bristol, and on the ninth got to Windsor, where he was received by the queen with unspeakable joy.

Great was the exultation of king James's friends in Ireland on occasion of the raising the siege of Limerick, and the departure of William for his English dominions. They were still in possession of several good towns besides Limerick, and their army was very numerous; so that they were filled with the most sanguine hopes of restoring their old master to the sovereignty of Ireland at least: but how were their expectations dashed by the arrival of an English fleet before Corke harbour, on the twenty-first of September, with a body of forces under the command of the earl of Marlborough! It seems that this nobleman, after the French fleet had retired into their harbours, and ours had repaired the damage it sustained in the engagement, had proposed employing about five thousand troops, who then lay inactive at home, in an attempt upon Cork* and Kinsale†, in Ireland, which he doubted not of taking, with the assistance of such troops as the king might be able to spare him from the army. This proposal was approved of, and the earl sent over, who on his arrival found that his majesty, who had been made acquainted with the intended expedition, had left orders for an additional body of five thousand men, under the duke of Wirtemberg and major-general Scrivenmore, to reinforce his lordship, and assist him in the reduction of the before-mentioned places.

* A capital city of a county of the same name, and province of Munster, in Ireland, situated on the river Lee. It has a good harbour, and is, next to Dublin, the best trading place in that kingdom.

The earl having landed his men, though with some opposition, in the neighbourhood of Corke, was soon after joined by the reinforcement from the main army; but a dispute happened between the duke of Wirtemberg and Marlborough concerning the chief command, which both of them claimed; the former as due to his rank of a sovereign prince, the other as being the elder officer, and commanding the troops of his own nation. The matter, however, was at length compromised by the interposition of brigadier la Melionere; it being agreed, that the earl should command the first day and the duke the next, and so alternately, during the expedition. The dispute thus adjusted, the trenches were opened, and the batteries played with such fury, that a breach was soon effected in the walls, which brought the besieged to demand a parley; but colonel M'Ellicut, the governor of Corke, not liking the conditions of surrender proposed by the king's generals, hostilities were renewed with double vigour. The duke of Grafton, who served in the expedition as a volunteer, as he was marching on to the attack of the breach, had the misfortune to receive a wound in the shoulder by a cannon bullet, of which he soon after died greatly regretted, as being of all king Charles the Second's children, the person of whom there was the greatest hope. Bishop Burnet says, "he was brave, and probably would have become a great sea-commander." The main breach being now judged practicable, all things were prepared for a general assault on the twenty-eighth of September, when the besieged not chusing to incur all the horrors of a storm, colonel M'Ellicut thought proper to surrender himself and garrison prisoners of war. Besides the governor and colonel Rycart, there were taken in the place the earls of Clancarty and Tyrone.

This success inspired our generals and their little army with fresh ardour. The same day that the earl of Marlborough entered Corke, he detached brigadier Villiers with a body of horse and dragoons to summon Kinsale; and the next day advanced with the rest of his troops to enforce that demand. The place was in a very indifferent posture of defence, and therefore, after making some shew of resistance for about a week or ten days, sir Edward Scot the governor surrendered on honourable terms. The earl of Marlborough having thus, in little more than a month, accomplished the reduction of those two important maritime towns, by which he effectually deprived the French of all communication with this side of the island, and confined the remains of the refractory Irish to the province of Ulster, where they could not subsist without great difficulty, returned with his prisoners to England, and arrived at Kensington the twenty-eighth of October, where he was received by their majesties in a manner agreeable to the services he had done the state.

While these things were transacting, count Lauzun, with the French troops, remained in the neighbourhood of Galway (a county in the province of Connaught in the west of Ireland) without attempting any thing. They were, in fact, heartily weary of a service they now with good reason looked upon as desperate, and the count sent pressing remonstrances to be recalled: his request was complied with. A squadron of ships were sent to bring him and his men off, in which he sailed about the beginning of October, leaving the command in chief of the Irish forces to the duke of Berwick, which was afterwards transferred to Mr. de St. Ruth. The duke of Tyrconnel accompanied him over, and applied to the French court for a farther supply of arms, cloaths, and ammunition, for the Irish army, engaging for them, if thus encouraged, that they would still continue to support the cause of king James. This remonstrance did not a little prejudice to the reputation of Lauzun, who was openly accused of having too precipitately abandoned the cause of that unhappy monarch. In the mean while, the Irish formed themselves into a number of freebooting parties, which acquired the name of Rapparees, who committed a thousand outrages on the defenceless inhabitants of the kingdom, while the troops of king William indulged themselves at ease in their quarters, nor once concerned themselves about the protection of the poor people, who suffered all the calamities of lawless rapine and cruelty. Thus ended the campaign in Ireland. Let us now take a short view of the affairs on the continent.

By this time the grand alliance which William had formed against France was farther strengthened by the accession of the duke of Savoy, who, renouncing the neutrality he had hitherto observed, concluded a league with the emperor and the king of Spain, and openly engaged in the general confederacy. Lewis XIV. was no sooner informed of the engagements which the duke had entered into, than he sent twelve thousand men into Piedmont, under the conduct of that brave and able officer monsieur Catinat, afterwards marshal of France, with orders to demand of the duke, as a pledge of his fidelity, that he would deliver up to France his troops, together with Verrue, and the citadel of Turin, the capital of his dominions. The duke, confounded with this unforeseen stroke, endeavoured to amuse his enemy by submissions and offers, till he could procure assistance from the emperor and Spain; but finding those two powers only fed him with promises, he solicited assistance from the States-general and king William, to whom he sent an ambassador in October this year, to congratulate him on his accession to the English throne. William, highly pleased with the accession of so valuable an ally, received his compliment with great civility, and promised to employ his utmost endeavours for his assistance. The French king, however, who was not to be deceived by fair promises, had before this sent orders to Catinat to begin hostilities in Piedmont and Savoy, where the duke exerted his utmost endeavours to oppose the torrent which threatened the ruin of all his dominions. Victor Amadeus II. duke of Savoy, was (says M. de Voltaire, in his Age of Lewis XIV.) a wife and politic, though an unfortunate, prince:

as a general, his courage was indisputable; he always headed his own armies, and exposed his person on every occasion like a common man: no one better understood the finesses of that kind of war which is carried on in an uneven and mountainous country, such as his: he was active, vigilant, tenacious of regularity and military discipline, but sometimes guilty of errors, both as a prince and a general. He was guilty of a fatal one, in the bad manner in which he drew up his army, in presence of that of Catinat, near Saluces, or Saluzzo *, who taking advantage of his mistake, gained a compleat victory over him on the eighth of August. After this battle all Savoy, except Montmelian, submitted to the French. Catinat then marched into Piedmont, forced the enemy's entrenchments near Susa, took that town, together with Villafranca, Montalban, Nice, deemed impregnable, Viellano, and Carmagniola, and returned afterwards to Montmelian, of which he made himself master in the spring of the following year, 1691, after an obstinate siege.

Lewis XIV. had this same year (1690) another army in Flanders, under the command of the duke of Luxembourg, who had been a pupil in the art of war to the great Condé, whom he much resembled in his character, having a fiery genius, a prompt execution, a quick discernment, and a mind greedy of knowledge, but too extensive and irregular. The allies dreading the power of France, which was daily increasing both by sea and land, resolved that the army of the States-general, under prince Waldeck, should oppose Luxembourg, while the elector of Brandenburg should observe the motions of monsieur Boufflers, who commanded a third army for Lewis upon the banks of the Moselle in Germany: but before the troops of Brandenburg could be assembled, Boufflers found means to encamp his forces between the Sambre and the Meuse, and thereby opened a free communication between his own army and that of Luxembourg. Prince Waldeck, sensible how much it behoved him to keep the French on the other side of the Sambre, detached the count de Berlo with one thousand five hundred horse, to observe whether the French attempted to pass that river. The count having advanced as far as the village of Fleurus, found that a good part of the French army had already passed the Sambre, whereof he immediately sent notice to prince Waldeck; but it was too late: for being surrounded on every side, he was defeated and slain; and the next day (June 30) being the same on which king William obtained the victory at the Boyne, the duke of Luxembourg attacked the main body under prince Waldeck, which, after a very obstinate engagement, was obliged to give way, leaving about four thousand six hundred men dead upon the spot. The enemy took about four thousand prisoners; but they bought their victory dearly, their loss being equal, if not greater than that of the Dutch. The loss of this battle is said to have been occasioned by the cowardice of the Dutch horse, who abandoned their foot at the first charge: but never any infantry made so brave a retreat as those under prince Waldeck; for notwithstanding the battle was fought in a plain champaign country, and they were charged both in front and in flank by the enemy, they made such an impression upon the French by their regular, undaunted, and uniform fire, that the latter durst not attempt to make the least pursuit, but suffered the Dutch to march off with the utmost composure. This was the only action in Flanders this campaign.

In the spring of this year the emperor Leopold's son Joseph was, by the electoral college, advanced to the dignity of king of the Romans: but his affairs suffered an irreparable loss in the death of the brave duke of Lorraine, which happened suddenly, after a few hours illness only, on the eighth of April, aged forty-seven years, not without suspicion of having been poisoned by the procurement of the French monarch, whose boundless ambition he had constantly and courageously opposed. We are, however, to be cautious how we too readily believe such reports without good authority. The duke himself, in a note he wrote to the emperor a little before he expired, expressed himself as if he thought he had met with foul play: "I am dying, says he: I know not whether I am paying by my death the ordinary debt of nature; or whether I am sacrificed to the unjust and ambitious views of a crown which has declared itself an implacable enemy to me and my family *." The command of the imperial army was, upon his demise, given to the elector of Bavaria, who was presently after joined by the elector of Saxony and his two sons. The dauphin had crossed the Rhine at the head of forty thousand men, with a design to force his way into Wirtemberg; but the imperial general, by his conduct and carriage, defeated his attempt, and obliged him to remain on the defensive during the remaining part of the campaign. After this account of the foreign transactions which relate to king William, as head of the confederacy against France, it is now time to return to England.

King William, on his return from his Irish expedition, was congratulated upon his victory at the Boyne, and his other successes in that kingdom, by the city of London; and addresses of the same tenor came up from most of the towns and counties in England. This could not fail to be highly pleasing to the king, who, so far from thinking of indulging himself in an easy inactivity during the rest of the year, had actually formed the design of going over to Flanders, to put himself at the head of the allied army; but the season being now so far advanced, as to render it necessary for the troops soon to take to winter quarters, his majesty laid aside his design for the present, but at the same time determined to call the parliament together as early as possible, that they might settle the supplies for the ensuing year, and give him an opportunity of going over early in the spring to the Hague, to have an interview with the German princes, who proposed to hold a congress or meeting there, in order to concert measures for the next campaign.

Accordingly, on the second day of October the parliament met at Westminster, and was opened by a speech from the throne, wherein his majesty told them, "That he had used his best endeavours for the reduction of Ireland, in which he had met with success, and doubted not that he should have been fully possessed of that kingdom, if the supplies had been given him in time last session. He put them in mind also, that he had asked no revenue for himself, but what he had subjected to be charged for the uses of the war; recommended to them the clearing of his revenue, so as to enable him to subsist, and maintain the charge of the civil government: then addressing himself to both houses jointly, told them, that he hoped they would proceed in their deliberations with spirit and concord; and that whoever should go about to divert their attention from the important subjects he had recommended to them, could neither be his friends, nor friends to the kingdom *."

The lords and commons, in answer to this speech, congratulated him separately upon his successes in Ireland, and on the queen's happy administration during his absence. The commons particularly told him, "That he too freely exposed his invaluable life, upon which the whole protestant interest of Europe depended; concluding, that they should be ever ready to assist him to the utmost of their power: and as the best and truest way of expressing their gratitude, would endeavour effectually to support his government against all his enemies †." As a proof of the sincerity of these assurances, the very same day these addresses were presented, the commons voted, pursuant to an estimate laid before them of the next year's charges, a supply of four millions (the largest sum that had ever been asked by a king of England) for the support of the fleet and army, in order to compleat the reduction of Ireland, and for the more vigorous carrying on the war against France. Among other taxes for raising this sum, one hundred thirty-seven thousand six hundred forty-one pounds per month, at three shillings in the pound, was laid upon lands: the excise upon beer and ale was doubled: a duty was laid on East-India goods and foreign-wrought silks, and several other goods imported; and a duty was imposed upon new wines and spirits of the first extraction. A supply of five hundred and seventy thousand pounds was voted to be raised on these additional duties, for building seventeen third-rate ships, of sixty guns each, besides the ships already provided to be built ‡. They also resolved that the sum of one million should be raised by the sale of forfeited estates in Ireland, and that a bill should be prepared for confiscating these estates, with a clause empowering his majesty to grant a third part of them to those who had served in the war. This clause was repealed, and many petitions were presented against the bill by creditors and heirs who had continued faithful. These petitions however were rejected by the commons, who on this occasion suffered their zeal for the service of the king, to get the better of that attention they owed to the lawful and just remonstrances of their fellow-subjects, and they unanimously passed the bill §: but when it went up to the house of lords, that august body thought it their duty fairly to examine the merit of those petitions: this took up so long time, that the bill was dropped for the present session.

The excise-bill being ready, the king came to the house on the twenty-fifth of November, and gave it the royal assent: after which he made a speech to both houses, and thanked them for the large supplies they were raising, desiring however that they would use all possible dispatch, because his presence was required early in the following year at the Hague: at the same time he again put them in mind of providing for the civil list. His majesty coming again to the house on the twentieth of December, passed the act for laying a duty upon East-India goods, the act for punishing mutiny and desertion, and some others: and on the fifth of January the king, being impatient to be at the congress in Holland, came to the house, and gave the royal assent to the rest of the bills of supply, together with a bill for appointing commissioners to state the public accounts, in which there had been great mismanagement; to a bill for raising the militia; to a bill for the relief of insolvent debtors; and to another to prevent vexatious suits against such as acted in defence of his majesty and the kingdom. After which the king closed the session with a speech, in which he assured both houses, that he entertained the most grateful sense of the liberality and dispatch with which they had granted the public supplies, which should be faithfully employed in the services for which they were allotted: that he would make no grant of any of the forfeited estates in Ireland, till that matter should be settled in parliament, to the satisfaction of all parties: that he hoped they would take care to propagate, in their several counties, the same principles of zeal and attachment to his government, which they had so eminently displayed in parliament: and that he trusted the good understanding between him and his subjects, would be more than sufficient to defeat the designs of their secret foes, and the attempts of their open and avowed enemies. Then the lord chief-justice Atkins declared it was his majesty's pleasure that the house should adjourn themselves to the twenty-first day of March ||.

During this session of parliament, a thanksgiving was ordered to be observed on the nineteenth of October, for the successes in Ireland, and particular prayers appointed to be used on every Wednesday and Friday during the war with France. On the fifteenth of the same month, the princess of Denmark was brought to bed of a daughter, baptized by the name of Mary, who died soon after. On the fourteenth of the same month a transaction happened, which greatly engaged the attention of the public. Captain James Campbell, brother to the earl of Argyle in Scotland, by the assistance of Archibald Montgomery, esquire, and sir John Johnston, seized and forcibly married Miss Mary Wharton, a rich heiress of thirteen years of age; for which sir John Johnston was condemned to be hanged, and an act of parliament was afterwards obtained by the relations of the young lady, to set aside the marriage between her and Mr. Campbell. For further particulars of this affair, the reader may consult the fourth volume of the State Trials. And here we must not pass unnoticed an attempt that was made by the Whig party, to revive the old impeachments against the marquis of Caermarthen (formerly earl of Danby) who had rendered himself extremely obnoxious to that party by his steady attachment to the Tories. This scheme was formed and conducted by fourteen leading men, of whom the earl of Shrewsbury was the chief. Their design however came to nought; for the earl having performed an acceptable piece of service to the government about this time, in detecting some designs set on foot by the Jacobite party to disturb the peace of the kingdom, the affair was dropped *.

I shall close the occurrences of this year with a short account of some material transactions relating to the increase of our colonies, trade, and manufactures. In this year, 1690, general Codrington, commander in chief of the English Leeward Islands, by the help of succours from England, joined to the regiments he had raised in those islands, retook from the French the island of St. Christopher's, in the West Indies, sending away the inhabitants to Martinico and Hispaniola, and peopling the place with our own subjects: he likewise retook the isle of St. Eustatia, of which the French had, the year before, dispossessed the Dutch; as also the isles of St. Martin and St. Bartholomew. He afterwards made an attempt upon the island of Guadeloupe; but in that he miscarried.

In this same year sir William Phipps, with a fleet and land-forces from New England, took the fort and town of Port Royal (since called Annapolis Royal), in the bay of Fundy, from whence the French had so greatly distressed our trade in America, by means of their privateers, as to acquire that place the appellation of the Dunkirk of America. King William, however, was obliged to restore it to France, by the treaty of Ryswic, and it remained in their hands till the following reign.

Until about this year there was scarce any other kind of paper made in England but the worst crown fort; but the war with France occasioning high duties to be laid on foreign paper, the French protestant refugees, in concert with our own few paper-makers, now began to manufacture white writing and printing paper, which in length of time has been brought to so great perfection, both for beauty and substance, that we now import only certain kinds of Genoa and Dutch paper. How great a saving this proved to the nation, may partly be conceived from what is affirmed by writers well versed in those subjects, viz. that to France alone, from whom we now take none, we paid annually for this article to the amount of one hundred thousand pounds †. Besides the many other benefits arising to England from the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, it proved of infinite service to the English colonies in America; and particularly in this year, when king William settled some hundreds of French refugee families on the south side of James's River, in Virginia, above the Falls, where they have since much improved that naturally fine country *. But to resume the chain of our history.

King William, having obtained the supplies he desired of parliament, as hath been already related, embarked for Holland on the sixteenth of January, 1691, in order to assist at the congress of the confederate princes and states, appointed to be held at the Hague, to concert measures for the defence of the liberties of Europe against the encroachments of France. He was attended thither by the dukes of Norfolk and Ormond, the earls of Devon, Dorset, Essex, Nottingham, Scarborough, Portland, Monmouth, and Selkirk, the bishop of London, the duke of Schomberg and his brother count Schomberg, and several other persons of distinction: he was convoyed by twelve men of war, under the command of rear-admiral Rooke. On the eighteenth, in the morning, they came off Goree island: the weather being very thick and hazy, they hailed a fishing-vessel, which passed close by them, and asked the master what distance he thought they were from the shore; who replied, about a league and half: upon this the king, who was impatient to be on land, resolved to quit his yacht, and put off in a boat. Accordingly three large ones being manned, his majesty got into one, attended by the duke of Ormond, the earl of Portland, the lord-steward, and the lord-chamberlain, and was followed in the two others by mynheers Overkirk and Zuylestein, and other attendants upon his person. There was no doubt made but that his majesty would land in an hour or two; but the sea being rough, and the fog growing thicker, they quickly lost sight both of the shore and their own fleet; and night coming on, they were exposed, in very severe weather, to the dangers of the sea, and of falling into the hands of the enemy, for above eighteen hours, during which the king and all his attendants were many times in imminent danger of perishing. Providence, however, was pleased to order it otherwise, and about eight the next morning, the boats reached the Goree: here his majesty and his retinue went ashore, and, after taking some refreshment, of which they stood in great need, took boat again, and, about two in the afternoon, arrived at Oranien-Haak, in the neighbourhood of Maesland Sluys: at Hinnslaar-Dyke, a few miles from thence, he was met and complimented by the deputies of the States, who conducted him to the Hague.

On his arrival in that capital of the United Provinces, the states-general, the states of Holland,

* On the fifteenth of November the king ordered a new commission to pass the great-seal, constituting the lord Godolphin, sir John Lowther, Mr. Richard Hampden, sir Stephen Fox, Mr. Thomas Pelham, commissioners of his majesty's treasury. About a month after, his majesty disposed of the vacant bishoprics of Ireland, and appointed sir Charles Porter to be lord-chancellor of that kingdom, and one of the lords justices, in the room of the lord viscount Sidney, who was recalled to be made one of the secretaries of state, on the twenty-sixth of December: in the beginning of which month, colonel John Cuts was made baron Cuts of Gowran, in the kingdom of Ireland. On the thirtieth of the same month George-William duke of Zell, eldest prince of the house of Brunswick and Lunenburg, was made a knight of the garter, an honour which just before had been conferred upon the elector of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Prussia: and on the first of January, 1691, sir John Trevor, speaker of the house of commons, and first commissioner of the great-seal, was admitted into the privy-council.

‡ By the return of the books of the hearth-duty at Lady-day 1690, the number of houses in England and Wales were, one million three hundred and ninety-one thousand two hundred and fifteen, which, at six persons to a house, makes the number of souls seven millions nine hundred and fifteen thousand two hundred and ninety, or very near eight millions; so that reckoning one million and a half in Scotland, and two millions in Ireland, which may be fairly done, there will appear to have been at that time at least eleven millions of souls in the three kingdoms. My author makes the houses in Yorkshire to be one hundred and twenty one thousand fifty-two; in Wales, seventy-seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-one; and in London, Westminster, and Middlesex, one hundred and eleven thousand two hundred and fifteen. See D'Avenant's Essay on Ways and Means of supplying the War. London 1695.

the council of state, and other colleges waited on him with their compliments and congratulations for his safety, after so great toil and hazard to his royal person. As his sudden arrival had prevented the solemnity of a formal reception, he was solicited to make a public entry, which was accordingly performed on the twenty-sixth of the month, with great pomp: triumphal arches were erected in the several principal streets through which he was to pass, with inscriptions expressing his noble achievements; the burghers appeared under arms, the cannon were fired, and the evening concluded with bonfires, illuminations, and other demonstrations of joy. After this ceremony was over, his majesty took his seat as stadtholder in the assembly of the states, when he gave that respectable body a brief account of his successes in England and Ireland, since he last parted from them; and concluded with the warmest assurances of ever continuing their good friend and ally. The heer Winchels, president of the assembly, then returned his majesty an answer, in the name of the rest, conceived in the most grateful and affectionate terms. After which the princes and other great men, who were already arrived to assist at the approaching conferences, were introduced, and paid their compliments to his majesty.

And now was opened the most glorious congress that ever yet appeared of Christian princes and ministers, who assembled upon the most noble of all designs, that of opposing the encroachments of arbitrary power and oppression, and securing the peace, tranquility, and liberty of a whole continent.

The ambassadors and foreign ministers present, were, from the emperor, the counts de Wenditsgratz and Borks, with the chevalier de Campecht; from the king of Spain, don Emanuel de Colonna; from the king of Denmark, the count de Rebenklam and M. Centhe; from the king of Sweden, count Oxenstiern; from the king of Poland, M. Moreau; from the elector of Bavaria, the baron de Boomgarten and M. Prielmeyere; from the elector of Brandenburg, Mess. Van Dieft and Smettau; from the elector of Saxony, M. Haxhausen; from the elector of Treves, the baron de Leyen and M. Champagne; from the elector of Mentz, Mess. Talberg and Meyers; from the elector of Cologne, the general and baron Berusaw and M. Soalmaker; from the elector Palatine, M. Hertermans; from the duke of Savoy, the count de Pielat and the president de la Tour; from the duke of Zell, Mr. Ziger; from the bishop of Munster, M. de Nort; from the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, the baron Gortz and M. Reppelaar; from the duke of Wolfenbottle, the baron Crosek; from the duke of Hanover, M. Klekk; from the duke of Holstein Gottorp, M. Tourken; and from the prince of Liege, counsellor Mean: of king William's subjects, besides those already mentioned by name, who attended him out of England, were the lords Drumlanrigg and Dursley, and others. Many of the princes who had ministers at the congress, assisted also in person thereat, as the reader will find in the note at the bottom of the page*.

King William, as the soul of this grand alliance, opened the congress with a pathetic speech, in which he laid before them "the imminent danger to which they were at present exposed; plainly demonstrated the impropriety of their former conduct, and the absolute necessity of an immediate change of measures: that it was not time now to deliberate, but to act: that the enemy was already master of the principal fortresses which formed the barrier of the common liberty; and would soon be able to possess himself of all the inferior ones, if a spirit of division, selfishness, and irresolution, continued to influence them: that every one ought to consider his own interest as involved in the general good: that the enemy's forces were numerous and powerful, and, if not prevented, would carry all things like a torrent before them: that it was in vain to oppose the pretensions of injustice by unavailing complaints, unprofitable clamour, or fruitless protestations: that they were not the resolutions of a peaceable diet, nor the hopes of some men of fortune built on a sandy foundation, but powerful armies, bold enterprizes, and a prompt and vigorous execution, that must accomplish the glorious work: that all these must instantly be employed against the common enemy, if they meant to check his progress, and to snatch from his hands the liberties of Europe, which he now held subjected to a cruel and heavy yoke. He concluded with assuring them, that for his own part he would not spare his forces, credit, or person, in order to effect so noble a design, but would come in the spring at the head of his troops, faithfully to make good his royal promises."

This speech from a prince, in whom the whole confederacy placed an unbounded confidence, had so good effect, that this august assembly speedily came to a resolution of employing two hundred and twenty-two thousand men against France, of which the several princes and states were to furnish the following proportions: the king of England, twenty thousand; the emperor, twenty thousand; the king of Spain in Flanders, twenty thousand; the States-General, twenty-five thousand; the duke of Savoy, and the troops of Milan, twenty thousand; the elector of Bavaria, eighteen thousand; the elector of Saxony, twelve thousand; the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, eight thousand; the Circles of Suabia and Franconia, ten thousand; the duke of Wirtemberg, six thousand; the elector of Brandenburg, twenty thousand; the prince of Liege, six thousand; the elector-palatine, four thousand; and the prince of Lunenburg, sixteen thousand.

* The electors of Brandenburg and Bavaria; the dukes of Lunenburg, of Zell, and of Wolfenbottle; the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; prince Christian-Louis of Brandenburg; prince Waldeck; the prince of Nassau, stadtholder of Friesland; the prince of Nassau-Saarburg, governor of Bois-le-duc; the prince of Nassau-Dillemburg; the prince of Nassau-Idstein; the duke, administrator of Wirtemberg; the two princes of Anspach; the landgrave of Hesse-D'Armstadt; the prince his brother; the duke of Saxe-Eysenach; prince Philip palatine; the duke of Zulstback; the prince of Wirtemberg-Neustadt; the prince of Wirtemberg, and the prince his brother; the duke of Courland, and prince Ferdinand his brother; the prince of Anhalt-Zeerbst; the landgrave of Homburg; three princes of Holsteinbeck; the duke of Holstein, prince of Commerci; the prince palatine of Berkenfeld: to which we may add the princess of Nassau-Friseland, the princess Radzeville, the countess of Soissons, the princess of Saxe-Eysenach, and other illustrious persons. The most remarkable of the counts were, the counts of Horn, Erbach, Tiremont, de Broca, de Gryal, d'Arco, de Rivera, de Sanfray, de Lippe, de Espense, de Fugger, de Denhof, de Carelson; with the barons of Palant and Spain, the Rhinegrave and his brother; the marquises of Castlemontayo, Castanaga governor of the Spanish Netherlands, and the generals Chauvert, d'Elwicht, Barfus, d'Autel, Valsi, &c.

These engagements however were so badly observed by several of the contracting parties, that England and Holland were forced to bear almost the whole expence and burden of the war. The next thing the assembly did, was to adjust the operations of the war, which was done among the princes themselves with such secrecy, that even their own ministers were not admitted to a knowledge of them. It is remarkable, that in this solemn interview there prevailed such an easy freedom, and such perfect unanimity and concord amongst the several princes, that none of those disputes happened on points of ceremony, which too often interrupt and retard negotiations of this kind.

The congress broke up about the beginning of March, and king William was preparing to return to England, when his departure was retarded, by advice that the French had collected all their forces, in order to take the field before the confederates could be ready to oppose them; and that Lewis in person had invested the city of Mons, accompanied by the dauphin, the dukes of Orleans and Chartres, and an army of 80,000 men. William upon this dispatched prince Waldeck to Halle, near Brussels, which was appointed for the general rendezvous of what forces could be drawn together: the king himself followed on the twenty-seventh of March, where he found an army of fifty thousand men; but, through the neglect of the Spaniards, so miserably deficient in all kind of necessaries for a march, that before the troops could be put in motion, news arrived of the reduction of the place: the governor being reduced to the last extremity, after having in vain waited for relief, was obliged to capitulate on the first of April, and surrendered the town on very honourable terms. After this disappointment, there remained nothing to require the immediate presence of king William on the continent, who therefore returned to the Hague, and embarking for England, on the 13th day of April arrived safe in London*.

Here he found, that during his absence the Jacobites had resumed their favourite scheme, in concert with France, of restoring king James. The persons chiefly concerned in this conspiracy were said to be the earl of Clarendon, the bishop of Ely, the lord viscount Preston (a Scottish peer) and his brother Mr. Graham: and William Penn the famous quaker, the lord Preston, Mr. Ashton a servant of king James's queen, and Mr. Elliot, were pitched upon to go over to France, and concert measures at the court of St. Germain's. With this view they hired a vessel of one Mr. Prat of Barkington in Essex, who, suspecting something from the eagerness the conspirators shewed to get under sail, and the high price they offered for their passage, communicated the matter to the earl of Caermarthen, who reported the same to the queen and council; whereupon proper persons were dispatched to board the vessel, which lay off Gravesend, when the three conspirators were found concealed in the hold. The lord Preston, who had letters about him from the chiefs of the conspiracy to king James, endeavoured to secrete them, but was discovered, and the papers taken from him. Upon examination they were found to contain several circumstances of intelligence, and other matters of a very treasonable and dangerous tendency. Hereupon a bill of high-treason was preferred, and found against the offenders by the grand jury. The lord Preston and Mr. Ashton were brought to their trials on the sixteenth, seventeenth, and nineteenth of January. Their design of going to France, and the treasonable papers found upon them, some written in the lord Preston's hand, and some in Mr. Ashton's, were fully proved; and for these practices they were found guilty and condemned. Ashton was executed, but lord Preston lay a long time under conviction by a reprieve, and his sentence was at last remitted. Elliot was not tried, there appearing no evidence against him. The earl of Clarendon was sent to the Tower, where he remained some months, and was afterwards confined to his own house in the country; an indulgence which he owed to his near relationship to the queen, who was his first cousin. The bishop of Ely, Graham, and Penn, absconded, and a proclamation was issued for apprehending them as traitors.

The discovery of the bishop of Ely's concern in this conspiracy, furnished the king with a fair pretext for filling up the bishoprics that had been so long vacant by the non-compliance of their former possessors with the act of parliament, requiring all ecclesiastics to take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance on pain of deprivation. Accordingly, the archbishopric of Canterbury was conferred upon Dr. Tillotson, in the room of Dr. Sancroft, who was now formally deprived. Dr. Simon Patrick, bishop of Chichester, was translated to the bishoprick of Ely, in the room of bishop Turner; Cumberland, to that of Peterborough, in the room of bishop White; Moore to Norwich, in the room of bishop Lloyd; Grove to Chichester, void by the translation of Cumberland; Dr. Fowler to the see of Gloucester, in the room of Frampton; and Dr. Beveridge, rector of St. Peter's in Cornhill, was nominated to the bishopric of Bath and Wells, in the room of bishop Kenn; but Beveridge refusing the offer, it was bestowed upon Dr. Kidder. Soon after their majesties nominated Dr. Sharp, dean of Canterbury, to the archbishopric of York, in the room of archbishop Lamplugh; Dr. Ironside, bishop of Bristol, to succeed Dr. Henry Crofts, lately deceased, in the bishopric of Hereford; and Dr. John Hall to be bishop of Bristol. Loud and vehement were the complaints of the deprived clergy and their friends on this occasion; the kingdom was filled with pamphlets, in which every effort of learning and resentment was exerted to blacken the character of those in power: the justice of a lay deprivation was warmly denied: the distinctions of De Jure et De Facto were now revived, and applied to the church-government, as it had formerly been to the civil administration. To frustrate these efforts of the malcontents, the court employed their engines to answer and recriminate; and, not content with that, recourse was had to the more powerful eloquence of the law: a proclamation was issued against papists and other disaffected persons, in which all magistrates were enjoined to make search and apprehend those who should, by seditious discourses and libels, presume to defame the government.

The reader will readily perceive how strangely change of circumstances operates upon the weak mind of man, since he cannot but recollect that the very practices which were now so strongly condemned by the present government, had proved the principal means of bringing about the Revolution; and that the very prelates who were now outed from their sees, had rendered themselves respectable throughout Christendom by the brave stand they had made in the late reign, when the religion and civil rights of the subject were invaded. Candour and a regard for truth has drawn from me this observation: I find myself obliged, by the same motives, to acknowledge that the persons appointed to fill the places of these prelates, were remarkable for their moderation, piety, and learning, and most of them shining ornaments to the English church. But to return from this digression:

His majesty having settled affairs at home as well as the short space of time would admit, resolved to set out for Holland, in order to command in person the confederate army in Flanders, agreeable to the promise he had made the allies at the congress; but first he gave the necessary orders for the total reduction of Ireland, that he might have nothing to call off his attention from the war on the continent: and having appointed general Ginckle commander in chief of the army in that kingdom, his majesty embarked at Harwich on the second of May, set sail with a fair wind for Holland, attended by a squadron of men of war under rear-admiral Rooke, landed the next day near Maesland-sluyce, and arrived the same evening at the Hague, where we shall leave him to take a view of the operations in Ireland.

The French king, who still persevered in supporting king James's desperate fortune, had sent his friends in that kingdom a large supply of provisions, cloaths, and ammunition, together with three thousand regular troops, under the command of M. St. Ruth, a brave and experienced general, who had greatly distinguished himself in Germany. On the other hand, general Ginckle, who in conduct and courage yielded to few commanders of his time, having been lately reinforced by a body of troops under major-general Mackay (returned from the reduction of the Scots Highlanders) took the field in the beginning of June, and invested the town of Ballymore, which was defended by a thousand men, under colonel Bourke. The batteries being raised quickly, made such a breach in a place of no great strength, that nothing remained in a few days but to give a general assault; however, the enemy saved our troops that trouble, by submitting at discretion, after a six days siege only. There were taken seven hundred and eighty men, besides four field-officers, and near three hundred of the Rapparees, or Irish free-booters, who had mixed themselves with king James's forces to wait the fortune of war.

The general having put the town in a better condition of defence, marched from thence on the eighteenth of June: and being joined the same day by the prince of Wirtemberg, encamped at Ballymony pass, from whence he advanced the next day to Athlone, situated on the other side the Shannon, and secured by the Irish and French army under St. Ruth, which was encamped in its neighbourhood. The English town was taken by storm in two days, many of the Irish were killed in the attack, and more drowned by falling into the river; in their hasty retreat over the bridge to the Old-town. After this success, batteries were planted on the twenty-second against the Irish town, which did such execution, that the castle and other strong buildings were soon laid in ruins. The enemy, who hung out French colours, made a most obstinate resistance; insomuch that on the thirtieth our general held a council of war, to consider whether it was advisable to continue the attack, or draw off: but the duke of Wirtemberg, the generals Mackay, Talmash, Ruvigny, and Tetteau, expressed themselves strongly against such a measure, and proposed passing the Shannon in order to attack the enemy, offering themselves to be the first to conduct that attempt. Their opinion having prevailed, a detachment was sent to pass at a ford a little to the left of the town. Though the river was deep and rapid, the bottom slippery and full of stones, and the pass defended by a bastion which the enemy had erected on purpose; yet our English troops, whose courage and heroism ever increase with danger and difficulties, regardless of aught but glory, threw themselves into the river, which they waded, amidst the thickest of the enemy's fire; and having gained the other bank, threw in their hand-grenadoes, and then discharged such a furious volley of small-shot, that the enemy, unable to sustain the charge, abandoned their works. This brave detachment being supported by fresh battalions, the English in an hour's time made themselves masters of the town, with the loss of not more than fifty men. Mackay, Tetteau, Talmash, and la Melionere, performed miracles on the occasion, while general Ginckle, by his example, exhortations, and happy disposition of his men, secured us victory. The French general St. Ruth, by an effect of that vanity and presumption, which on many occasions is but too much the characteristic of his countrymen, treated the attempt of the English to force the passage of the Shannon, with a contempt that did little credit to that prudence and circumspection for which he had been hitherto distinguished. In vain did Sarsfield press him to send succours to the town: he laughed at that officer's apprehensions, and it was not till too late that he found himself convinced, that no enterprize was too difficult for English courage. When we had got possession of the place, he indeed ordered some detachments to march and drive our troops out again; but the thunder of the cannon from the town, which on our entering it was immediately turned against him, quickly made him glad to consult his own safety by a precipitate decampment.

General Ginckle having put a garrison into Athlone, and ordered the fortifications to be repaired, set out on the tenth of July in pursuit of the French and Irish army, who made a stand near Aghrim, a town about ten miles distant from Athlone. Here St. Ruth encamped in a very advantageous situation; and having by draughts from different garrisons increased his army to twenty-five thousand men, while ours under general Ginckle did not exceed eighteen thousand, he resolved to hazard a general engagement. Ginckle, notwithstanding his disparity of numbers, resolved to fight the enemy. On Sunday the twelfth day of July both armies came to action. Of this famous battle of Aghrim, Story in his History of the Wars of Ireland, and other writers, gives us the following account.

The morning of the day appointed for making the attack proved so foggy, that general Ginckle could not begin any operation till about twelve o'clock, when the army crossed the river Suck, on the banks of which it was encamped, opposite to that of the enemy, whose center was posted on a rising ground, uneven in many places, and intersected with banks and ditches lined with musqueteers, and secured in front by a large bog almost impassable: their right was defended by intrenchments and by two Danish forts, and their left by the castle of Aghrim. The English having effected their landing, marched up to the edge of the great bog, and endeavoured to force the only two places by which it was passable, in order to gain ground on the other side. The enemy made a most furious resistance, and our horse were several times repulsed: but at last the troops on the right carried their point, by means of some field-pieces properly placed, and admirably well served. So much time however was unavoidably spent in these manœuvres, that the general would have put off the battle till the next morning; but a confusion that he observed in the enemy's camp, making him apprehensive that they intended to decamp in the night, he changed his resolution, and ordered his troops to prepare for the charge.

At five in the evening the left wing of the English attacked the right wing of the Irish, from whom they met with such a warm reception, that it required the utmost efforts of their courage and resolution before they could compel them to give ground. The Irish musqueteers who lined the ditches were strongly supported by their horse, placed behind them, and maintained their posts with a most heroic obstinacy; nor would they stir from one side of the ditch, till the English presented their pieces from the other; and then, having lines of communication, they presently took post in the next ditch, where they continued to make the same resolute defence. St. Ruth perceiving that his men were in danger of being overpowered, immediately reinforced them from his center and left wing: this motion being observed by major-general Mackay, that vigilant officer instantly ordered two regiments to go round the bog, and fall upon the enemy's left wing, weakened by the detachments sent off, as already mentioned; and at the same time our center advanced through the middle of the bog, tho' up to their waists in mud and water. After having, with unspeakable difficulty, gained the other side, they found themselves obliged to ascend a rugged hill, fenced with ditches and hedges; and these were lined with musqueteers, sustained at proper distances with squadrons of horse: there the enemy made such a resolute stand, and fought with such perseverance, that they pushed our men back into the middle of the bog, which St. Ruth perceiving, cried out in a bravado, "That now he had the English at a disadvantage, and would drive them back to the gates of Dublin." Our men were indeed most miserably hampered, and in a confusion that might have been attended with the most fatal consequences, had not general Talmaish in this critical moment hastened to their relief with some fresh men, and gave orders to the broken regiments to halt and face about, which they obeyed with an unparalleled readiness and alacrity: they then in their turn charged the Irish (who had advanced upon them into the center of the bog) with such fury, as to kill above three hundred of them before they could retreat out of it; and marching forward regained the old ground from which they had been so lately driven.

While the infantry was thus engaged, Ruvigny's regiment of French protestant horse, which had formerly been duke Schomberg's, and sir John Lanier's being posted on the right, Lanier's was afterwards drawn to the left, where they did very great service; and the right wing of the English horse were in the mean time making the best of their way to succour the foot, being sensible of their extreme danger, and that all lay at stake. The cavalry, besides being exposed to a most furious fire from the enemy's dragoons, who were posted under a cover, were likewise obliged to press and tumble over a very dangerous pass; but having bravely surmounted all these difficulties, they lodged themselves at last in a dry ditch, in the hottest of the enemy's fire from Aghrim-castle, and some old walls and houses adjoining.

The battle now seemed doubtful for some time, or if there was any advantage, it was possessed by the enemy, to whose side victory appeared to be leaning: but major-general Mackay having timely reinforced the left wing with a body of horse and dragoons, first turned the balance in favour of the English. Ruvigny, who had distinguished himself by his diligence, courage, and activity, during the whole action, putting himself at the head of his own regiment of horse and another, scoured the side of the bog, and bore down all before him; which St. Ruth perceiving, resolved to attack him in an hollow way, which he knew he must be obliged to pass in his march to sustain the center. With this view he ordered a brigade of his own horse from the right wing to march up to the left; and putting himself at their head, began to descend Kircommodon hill, towards the place which he saw the English endeavouring to pass; but when he came near this place, where the main stress of the battle was fought, he was killed by a cannon-ball.

The death of the French general decided the fate of the day: the French and Irish were so much discouraged thereby, that Sarsfield, who was second in command, in vain endeavoured to recover them from their disorder. Ruvigny observing the confusion they were in, pressed boldly on, and falling upon them sword in hand, drove them with very little resistance to the top of the hill, where their camp had lain; then their whole line giving way at once, they threw down their arms, and betook themselves to flight. They were hotly pursued for the space of three miles, and suffered a most dreadful slaughter; but night coming on, with a thick misty rain, prevented our men from getting between them and an advantageous post near Loughbreak. However, it was computed that there were no less than seven thousand of the Irish slain on the spot, while the English had only six hundred killed, and nine hundred and sixty wounded: a very inconsiderable loss, if we reflect on the great superiority of the enemy before the engage-engagement! The Irish took shelter in Limerick, where they resolved to make a final stand, in hopes of receiving such succours from France as would enable them either to continue there, or obtain good terms from king William*.

General Ginckle, having allowed a few days for the refreshment of his men after this hot encounter, marched to Galway, the most considerable place left in the possession of the Irish, next to Limerick, and by a trumpet summoned the lord Dillon, the governor, to surrender the town. Though he at first refused, yet, upon part of the English army passing the river, and seizing a fort the Irish were building, he changed his resolution, and surrendered the place on the twentieth of July, upon advantageous articles, and the garrison were safely conducted to Limerick; to which place, the last refuge of the despairing Irish, general Ginckle soon bent his march, and came before it on the twenty-fifth of August.

The very next day the English made themselves masters of Ireton's and Cromwell's forts, which were now ordered to be called Mackay's and Nassau's, because gained under these commanders. Two days after, castle Connel and castle Garrick, two small forts standing upon the Shannon, three miles below the town, were attacked, and the garrisons of both made prisoners of war. The batteries were then opened against Limerick, and the attack of the place was carried on with all imaginable vigour till the seventeenth of September; but the resistance of the enemy was so obstinate, and the place so very defensible, that a council of war was held in the English camp, to debate whether it would not be most eligible to pass the river and destroy the enemy's forage, and then turn the siege into a blockade, rather than hazard the lives of the troops in fruitless attacks. The former expedient was preferred, and some steps taken towards putting it in practice, which filled the enemy with the greatest joy, who took it for granted, by what they saw the English doing, that they should soon be rid of such troublesome guests. Their satisfaction however was of short duration; for upon a second consultation it was resolved to press the siege, and at all events endeavour to make ourselves masters of the town. In pursuance of this resolution, the English, in the night of the eighteenth, formed a bridge of boats over the river, about a mile above the camp, and a strong party of horse and foot was sent over it; which struck the enemy that guarded the opposite side of the river with such a panic, that they threw down their arms and fled in haste. On the twenty-second general Ginckle himself passed the Shannon with a strong detachment of horse and dragoons, ten battalions of foot, and fourteen pieces of cannon, leaving Wirtemberg, Mackay, and Talmash, to command on the hither side of the river. The siege was now pressed with redoubled vigour, and the batteries continued to play against the town with great fury: at length, the English having taken several of the out-forts, and made a lodgment within ten yards of Thomond-bridge foot; the Irish, finding themselves cut off from all hopes of relief, determined to capitulate, which they did on the twenty-ninth of September; and on the first of October the lords justices of Ireland arrived in the English camp, where they settled all the articles of the capitulation, which were finally concluded on the third of the same month. By these articles, which were twenty in number, the Irish were all indemnified, and restored to the enjoyment of all the liberty in the exercise of their religion which they possessed in the reign of Charles II. They were admitted to all the privileges of subjects upon taking the oaths of allegiance, without being obliged to take the oath of supremacy: and not only the French, but as many of the Irish as chose to go over to France, had free liberty so to do. In virtue of these articles, Limerick, and all other towns, forts, and castles, that yet remained in the hands of the catholics, were to be surrendered up within a limited time. Accordingly, the English were put in possession of the place on the fifth; the French and many of the Irish were sent away in transport vessels, the remainder of their army in the field submitting to be included in the amnesty.

By the surrender of Limerick, Ireland was reduced to the subjection of the crown of England, and a solid peace established there, which has to this day continued without any interruption. Ginckle returning to England, was received with the highest applause, and, together with his general officers, feasted by the city of London: nor was this all; for the commons, on the meeting of the parliament, in token of their gratitude for the important services the general had been of to the state, ordered seven of their members to attend him with the thanks of their house. His majesty soon after created him earl of Athlone, and baron of Aghrim, that he might perpetuate to his posterity the honour of his glorious achievements; and to enable him the better to support his dignity, he was gratified with a grant of lands in Ireland to a very large amount†.

The events at sea this year were not very considerable. The Smyrna fleet being expected home this spring, and the English and Dutch having a joint concern therein, to the amount of several millions, both nations were extremely apprehensive of its being attacked by the French fleet, then cruising off the Chops of the Channel and in the Bay of Biscay, under admiral Tourville; and therefore strict orders were sent to admiral Russel, to use his utmost care for its preservation, which he executed with equal industry and success: for having appointed single ships to cruise for them on every point of the compass, he crossed with the main fleet to Cape Clear on the Irish coast; and being off Kinsale, received advice that the Smyrna men were safely arrived in that harbour. Upon this he resolved to conduct them as far as Scilly, and then, if they had a fair wind, to leave them to proceed up the Channel, having first taken the necessary precaution of sending a frigate before to Plymouth, that he might be satisfied none of the enemies ships were upon the coast. After parting with this fleet, the admiral determined to go off Ushant; and if the French were gone from thence, to follow them to Belleisle; but not seeing any thing of them, he returned back towards our own coast; and arriving in the Channel, he sent sir Cloudesley Shovel to look into Brest, where he saw about forty sail coming out of that port, which proved to be a fleet of merchant-ships from Bretagne, escorted by three men of war. Sir Cloudesley on this occasion made use of an excellent stratagem to decoy these ships into his hands: he knew the French had intelligence that a small squadron of their fleet had made prize of several English merchantmen: he therefore ordered part of his squadron to put out French colours, and the rest to take in theirs. By this method he thought to deceive the French, who might naturally suppose it that squadron with their prizes. This succeeded in part; but the greater number of the French discovered the cheat time enough to get safe back into port*. Towards the latter end of July admiral Russel fell in with a convoy going to the French fleet with fresh provisions. Some of these were taken, and from them he learnt that count Tourville had orders to avoid fighting; and though for the space of a month Russel did all he could to come up with them, yet they still eluded his vigilance. The season being over for action, Russel wrote to be recalled; but before he could receive an answer, was overtaken by a violent storm on the second of September off the Land's End, which obliged him to bear up for so dangerous a port as Plymouth, where the Warwick, a third-rate, and the Coronation, a second-rate, were lost in coming to an anchor, and many others were in the utmost danger.

The admiral immediately gave orders for refitting such ships as had been damaged in the storm, and left sir Cloudesley Shovel at Plymouth to see it performed, steering himself with the rest of the fleet for Spithead. Here he received orders to form a squadron of thirty sail of English and Dutch ships, to be sent to the coast of Ireland; and he accordingly appointed sir Ralph Dalaval, vice-admiral of the blue squadron, to the command, who attempted four times to execute that duty, and was as often forced back by contrary winds†. Thus ended the naval operations of the year 1691, very little to the honour, profit, or satisfaction of the nation. Loud complaints were made against admiral Russel for mismanagement; whereupon the house of commons ordered the admiral's instructions, and the letters written to and by him, to be laid before them, which sufficiently cleared him from all blame. It is now time to return to king William, whom we left at the Hague.

We have already seen that the French had taken the field much earlier than the confederates. Luxemburg, with an army of forty thousand men, was advancing to besiege Brussels, while the marquis de Boufflers with another army sat down before Liege. William, upon advice of these motions, lost no time in putting himself at the head of his troops, and arrived in time not only to cover the former place, but likewise to raise the siege of the latter. The confederate army was now superior to that of the enemy, and the king did all in his power to bring Luxemburg to an engagement; but that able commander, who was perfectly skilled in every art of war, as well defensive as offensive, so managed matters as to baffle all the king's endeavours, who perceiving he could not bring what he intended to bear, caused the fortifications of Beaumont, a place which he had made himself master of, to be demolished, and marched the army towards Aeth, from whence he departed the seventh of September for Loo, leaving the forces under the command of prince Waldeck. In his absence the French became somewhat more daring, yet not till they found they had gotten the confederate army at an advantage: for the prince having remained some time in the neighbourhood of Aeth, to cover and secure the adjacent country from the inroads of the enemies parties; and having, as he thought, provided effectually for that purpose, he moved off towards Benain; when Luxemburg, taking the advantage of this motion, advanced by great marches, and with several chosen squadrons of his best horse fell upon the rear of the confederate army, as it was passing a little river and defile near Casoire, charging so furiously, that after a terrible fight, the first line of the confederates gave way, and fell behind the second; which, after sustaining very hot charges, gave ground also; but their officers exerting themselves with unparalleled bravery, so animated the men by their example and exhortations, that they soon returned again to the fight. Whereupon the French horse, fearing to be encompassed by our infantry, retired, and left the confederate army to march on without any farther molestation. In this encounter we lost one thousand men: nor had the enemy much occasion to boast; for notwithstanding the great disadvantage at which they had taken the allies, they had five hundred of their men left dead upon the place; among whom were several officers of note, and a great many afterwards died of their wounds. The season being now far advanced, nothing of moment was farther attempted during this campaign, but both armies returned into winter-quarters. In the mean time, the duke de Noailles, with the army that acted against Spain, besieged and took Urgel in Catalonia, while a French squadron commanded by the count d'Etrées bombarded Barcelona and Alicant‡.

The confederates had proposed to act vigorously in Italy against the French; but the season was far advanced before they were in a condition to take the field. The elector of Bavaria was nominated to the chief command; but Catinat had already over-run Piedmont, and the duke of Savoy saw himself reduced to the brink of ruin, almost all his places of strength being in the hands of the enemy, who now laid siege to Coni, a fortified town about thirty miles from Nice. The garrison was reduced to such extremity, that, unless speedily relieved, nothing remained for them but to surrender the place, the loss of which would have been attended with the most fatal consequences. To prevent therefore, if possible, this additional calamity, prince Eugene, brother to the duke of Savoy, was sent with a convoy of provisions and two thousand horse. At Magliano he was joined by six thousand militia. M. Bulonde, who by Catinat's orders conducted the siege, hearing of their approach, thought proper to quit the place, and seek for his safety in a retreat; which he performed with so much haste and confusion, that he left behind him several pieces of cannon, mortars, bombs, arms, ammunition, tents, provisions, and utensils, with all his sick and wounded; for which he was, on his arrival in Catinat's camp, immediately put under arrest. The inglorious retreat of the French from before Coni gave no small reputation to the duke of Savoy's army, and that prince's affairs assumed a more favourable aspect from this period*. Catinat retired with his army towards Villa Nova and Asti, while La Hogue, another French general, who had forced the passes of Aoste, which opened an entrance into the Verceillois, and threatened Turin with a bombardment, was obliged to abandon his post, and retreat with his forces into winter-quarters.

The Imperialists, under the command of prince Lewis of Baden, had also the good fortune to gain a signal victory over the Turks at Salankamen, on the nineteenth of August this year, in which Kuperli the grand vizier was killed; and the prince of Baden afterwards took the town of Peterwaradin in Lower Hungary: but this did not put an end to the war between the emperor and the Turks; the Imperialists were still obliged to keep the greatest part of their forces in Hungary, and could not furnish their quota of troops against France, which was a great disadvantage to the allies. It is observable that the French have seldom entered into a war with their neighbours, but they have brought the Turks into Christendom, who usually make a powerful diversion in their favour. Our attention must now be turned to affairs at home.

King William, after leaving the army, continued some time at the Hague, regulating the operations of the next campaign; and then embarking for England, attended by a squadron of men of war under the command of sir Cloudesley Shovel, arrived at Margate on the nineteenth of October; and three days after, viz. on the twenty-second of the same month, both houses of parliament met for the dispatch of business. The session was opened by a speech from the throne, wherein his majesty told the two houses, "That he hoped the success his forces had met with in Ireland would be a great encouragement to them to assist him with fresh supplies. He recommended to them the keeping a strong fleet at sea, and an army of sixty-five thousand men ashore, that they might annoy the enemy in the most sensible part; adding, that they had now an opportunity of establishing their future quiet and prosperity, which if they neglected they might never more regain†."

Both houses hereupon congratulated his majesty upon his happy return, after so many hazards in his voyage to Holland, as also on the success of his arms in Ireland, promising to assist him in carrying on a vigorous war against France, in order to procure an honourable peace to his own dominions, and to secure his neighbours from the common oppressor‡. A proclamation was also published for keeping a thanksgiving on the twenty-sixth of November, "for his majesty's preservation from the great and manifest dangers in his voyage to and from Holland, and for the wonderful success of the Irish war, whereby their majesties were now happily established in the full possession of their three kingdoms." Addresses were also presented to the queen, acknowledging her prudent care in the administration of the government during the king's absence§.

Notwithstanding these warm and loyal proceedings, it soon appeared that there was a very strong party formed against the government. These were the Tories, who by no means approved of the maxims or conduct of king William: they inveighed both in private and public against the folly and extravagance of keeping on foot a standing army; they insisted that England ought only to assist her allies with some auxiliary troops, and that the management of affairs at sea was chiefly to be regarded. To this the advocates for the court replied, that without the interposition of England the grand alliance would never have taken place, nor could a stop have been put to the spreading conquests of the ambitious Lewis, who must soon have reduced both Flanders and Holland, and in them have destroyed the commerce, and even the liberties, of this kingdom. The arguments against continental connections were so much to the taste of the public, that the present government was in general greatly censured. Another principal cause of discontent was the evident partiality the king shewed to the Dutch over the English; and it was the general cry of the nation, that the former were the only persons favoured and trusted, while the English were wholly overlooked. It must be confessed that king William took too little pains to obviate this general disgust, which spread both among the English officers and nobility, or to gain the affections of his British subjects. He continued shut up all day with one or two particulars only, and those his own countrymen; and the sullen reserve and silence he observed when he did admit any of our nobility to an audience, gave them as much distaste as a denial would have done. The earl of Marlborough thought that his services were not sufficiently rewarded, and began to speak the language of a discontented person||. Let us now attend the proceedings of the parliament.

The commons on the ninth of November voted upwards of a million and a half for the service of the navy and ordnance, and upwards of two millions for the service of the land forces, for the ensuing year 1692, besides the supplies given the year before for the civil list, and other uses; so that there were about five millions of money raised this year¶.

The king coming to the house of peers on the

* The miscarriage of the French before Coni, made such an impression on the mind of Louvois, the minister of Lewis, that he could not help shedding tears when he imparted the news to his master. Lewis replied, with great composure, "You are too easily affected with a trifle. You are plainly spoiled by good fortune. For my part, who remember to have seen the Spanish troops in Paris, I can bear greater misfortunes with indifference." Memoires du Marquis de la Farre.

¶ By a continuance of the excise upon beer and ale, &c. by a land-tax, amounting to 1,651,702 l. being about three shillings in the pound; by a poll-tax, and by tonnage and poundage, or the duties on merchandize, which were assigned the last year for the support of the civil government for four years.

By the poll-tax granted this session, all persons (excepting the poor) were to pay twelve-pence per quarter for one year; all tradesmen who were worth three hundred pounds, ten shillings

the twenty-fourth of December, gave the royal assent to several acts *. After which his majesty made a speech to both houses, wherein he thanked them for their resolutions to assist him, but pressed them to hasten the remainder of the supplies, that the enemy might not get the start of him in the field, as they had done in the last campaign. But the dispatch so much desired by the king was retarded by several incidental affairs which engaged the attention of the house: one was a contest between the East India Company and some private merchants: the matter was referred to the examination of a committee; and the Company's defence was so little to the satisfaction of the examiners, that the house addressed the king to dissolve the present Company, and grant a charter to a new one. The king returned this answer; "It is a motion of very great importance to the trade of this kingdom: I will consider of it, and in a very short time give the commons a positive answer †." However, his majesty in the mean time was pleased to confer the honour of knighthood on sir John Goldsborough, who was going to India in quality of the Company's commissary-general. The next affair that came before the parliament was the pretended discovery of a plot, by one Fuller, a prisoner for debt in the King's-Bench, who fell upon this stratagem to procure his enlargement: but having trifled most egregiously upon several examinations, and not being able to make good the least part of his sham-evidence, the commons were so provoked at his insolence and presumption, that they voted him "a notorious impostor, cheat, and false accuser, who had scandalized his majesty's person and government, abused the house of commons, and falsely accused several persons of honour and quality:" and they farther resolved, "That an address be presented to his majesty to command his attorney-general to prosecute the said impostor." Fuller was accordingly prosecuted, and sentenced to stand in the pillory; which ignominious punishment he underwent with a surprising effrontery.

The public business met with a farther and more considerable interruption, by a very warm contest that arose between the two houses, on occasion of a bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason; which being passed by the commons, was sent up to the lords for their concurrence, who on the first reading added the following clause to it: "That upon the trial of any peer or peeress for treason, or misprision of treason, ALL the peers who have a right to sit and vote in parliament, should be duly summoned to attend twenty days at least before the trial, and should vote at the trial of such peers or peeresses:" and with this amendment the bill was sent back to the commons, who rejected to the clause, which occasioned several conferences between both houses; in which Charles Montagu, afterwards earl of Halifax, distinguished himself as a manager for the commons; as did the duke of Bolton, the marquis of Halifax, the earls of Mulgrave, Rochester, Nottingham, Monmouth, and Stamford, for the lords ‡. After a long time wasted in fruitless arguments in both sides, neither of which would give way to the other, the bill was dropped for the present, but it passed with the said clause a few years afterwards.

The funds for the ensuing year being at length settled, the king came to the house on the twenty-fourth of February; and having given the royal assent to the money-bills, and several acts relating to civil polity §, he closed the session with a short speech, in which he thanked his parliament for the zeal and attachment they had shewn to his government, and the liberality and dispatch with which they had provided for the necessities of the state, acquainting them at the same time with his intention of repairing speedily to the continent. Then the parliament was adjourned to the twelfth day of April, and afterwards prorogued to the twenty-ninth of May.

In the course of this session, Dr. Wellwood, a Scottish physician, was taken into custody, and reprimanded at the bar of the house of commons, for having reflected upon that house in a weekly paper, entitled Mercurius Reformatus; but as it was written in defence of the government, the king appointed him one of his physicians in ordinary. But the most remarkable incident during this session, was the disgrace of the earl of Marlborough, to whom his majesty sent the earl of Nottingham, secretary of state, some day in January, to acquaint him, that he had no farther occasion for his services, and therefore demanded all his commissions. Numberless were the conjectures of the public, on the cause of this nobleman's disgrace: it was said that he had incurred the king's displeasure by some speeches reflecting upon the Dutch favourites, particularly the earl of Portland (Bentinck) and the earl of Rochford (Zuylestein); it was also alleged that the king having formed a design to surprize Dunkirk, had communicated it to the earl of Marlborough, and he had told it to his lady, who is supposed to have acquainted her sister, lady Tyrconnel with the secret, by whom it was revealed to the king's enemies; and that his majesty thereupon thought proper to remove so imprudent a person from any place of trust: thus much is certain, that the earl was not employed again, nor called to council, till after the peace of Ryswick ||. His countess was also forbid the court; and the princess of Denmark was desired to dismiss her from her falings per quarter; all gentlemen and reputed gentlemen having estates of three hundred pounds per annum, and all clergymen and dissenting teachers having ecclesiastical benefices or contributions of the value of eighty pounds per annum, twenty shillings per quarter; and every lord of parliament, spiritual and temporal, ten pounds per quarter, and all non-jurors double.

mily, which she refusing to do, it occasioned a quarrel between her and the queen her sister; upon which her royal highness retired from court, and removed to Sion House, which she borrowed of the duke of Somerset. Great endeavours were used on this occasion by the discontented party at home to get the princess to head their faction; but her highness gave not the least encouragement to their measures, but continued to observe the same unblameable conduct which she had made the sole rule of her actions ever since the accession of their majesties to the crown.

Before I close the transactions of the year 1691, I shall just take notice of an unsuccessful expedition of our colonists from New England, against the French in Canada. It seems that the government of New England, finding the French very troublesome neighbours, sent out a fleet, in the summer of this year, of thirty-two sail, with two thousand land-forces on board, for the attack of Quebec; but this armament being eight weeks in sailing up the river of St. Lawrence, they thereby gave the enemy time to bring all their strength for the defence of the place, before which our people were repulsed, obliged to reembark, and, in coming down the river, lost many of their ships upon the rocks and shoals: and when two thousand English and fifteen hundred Indians had marched over-land from New York, Connecticut, &c. they found no canoes to transport them over the lakes, and were therefore obliged to return home. In this unfortunate and ill-conducted expedition, the province of New England contracted a debt of one hundred and forty thousand pounds; and there were said to have been upwards of one thousand lives lost, by the different accidents attending it*.

As soon as Lewis XIV. perceived that it was impossible to support the war in Ireland any longer to advantage, he came to a resolution of employing the forces that were still left king James, to serve his purpose another way: with this view he entered into a correspondence with the Jacobite party in England for an invasion on the coast of Sussex: and though for this design it was necessary to draw together a great number of transports, as well as a considerable body of forces, yet he had both in readiness before it was so much as suspected here, so extremely bad was the intelligence of our court at that time. The land army consisted of fourteen battalions of English and Irish troops, and about nine thousand French, commanded by the marshal de Belfondes; so that in all there were full twenty thousand men†. The fleet of transports consisted of three hundred sail, and was well provided with every thing necessary for the invasion: in short, nothing was wanting to the execution of the design in the beginning of April, but the arrival of count d'Estrees's squadron of twelve men of war, which was to escort the embarkation, while Tourville cruized in the Channel with the grand fleet, which was also ready to put to sea, but detained by contrary winds. Things being in this promising situation, king James sent over colonel Parker, and some other agents of his, to give his friends intelligence of his motions: these arrived about the latter end of January 1692. This officer, with one Johnson, had formed a plot for assassinating king William; but before they could execute their barbarous design, his majesty, having settled all affairs at home, embarked for Holland the fifth of March, and arrived safely at the Hague, from whence he soon after went to Loo‡.

In this interval king James, finding his queen big with child, that there might be no more disputes about her majesty's delivery, sent over letters, directed to several lords who had formerly been members of his council, as well as to divers ladies of quality and distinction§, acquainting them with his queen's pregnancy, and requiring them to attend as witnesses at the labour. This invitation, however, was not accepted by any of those to whom it was addressed. Those among them who wished well to his interest were restrained, by fear of incurring the resentment of the present government, while the Revolutionists thought it a matter of little concern whether James's queen was really in a state of child-bearing or not. Not long after, king James sent over a printed declaration, dated at St. Germain's, in which he openly avowed his intentions of using all possible means to recover the throne of his ancestors, and boasted of the powerful assistance he expected from France; at the same time exhorting all his faithful subjects to continue their fidelity to him: he offered pardon and rewards to all of the prince of Orange's soldiers, or others, who would come in to him; and proceeded so far as to except by name from the said indemnity no less than thirteen noblemen, two bishops, seven barons, and a great number of clergy and gentlemen.

All this time colonel Parker, and other agents, were employed in inlisting men privately in the counties of York and Lancaster, and the bishopric of Durham, while Mr. James Fountaine, as lieutenant-colonel to the lord Montgomery, and colonel Holman, were forming two regiments of horse in London, who were to join king James on his landing. In their zeal for their old master's service, however, they overshot the mark: for having entertained a notion that rear-admiral Carter was disaffected to king William's government, they applied to him; and he having given the queen and council information thereof, he was ordered to feign an inclination to join the conspirators; which he did so effectually, that they credulously gave into the snare, to the destruction of their plot and their

‡ Before the king went abroad he made the following promotions: Thomas earl of Pembroke, in the beginning of March, was made lord privy-seal, being succeeded as a commissioner of the admiralty by Charles lord Cornwallis; sir Edward Seymour, bart. and Charles Montagu, esq. were made lords commissioners of the treasury, in the room of sir John Lowther, vice-chamberlain of the household, and Thomas Pelham, who resigned; and Henry lord viscount Sidney, principal secretary of state, resigning that office, was constituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

§ The letter was directed not only to the privy counsellors, but likewise to the duchesses of Somerset and Beaufort, the marchioness of Hallifax, the countesses of Derby, Mulgrave, Rutland, Nottingham, Lumley, and Danby, the ladies Fitzharding and Fretchville, those of sir John Trevor speaker of the house of commons, sir Edward Seymour, sir Christopher Musgrave, sir Thomas Stamford lord mayor of London, sir William Ashhurst and sir Richard Levett sheriffs; and lastly to Dr. Chamberlain the famous practitioner in midwifery. good friend's fleet; for they presently sent over an express to the lord Melfort, James's secretary, to acquaint him with their having corrupted Carter, who would take care of the officers of his squadron. They likewise sent a list of the ships that composed the English fleet, desiring lord Melfort to lay the same before the French king, and press him to send peremptory orders to Tourville to attack them before they could be joined by the Dutch squadron from Holland. Lewis, pleased to find his schemes in so fine a way of succeeding, commanded Tourville to put to sea, and fall upon the English fleet at all events, without waiting for being joined by the squadron under count d'Estrees, while king James repaired to La Hogue, on the coast of Normandy, ready to embark with his army.

The court of England must certainly have been in great consternation when they heard that James was on the coast of France with an army ready to invade them, and the Dutch squadron not yet come over to join our fleet. Queen Mary, however, who had the administration during the king's absence, behaved upon this occasion with great wisdom and firmness of mind; for without discovering any apprehensions of danger, she took all the precautions that were necessary to prevent it, by publishing a proclamation requiring all papists to quit the cities of London and Westminster; another for assembling both houses of parliament; and a third for apprehending the following noblemen and gentlemen, who were supposed to be in her father's interest, namely, the earls of Scarfdale, Litchfield, Newburgh, Middleton, and Dunmore; the lords Griffin and Forbes; sir John Fenwicke, sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, sir Andrew Forrester, and others. These proclamations were issued on the fifth of May, and the next day the earls of Huntingdon and Marlborough, with the lords Brudenell and Fanshaw, were sent to the Tower; and Mr. Edward Ridley, Mr. Knevitt, Mr. Hastings, and Mr. Robert Ferguson, to Newgate, on violent suspicion of high-treason, in abetting and adhering to their majesties enemies. The trained-bands of London and Westminster, amounting to about ten thousand men, were drawn out in Hyde-Park, and reviewed by the queen in person. Orders were likewise sent to admiral Russel, then lying at St. Helen's, to hasten out to sea, in whatever condition the fleet might be.

King William, as soon as he arrived in Holland, had taken care to hasten the naval preparations there with unusual diligence; so that the Dutch fleet was ready to put to sea much sooner than had been expected, or at least much sooner than it had done the year before, and in a much better condition: in short, the Dutch squadron under admiral Allemonde, of thirty-six sail, joined our fleet at St. Helen's about the middle of May; and the admiral was soon after farther reinforced by the squadron under sir Ralph Delaval from the Mediterranean, and admiral Carter from the Channel*. While they lay at St. Helen's, admiral Russel received a letter from the earl of Nottingham, as secretary of state, written by queen Mary's directions; wherein he was informed, "That a scandalous and malicious report was spread, as if some of the officers of their majesties fleet were disaffected, or not hearty in their service, and that her majesty had been thereupon induced to order the discharge of many of them; but her majesty charged the admiral to acquaint his officers, that she was satisfied this report was raised by the enemies of the government, and that she reposed an entire confidence in their fidelity, and had resolved not to displace so much as one of them†." Upon this the flag-officers and captains drew up a very dutiful and loyal address, dated from on board the Britannia, at St. Helen's, May 15, 1692, which was transmitted to court, and presented by the lords of the admiralty to her majesty, who was pleased to return this gracious answer, which was published that same night (May 17) in the Gazette‡: "I always had this opinion of the commanders, but I am glad this is come, to satisfy others."

The whole confederate fleet being now in a body, admiral Russel weighed anchor from St. Helen's on the eighteenth of May, and steered over to the coast of France. Next morning about three o'clock, the scouts to the westward of the fleet made the signal for discovering the enemy. The admiral immediately gave orders for forming the line of battle, which by eight o'clock was in good order, having the Dutch squadron in the van, our red squadron in the center, and the blue in the rear. Tourville was confounded at the sight of the combined squadrons: he might, as he was to windward, have avoided an engagement; but he had received positive orders to fight, on the supposition, as we have already mentioned, that the Dutch and English squadrons had not joined. Full of that implicit obedience which every Frenchman thinks it his duty to pay to the commands of his sovereign, he resolved to fight at all events§, and bore down upon our fleet with great resolution.

tion. About half an hour after eleven he, in our ship the Royal Sun, of one hundred and four guns, brought to, and began the fight with admiral Russel, within less than musket-shot; in which posture he lay about an hour and a half, plying his guns very smartly; but then began to tow off in great disorder, his rigging, sails, and top-sail-yards, being very much damaged.

About noon the wind shifted to the north-west, so that five of the enemy's blue squadron posted themselves three a-head and two a-stern of their admiral, and fired very briskly till after three. The admiral and his two seconds, captain Churchill and captain Aylmer, had all these ships to deal with. About four there was so great a fog, that the enemy could not be seen; and as soon as it cleared up, the French admiral was seen towing away northward: upon which admiral Russel crowded sail after him, and made the signal for the rest of the fleet to chace. While this passed between the admirals, sir Cloudesley Shovel was got to windward of Tourville's squadron, and engaged them; but the fog growing darker than before, they were forced to anchor. The weather afterwards clearing up a little, the French followed their flying admiral, while the English pursued with all the canvass they could spread; and the English blue squadron having again fallen in with the enemy, engaged about three quarters of an hour, till the latter, having lost four ships, bore away for Conquet Road. In this short action admiral Carter was killed, whose last words sufficiently refuted the opinion the Jacobites had formed of him; for finding himself mortally wounded, he recommended it to his captain to fight the ship as long as she could swim *.

The next day, the twentieth of May, proved so dark and foggy, that it was eight o'clock before our fleet descryed that of the enemy, and then there followed a general chace, the French crowding away to the westward. About four in the afternoon both fleets came to an anchor near Cape La Hogue. On the twenty-second, about seven in the morning, our fleet resumed the chace with all the success they could desire: about eleven the French admiral ran ashore near Cherbourg, where she was burnt by sir Ralph Delaval, together with the Admirable, a ship of 102 guns, the Conquerant of eighty, and three others of lesser force. Eighteen other ships of the fleet took shelter in La Hogue, where thirteen of them were burnt by admiral Rooke, who at the same time destroyed a great number of transports loaded with ammunition, in the midst of a terrible fire from their fort, and in sight of king James's camp. Sir John Ashby, with the blue squadron and some Dutch ships, pursued the rest of the fleet which escaped, through the Race of Alderney, among such rocks and shoals, that the English could not attempt to enter without running the most imminent danger of being dashed in pieces †.

Besides the Royal Sun, of one hundred and four guns, the French lost another ship of one hundred and two, one of ninety, two of eighty, four of seventy-six, four of sixty, and two of fifty guns ‡. If indeed sir John Ashby could have come up with those that took shelter in St. Maloes, it had in a good measure put an end to the French power at sea. As it was, it must be acknowledged a most glorious victory, and perpetual praise is due to the memory of the brave men who achieved it. From this time to the peace concluded in 1697, the French did not attempt to engage the English fleet at sea, but contented themselves with prejudicing our trade by their smaller ships of war and privateers.

The loss of the French fleet was a fatal stroke to king James, who now saw all his hopes swallowed up at once; and, according to Burnet and some other authors, he wrote a letter to the king of France, wherein, after lamenting his own ill fortune, which he said had proved contagious to all his friends, he intreated his most christian majesty no longer to concern himself for a prince so fated to disappointments; "Since, says he, I doubt not to hear of the quick return of your majesty's wonted triumphs over both your enemies and mine, when my interest shall be no longer intermixed with yours." Lewis endeavoured to sooth his affliction by the warmest expressions of friendship, and a promise never to forsake him in his most desperate fortunes.

Admiral Russel, having ordered sir John Ashby to scour the French coast as far as Havre de Grace, returned to England to refit his damaged ships (none of which were lost in the late glorious victory) and supply the fleet with provisions. As soon as news arrived of the fleet's being anchored at Spithead, the queen sent down thirty thousand pounds to be distributed among the sailors, and gold medals for the officers, to express the sense she had of their fidelity and courage. She also gave orders for the bodies of admiral Carter and captain Hastings (of the Sandwich) the only two

So that admiral Russel had ninety-nine ships of the line under his command, and count Tourville but sixty-three, some of which were detached in the time of action. It is however to be remarked, that though the confederate fleet had this great superiority over the French, yet scarce one half of it could engage, which was owing to the disposition made by admiral Russel, upon notice that the enemy was at hand; for he made a signal for the blue squadron, under sir George Rooke, the vice-admiral, to tack northward, in order to engage the French the sooner, in case they had stood that way; but the fog which ushered in the day dispersing about four o'clock in the morning, they were seen standing to the southward. officers of note who lost their lives in the engagement, to be honourably interred, at the charge of the crown. At the same time, in order to make the most of the consternation the French were thrown into by their late defeat, it was resolved to make a descent either at St. Malo's, Brest, or Rochfort. Accordingly, in the latter end of July, seven thousand men were embarked for that purpose, under the command of the duke of Leinster; and the nation conceived the most sanguine hopes of this expedition; but by some unaccountable negligence in the ministry, the whole scheme vanished into air: and the soldiery, after having lain upwards of a month on board, were sent over to serve in Flanders, where they arrived on the twenty-second day of August. The general reflection of the more sensible part of the nation on this occasion was, that the victory, which the favour of heaven and the bravery of our men had procured us, those who were entrusted with the management of public affairs had neither spirit nor sagacity to improve. The Dutch openly exclaimed against the treachery of the king's counsellors, affirming, that every thing that was transacted in the cabinet at Whitehall, was so speedily betrayed to the French, that it was in vain to hope for any success from designs concerted there. After the sending these troops into Flanders, the great ships were ordered round to Chatham, and the rest of the fleet divided into squadrons, as was judged most convenient for the service; and thus ended the naval transactions of this year. From England we will now pass over to the continent, and take a view of the military operations there.

Lewis XIV. to console himself for the disgrace he had lately sustained in the defeat of his fleet, laid siege to Namur, the strongest place in the Netherlands, both by its situation, which is at the confluence of the Sambre and the Maese, and by its citadel, which is built on a rock. His army consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men, with part of which he invested the town on the fifteenth of May, while Luxemburg with the rest covered his operations. The siege was pushed with such vigour and resolution, that in eight days the French made themselves masters of the town, and of the citadel in twenty-two, while the duke of Luxemburg prevented king William from passing the Meuse, who had advanced to the banks of that river, at the head of eighty thousand men, to raise the siege. After this conquest, Lewis returned again to Versailles, and Luxemburg still continued to make head against the army of the confederates*: and now it was that the battle of Steinkirk was fought, so famous for the military art and courage displayed there.

King William, rightly judging that it would be some reflection either on his conduct or courage, to have suffered a place of such importance as Namur to be taken in his view, earnestly sought an opportunity to retrieve his reputation. With this view he formed a design to surprize Mons; but being disappointed in this enterprize also, he determined to fight the French at all hazards, especially as he had just received a reinforcement of eight thousand Hanoverians. Marshal Luxemburg had pitched his camp in a very advantageous post, covered by a wood and thick hedges, between Enghien and Steinkirk. Here king William resolved to attack him, upon the information of some persons who were thought to understand the nature of the ground, though it was found to be narrower, and more difficult of access than the king had been made to believe it was. However, on Sunday the twenty-fourth of July, the army was ordered to march by break of day, and attack the enemy in their camp. The prince of Wirtemberg began the attack: the French were all asleep in their tents, never dreaming of such a visit, and one entire brigade was cut in pieces before the marshal knew any thing of the matter. He was then very ill; a fatal circumstance at a time when uncommon activity was required: but the greatness of the danger seemed to give him new strength: he changed his ground; gave a field of battle to his army which before was pent up; recovered the right wing, which was all in confusion; rallied his men three several times, and three times charged at the head of the household troops; and all this in less than two hours. He had with him in his army the duke of Chartres, a grandson of France, who was then not above fifteen years old, and consequently could be of but little service in any great operation; but his presence contributed much to animate the soldiers. A grandson and a grand-nephew of the great Condé served also under Luxemburg as lieutenant generals: the one was the duke of Bourbon, the other the prince of Conti. These two were rivals in courage, ambition, and fame, and exerted themselves in a memorable manner to retrieve the fortune of the day. All these princes put themselves at the head of the rallied troops, and made a most furious and desperate resistance. Wirtemberg, unable to contend with such superior numbers, sent several messages to count Solmes, soliciting a reinforcement: but that nobleman, from some pique he had conceived against the English, disregarded his request. The king being informed of the danger his troops were exposed to, sent orders to the count to march to their assistance; but the horse, on account of the unevenness of the ground, could be of no service; so that the British troops, with a few Dutch and Danes, sustained the whole fury of the fight. At length Boufflers, who was posted with a strong body of dragoons at some distance from the field of battle, coming up and joining the French army, the confederates, unable to withstand this additional superiority, gave way, though the retreat was performed in good order; for the French, contenting themselves with having thus retrieved their affairs, did not offer to molest them. On the other hand, king William would not venture to renew the engagement, for fear of exposing his whole army to the danger of a defeat, and therefore drew off his forces. In this attack, which was a very desperate one, we lost five or six thousand men at least; and among them lieutenant-general Mackay, sir John Lanier, the earl of Angus, sir Robert Douglas, and several other officers of distinction. The loss of the French was also very considerable, both in private men and officers of rank; and they would have suffered still more, had it not been for the treachery of one Millevoix, secretary to the elector of Bavaria, who had for a considerable time made it his practice to send intelligence to the enemy of all the plans agreed upon by the allies in their councils of war. Being detected on this occasion, he was hanged on a tree on the right wing of the confederate army.

But a scene of greater treachery was about this time happily brought to light: for the French court, finding that they could not destroy king William in open war, resolved to take him off by secret villainy; and an attempt was now set on foot against his life by the management of Barbesieux, secretary of state to Lewis XIV. and one colonel Parker, who had fled to that court. Grandval, a French knight of a desperate fortune, was encouraged with considerable sums in hand, and still more considerable promises, to assassinate the king of England as he should ride out at the head of the troops, or upon any other advantage as he could find it, by laying in ambush and shooting at him. Troops were accordingly ordered to be near at hand, to support and bring him off as soon as the murder was perpetrated. Grandval took two other persons into the confederacy as his assistants; one Du Mont, and Leefdale a Dutch papist. These three had several times attempted to put their hellish purpose in execution, as well at Loo, while the king was there, as in the camp. Du Mont had entered into the confederate army as a deserter, in order to have the fairer opportunity: but being at length discouraged by several disappointments, and struck with horror at the thought of the villainy he was engaged in, he made a full discovery of the whole plot. Hereupon Grandval was seized as he was skulking about the king's quarters; and being examined before a court-martial, for some time obstinately denied any knowledge of the intended assassination, till being confronted with Du Mont, and some papers produced, in which the whole plan of operations was laid down, he at length confessed the design, with all the circumstances that had attended it from time to time, and made a full discovery of the persons who had set him on and were to support him*. Upon full evidence of his guilt he received sentence of death, as in cases of high-treason, and was drawn, hanged, and quartered, his head and quarters being, by way of terror, set upon poles without the camp. Du Mont and Leefdale were allowed to escape with their lives, on account of being evidences to convict Grandval.

Not long after the battle of Steenkirk, the count Sericlas de Tilly fell in with a strong detachment of French, sent out of Namur to put the country under contribution, whom he totally defeated, taking four hundred prisoners, and amongst them thirty officers, some of considerable note, who were sent to Hays: amongst the slain was the marquis of Hocquincourt. Our army being about the same time reinforced by the recruits from England under the duke of Leinster, a detachment from the camp, under the command of lieutenant general Talmash, was sent towards Newport, when they possessed themselves of Furnes, a very important post, and fortified it; and soon after seized on Dixmuyde, with the villages, and all the dependent territories. Many skirmishes happened during these transactions, but none worthy of notice here. In Germany the town of Reinfeldt was invested this year by count Tallard. On the side of Italy, the duke of Savoy made an invasion into Dauphine, but soon retired; and the season now advancing to close the campaign, many of the troops were sent into winter-quarters, and the rest had their rendezvous appointed for some time longer, to prevent the enemy making incursions. King William having conferred the command of the allied army on the elector of Bavaria, embarked for England on the fifteenth day of October, arrived at Yarmouth the eighteenth, was met by the queen at Newhall on the twentieth, and proceeded to his capital, where he was received with great acclamations by the people.

In the course of this year the protestant interest in Germany received a considerable addition of strength, by the creation of a new electorate, in favour of Ernest Augustus duke of Hanover, through the application and interposition of king William. After a tedious negotiation, the duke of Hanover was honoured with the investiture, under the title of Elector of Brunswick, and created great marshal of the empire; but as he had not attained the consent of all the electors, he was not as yet admitted into the college†.

During the king's absence, a sham plot was discovered by one Young, a prisoner in Newgate. This miscreant had formed a pretended association in favour of king James; to which he had counterfeited the hands of the earls of Marlborough and Salisbury, Sprat bishop of Rochester, the lord Cornbury, eldest son to the earl of Clarendon, and sir Basil Firebrace. This paper was artfully dropped in the bishop's hall, where it was found by the king's messenger, in consequence of Young's information. The bishop was thereupon apprehended; but the forgery being soon after fully detected, his lordship was set at liberty; and the earl of Marlborough, who had been imprisoned in the Tower, was admitted to bail. Young the impostor was afterwards brought to his trial at the King's-Bench bar, and sentenced to stand three times in the pillory, and to continue in prison till he should pay a fine of one thousand pounds.

Now it was that the affair of the Glencoe men in Scotland was greatly talked of throughout the kingdom, and represented as bad as the massacres at Paris and in Ireland, and the whole blame laid upon the king as his act and deed, though the Scottish parliament, upon making a strict enquiry into this affair in the year 1695, resolved, "That the persons concerned in it had exceeded his majesty's instructions for suppressing the Highland rebels who had not accepted the indemnity that was offered by the time prefixed in the proclamation." I shall, however, relate the story with all its circumstances, as given us by bishop Burnet (in the second volume of his History of his own Times, p. 88, &c.) and leave the reader to make his own reflections upon it.

"There was at this time (in the beginning of this year 1692) a very barbarous massacre committed in Scotland, which shewed both the cruelty and treachery of some of those who had unhappily insinuated themselves into the king's confidence. The earl of Braidalbin formed a scheme of quieting all the Highlanders, if the king would give twelve or fifteen thousand pounds for doing it; which sum was remitted down from England, and this was to be divided among the heads of the tribes or clans of the Highlanders. He employed his emissaries among them, and told them, the best service they could do king James was to lie quiet, and reserve themselves to a better time; and if they would take the oaths, the king would be contented with that, and they would have a share of this sum that was sent down to buy their quiet; but this came to nothing: their demands rose high: they knew this lord had money to distribute among them: they believed he intended to keep the best part of it himself; so they asked more than he could give. Among the most clamorous and obstinate of these were the Macdonalds of Glencoe, who were believed guilty of much robbery and murders, and so had gained too much by their pilfering war to be easily brought to give it over. The head of that Valley had so particularly provoked lord Braidalbin, that as his scheme was quite defeated by the opposition which the other raised, so he designed a severer revenge. The king had by a proclamation offered an indemnity to all the Highlanders that had been in arms against him, upon their coming in by a prefixed day to take the oaths. The day had been twice or thrice prolonged, and it was at last carried to the end of the year 1691, with a positive threatening of proceeding to military execution against such as should not come into his obedience by the last day of December.

"All were so terrified that they came in; and even Macdonald went to the governor of Fort-William; but he being only a military man, could or would not tender them, and Macdonald was forced to seek for some of the legal magistrates to tender them to him. The snows were then fallen, so that four or five days passed before he could come to a magistrate. He took the oaths in his presence on the fifth or sixth of January, when, by the strictness of the law, he could claim no benefit by them. The matter was signified to the council, and the person had a reprimand for giving him the oaths when the day was past.

"This was kept up from the king, and the earl of Braidalbin came to court to give an account of his diligence, and to bring back the money, since he could not do the service for which he had it. He informed against this Macdonald as the chief person who had defeated that good design; and that he might gratify his own revenge, and render the king odious to all the Highlanders, he proposed that orders should be sent for a military execution on those of Glencoe. An instruction was drawn by a secretary of state to be both signed and countersigned by the king (that so he (lord Braidalbin) might bear no part of the blame, but that it might lay wholly on the king) that such as had not taken the oaths by the time limited should be shut out of the benefit of the indemnity, and be received only upon mercy: but when it was found this would not authorize what was intended, a second order was got to be signed and countersigned, that if the Glencoe men could be separated from the rest of the Highlanders, some examples might be made of them, in order to strike terror into the rest. The king signed this order without any enquiry about it; for he was too apt to sign papers in a hurry, without examining the importance of them. This was one effect of his slowness in dispatching business: for as he was apt to suffer things to run on till there was a great heap of papers laid before him, so then he signed them a little too precipitately: but all this while the king knew nothing of Macdonald's offering to take the oaths within the time, and of his taking them soon after it was past when he came to a proper magistrate. As these orders were sent down, the secretary of state writ many private letters to Livingstone, who commanded in Scotland, giving him a strict charge and particular directions for the execution of them, and the passes in the Valley to be kept, describing them so minutely, that the orders were certainly drawn by one who knew the country well. He gave also a positive direction that no prisoners should be taken, that so the execution might be as terrible as possible. He pressed this upon Livingstone with strains of vehemence, that looked as if there was something more than ordinary in it: he indeed grounded it on his zeal for the king's service, adding, that such rebels and murderers should be made an example of.

"In February 1692 a company was sent to Glencoe, who were kindly received, and quartered over the Valley, the inhabitants thinking themselves safe, and looking for no hostilities. After they had staid a week among them, they took their time in the night, and killed about six and thirty of them, the rest taking the alarm and escaping. This raised a mighty outcry, and was published by the French in their gazettes, and by the Jacobites in their libels, to cast a reproach on the king's government as cruel and barbarous, tho' in all other instances it had appeared that his own inclinations were gentle and mild rather to an excess. The king sent orders to enquire into the matter; but when the letters writ upon this business were all examined, which I myself read, it appeared that so many were involved in the matter, that the king's gentleness prevailed on him to a fault, and he contented himself with dismissing the master of Stair from his service. The Highlanders were so inflamed with this, that they were put in as forward a disposition as the Jacobites wished for to have rebelled upon the first favourable opportunity; and indeed the not punishing this action with a due rigour was the greatest blot of this whole reign, and had a very ill effect in alienating the Scottish nation from the king and his government." Let us now return to the affairs in England.

His majesty, on his arrival at Kensington, received a congratulatory address from the lord-mayor and aldermen, with whom he dined in public by invitation. A day of thanksgiving was also appointed for the victory at sea, and his majesty's happy escape from the perils and dangers of war, and the private attempts of his enemies against his royal person. On the fourth of November the parliament met, when the king in his speech to both houses thanked them very cordially for their last supplies; congratulated them upon the victory obtained at sea; condoled them on the bad success of the last campaign by land, observing, that the diligence of the French in augmenting their forces was such, that it would be absolutely necessary to have as great a force to oppose them; and demanded a supply suitable to the exigence. He expressed great concern at the sending such large sums out of the kingdom for the payment of the troops; an inconvenience, he said, that he wished they could find some way to remedy. He intimated a design of making a descent upon France, and hoped that his parliament would give such speedy dispatch to the supplies, that the preparations might be timely and effectual: he declared that he had no interest but what was theirs, nor any other view but that of making them a happy people. "Hitherto, added he in conclusion, I have never spared my own person for the good and welfare of this nation; and I am so sensible of your good affections to me, that I shall continue so to do with great cheerfulness upon all occasions, wherein I may contribute to the honour and advantage of England *."

There was at this time a strong party formed in the upper house against the measures of the government, which party was chiefly under the direction of the earl of Marlborough; so that, instead of receiving the king's speech with that applause which was expected, they immediately fell upon an enquiry into the commitment of those peers who had been lately imprisoned. This enquiry was conducted with great animosity; but the king having agreed to release these lords upon their bail, the affair at last was entirely compromised.

The commons, by occasion of the thinness of the house, adjourned to the eleventh of November, when they presented an address of thanks to his majesty for his speech, and another desiring that the state of foreign alliances might be laid before them; and on the twelfth a bill was introduced for regulating trials in cases of high-treason; they also voted thanks to admiral Russel, and the commanders and seamen of the fleet, for their behaviour in the late fight off La Hogue. However, it having been much talked abroad that this victory had not been improved as it might have been, several instructions, orders, and resolutions of councils of war, concerning the last summer's expedition at sea, and the intended descent after the victory, were called for and examined by the house; and sir John Ashby, one of the admirals, was particularly examined in relation to the French men of war that escaped through the Race of Alderney into St. Malo's; when that officer gave an account of the proceedings of the ships under his command in and after the engagement, so much to the satisfaction of the house, that they directed their speaker to acquaint him in form, "That the house took notice of his ingenuous behaviour at their bar, and that he had given an account to the satisfaction of the house, and was dismissed from farther attendance †." Admiral Russel was also examined the same day, in relation to the miscarriage of the intended descent, who justified himself by the orders he received from the earl of Nottingham, secretary of state; and the earl shewed that those orders had been dictated to him by a superior power; whereupon the matter was dropped, though not till several severe speeches had been made against the ministers in general, and his lordship in particular: the commons thought fit, however, again to testify their approbation of the admiral's conduct.

The house next proceeded to take into consideration the article of supplies; and the proper estimates being laid before them, they resolved to grant the whole sum demanded, which amounted to about five millions, viz. near two millions for the charge of the navy and ordnance, two millions and upwards for the land-forces, including the extraordinary charges of the office of ordnance in relation to the land-service, and the charge of the transports, hospitals, and other contingencies. Besides which, the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds was granted to make good the deficiencies in the late quarterly poll. The civil list was provided for in the former session, so that the expences of the government, ordinary and extraordinary, for the ensuing year 1693, could not be computed at much less than six millions of money.

In order to raise these supplies, a tax of four shillings in the pound was imposed upon all lands, according to their yearly value; and all offices and employments of profit, except military offices in the army or navy. They likewise empowered his majesty to borrow money on the credit of this tax at the rate of four per cent. and farther enabled him to raise one million on the general credit of the Exchequer by granting annuities. This was the first annuity-act, and was the principal means of involving this nation in debt. A third way of raising money was, by levying additional duties on goods and merchandize imported and exported, particularly the sum of eight pounds on every ton of French wines. A new imposition of eight per cent. was also laid on the capital stock of the East-India Company, estimated at seven hundred forty-four thousand pounds; of one per cent. on the African; and of five pounds on every share of the stock belonging to the Hudson's-Bay Company; and they empowered his majesty to borrow half a million on those funds which were entirely set apart for carrying on the war ‡.

A bill was brought in this session for incapacitating persons having certain civil and military employments, to sit in the house of commons, which passed the lower house, but occasioned long and warm debates in the house of peers; in which the earl of Mulgrave distinguished himself in a particular manner, by a speech he made in favour of the bill. He observed, that the commons were the representatives of the people: "But if, after they are chosen, says he, they shall change their dependency, engage in employments plainly inconsistent with the great trust reposed in them, what are the people to expect from them? A commoner who has a command in the army must have a divided duty; and perhaps his troops or regiment may be in some action abroad, and he must either have the shame of being absent from them at such a time, or from that house where he is entrusted with our liberties. There is another sort of incapacity worse than this, proceeded he, I mean that of parliament-men having such places in the Exchequer, as the very profit of them depends on the money given to the king in parliament: Would any of your lordships lend or entrust a man to make a bargain for you, whose very interest shall be concerned to make you give as much as he possibly can?" After several other arguments of the like tendency, he desired the house "to consider of what great consequence it might be that so many votes should be free, when upon one single voice might depend the whole security or loss of the nation; adding, that the people could never be brought to bear patiently so great a provocation as the being debarred from a security in their representatives; and would be easily persuaded, by those whose interests it was to inflame their minds with discontent, that all those vast sums which had been, and still must be, raised towards carrying on the war, were not disposed of in so fair a manner as they ought to be; and I am afraid, concluded he, that their money is not given, but taken." This bill however was thrown out, after a long debate, by a majority of two voices only; the argument against passing it being, that it seemed to establish an opposition between the crown and the people, as if those who were employed by the one were not fit to be trusted by the other. Various attempts have since been made to procure an act of this kind, but always without success, for reasons that are too obvious to be repeated.

Another bill was introduced much about the same time for establishing triennial parliaments, which, after having passed both houses, was rejected by his majesty, who seems to have had no mind to part with a parliament which had been so liberal to him in their supplies.

A complaint was made to the house of commons soon after of a pamphlet, entitled, King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, which tended to make the lives and estates of the subject depend entirely on the will of the sovereign. The house was so alarmed at the pernicious tendency of this book, that they ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, together with bishop Burnet's Pastoral Letter to the Clergy of his Diocese, in which this notion of conquest had been first advanced. After which both houses, in order to shew their sentiments of the matter, came to this resolution, That the assertion of king William and queen Mary being king and queen by conquest, was highly injurious to their majesties rightful title to the crown, inconsistent with the principles on which this government was founded, and tended to the subversion of the rights of the people*. The lords shortly after taking into consideration the ill success of the campaign in Flanders, reflected severely on count Solmes, as the principal cause of the defeat at Steinkirk, and presented an address to his majesty, humbly entreating that the commanding officer of the English forces should be a native of his majesty's dominions; that English officers might take rank of those in the confederate armies who did not belong to crowned heads; and lastly, that no foreigner should sit at the board of ordnance. To this address the king only replied, that he would take it into consideration. They next proceeded to enquire into the failure of the intended descent upon the French coast, and passed some votes reflecting on the conduct of admiral Russel; but the commons still adhered to their former opinion, and repeated their thanks to that admiral for his fidelity, courage, and conduct.

There was a grievance at this time much complained of, namely, the pressing landmen for the sea-service by the officers of the navy, who carried them over to Holland, and there sold them to the officers of the army; which infamous practice would in all probability have passed unnoticed, had not a servant belonging to one of the members of parliament been thus spirited away. Sir John Trevor the speaker being ordered to lay this oppression before his majesty, the king was pleased to express a just resentment on the occasion, and ordered that no officers should presume to press landmen for the future, on pain of being cashiered. The parliament next proceeded to take into consideration the state of Ireland, concerning which they examined a number of witnesses, and then both houses presented addresses to his majesty†; wherein they complained of the conditions that had been granted the Irish on the surrender of Limerick, and of the king's disposal of some of the forfeited estates and effects in that kingdom; as also of the licentiousness of the soldiers for want of pay in that kingdom, which, they said, they hoped they had provided for. They complained of the recruiting of his majesty's troops with Irish papists, of the selling the forfeited estates at under rates, to the prejudice of the revenue, the embezzlement of the stores in the towns and garrisons taken from king James, as also of the forfeited estates and goods; and represented that certain additions made to the articles of Limerick, after the said articles had been signed, had given great encouragement to the Irish papists, and considerably weakened the English interest in that country. These abuses they most humbly besought his majesty to redress, particularly that the soldiers might be paid their arrears, and that no Irish papist might serve in the army there; that no grant might be made of the forfeited estates in Ireland, till there be an opportunity for settling that matter in parliament, &c. &c. To which the king answered in general terms, That what was amiss should be remedied. It was however noticed, that he granted large portions of these estates to the lord Portland and other of his favourites afterwards.

On the fourteenth day of March 1693, the king came to the house of lords, where, after having given the royal assent to several bills, he closed the session with a speech, in which he thanked the parliament for the large supplies they had given him, recommended the peace of their respective counties to their care, as also the levying the taxes equally. He told them that his presence was required abroad, but that he should leave a sufficient number of troops for the security of the kingdom, concluding, "That he should continue to expose his person upon all occasions, for the good and advantage of these kingdoms, assuring them that his hearty and sincere endeavours should never be wanting in any way to make England a great and flourishing nation;" and then by his majesty's command the parliament was prorogued to the second of May *.

During this session of parliament, in the month of December, sir John Trevor, speaker of the House of Commons, was made Master of the Rolls, in the room of Henry Powle, esq. deceased. He had enjoyed that place under king James. Sir Edward Ward was made attorney-general, which gave such disgust to sir Thomas Trevor, the solicitor-general, who thought he had a right to succeed to that office, that it was with great difficulty his friends could prevail on him not to resign his own place. About the latter end of January the king thought fit to dismiss admiral Russel, and gave the command of the fleet jointly to Henry Killigrew, esq. sir Ralph Delaval, and sir Cloudesley Shovel. George Rook, esq. was appointed vice-admiral of the red, George lord Berkeley vice-admiral of the blue, captain Matthew Aylmer rear-admiral of the red, and captain David Mitchel rear-admiral of the blue. On the 16th of February his majesty went down to Portsmouth to take a view of the fleet there; and dining on board with vice-admiral Rook, conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and now his majesty being about to embark for Holland, was pleased on the twenty-third of March to constitute John Somers, the attorney-general, lord-keeper of the great-seal, and sir John Frankland one of the principal secretaries of state: and at the same time sir John Lowther, Henry Priestman, esq. Anthony lord viscount Falkland, Robert Austen, esq. sir Robert Rich, Henry Killigrew, esq. and sir Ralph Delaval, were appointed lords commissioners of the admiralty.

We shall close this year, 1692, with some remarks on the state of our trade. Immense was the loss that England sustained in the two first years of her wars with France, by the captures made of her merchant ships by the French privateers; for by an account laid before the parliament this year, it appeared that they had taken from us no fewer than three thousand sail of trading vessels great and small; whereas we had during the same space of time taken from France only sixty-nine merchant ships: an alarming difference! But on the other hand, to balance in part this great misfortune, the strict prohibition of commerce by both nations during this war, proved the occasion of vast detriment to France, and advantage to us, by putting a stop to the importation of many of her most lucrative manufactures. Thus, in the first place, she was deprived of a most profitable linen-manufacture in dowlas and lockram, chiefly manufactured in Normandy and Brittany, of which it was said we took off to the value of two hundred thousand pounds yearly. In the next place, France before this war manufactured such good and cheap felt hats at Caudebec, Havre de Grace, and other places in Normandy, that by our prohibiting them we have gradually arrived at so great a perfection in that manufacture as to make them better, as well as cheaper, than the French can do. Again, before this war, the fine glass manufacture was almost entirely in the possession of France, who not only furnished us with almost all the glass for our coaches and chairs, and our fine looking-glasses, but also with our finest window-glass, which was usually called Normandy glass and French crown-glass: both which we have since made our own manufacture in the greatest perfection. Lastly, cutlery-ware, watches, toys, ribbands, &c. and particularly our broad silk manufacture, have been so greatly improved as even to out-do the French themselves. Hence our reader will readily conceive how great a blow the French must have received by this decrease of their manufactures.

In this same year several French refugees, studious to promote the interest of England, and to weaken France by impairing her manufactures, in conjunction with some English merchants, and being supported by the protection of the earl of Pembroke, whom they chose their governor, erected themselves into a company, called the Royal Lustring Company, and obtained the king's patent, whereby they were reputed a body-politic, having the full and sole privilege for the making of lustrings and alamodes in England. On the twenty-sixth of October this patent was read in full committee at their house in Austin-Friars; at which time the Company was assured by their governor of his majesty's satisfaction in this undertaking to such a degree, that all other encouragements might be expected for the promoting of it. And although by the change of fashion these silks are not at present much in request, yet the project greatly contributed to the improvement of the silk manufacture in general †.

I shall now proceed to the transactions of the year 1693.

King William having settled affairs at home on such a footing as he thought most likely to ensure the peace of his dominions during his absence, embarked for Holland, on the thirty-first of March, at Gravesend. On his arrival at the Hague, the second of April, the elector of Bavaria, having been appointed by the king of Spain governor of his territories in the Netherlands, sent the count d'Arco

An act for raising the militia in the year 1693. An act authorizing the judges to empower any person, except common attorneys and solicitors, to take special bail upon all actions and suits, unless the party live within ten miles of the capital. An act to encourage the apprehending of highwaymen, entitling every person, who should take a robber, to the sum of forty pounds; within one month after conviction, as also to the horse, furniture, and arms of the criminal, and such money as may be found upon him. An act to prevent clandestine mortgages. An act for the better discovery of judgments in the courts of law. And an act to prevent malicious informations in the court of King's bench, obliging every informer, that he will effectually prosecute the person, against whom he complains. to wait on his majesty, and compliment him on his arrival. The campaign this year began with several skirmishes on either frontier, with various success. A party of one hundred Newburghers suddenly entering the village of Multerne, surprized eighty French horse, which they brought prisoners, with their arms and baggage, to the general rendezvous; but in the mean while the French army broke into the Palatinate, and committed grievous outrages there, burning and plundering in such a manner as to lay the whole country waste. The war in Flanders was now pushed on with vigour; the duke of Wirtemberg was sent, with a strong detachment of horse and foot, to force the enemies lines, which they had drawn to secure that part of the Netherlands commonly called French Flanders. This he effected with much facility, and put the country for several leagues round under contribution, raising some millions of livres, and taking in several places much booty. This spirited enterprise greatly alarmed Luxemburg, the French general, who saw his honour at stake unless he performed some daring exploit to preserve it: accordingly he formed the bold design of obliging Wirtemberg to withdraw his forces. With this view he, in the first place, attempted, with fifty squadrons of horse, ten battalions of foot, and some field-pieces, to fall upon part of the garrisons of Liege and Maestricht, consisting of eighteen squadrons of horse and some regiments of foot, under count Tilly; but they, having received timely notice of his intentions, retreated over the river Sare, whilst three squadrons of horse kept the French in play, and beat back their advanced parties, thus securing the retreat of their own foot.

Luxemburg, thus baffled in the first of his schemes, fell upon a second, which was attended with greater success. King William, upon his joining the army in Flanders, had possessed himself of the strong camp of Landen, in Louvain; the allied army at that time did not consist of above seventy thousand men, and, besides, was considerably weakened by the detachments the king was obliged to send off, to reinforce the neighbouring garrisons; whereas the French army amounted to no less than one hundred and twenty thousand men. Luxemburg, conscious of his superiority over the confederate forces, and knowing that the king of England's camp must be greatly weakened by the many detachments lately sent off, especially that under the duke of Wirtemberg, resolved to attack his majesty in his camp, or at least to fall upon the rear of his army, should he attempt to retreat at the approach of the French. With this view he made a motion towards Liege, as if he intended to invest that place, and encamped at Heidelberg, about seven leagues from the camp of the confederates. On the eighteenth of July O. S. he began his march, in four columns, and passed the Sare without opposition. The king had marched out, a few days before, to relieve Huy, which the French had invested; but on his way he had news by his scouts, that Huy had surrendered, and that the van of the French army was advancing towards him, which they believed to be the fore-runner of the motion of the whole army. This made him change his march; for, having sent a detachment to strengthen the garrison of Liege, he directed his route to the neighbourhood of Hesperen, near Landen, and then halted to get more certain intelligence of the enemy's intention: there being informed that the whole French army was advancing against him, he resolved to keep his ground, and immediately drew up his forces in order of battle; but his disposition was so erroneous, that Luxemburg, as soon as he saw it, cried, "Now I believe that Waldeck is dead!" alluding to that general's known sagacity in chusing ground for an engagement.

Early next morning, the twenty-ninth of July, the French appeared on the high ground and hills of Gertruyden and Landen, and soon after descended, in good order, into the plains, though the cannon of the allies played on them very fiercely all the time. About eight in the morning they attacked the villages of Lare and Neer Winden (or Nerwinde) with great impetuosity. Luxemburg and the princes of France, at the head of the household troops, carried the village sword in hand two different times; but the instant the marshal turned another way, the allies retook it again. At length the French, out-numbering the confederates, pressed on with resistless fury, fresh men still supplying the ranks that were broken by the well-served artillery from the king's camp. Thus the battle increased, and held on till near sun-set, when Luxemburg having carried the village of Neer Winden a third time, and the confederates being wearied out with the heat of the day, and their long fatigue, the French forced their camp with their horse, and formed their lines, though with great loss. After this, making way for their whole army to follow, William, who had through the whole day signalized himself by the greatest efforts of courage and perseverance, giving every where the necessary orders, and leading up in person several troops and battalions to the charge, seeing all lost, and fearing that he should be surrounded by the enemy's victorious troops, drew off his army, and retreated in as good order as so pressing a situation would admit. After having paid the justice due to king William's personal courage, it must be acknowledged that Luxemburg shewed himself much the greater general, first by those feints and stratagems that induced the confederates to weaken their army by detachments, and then by forcing them in a camp which they looked upon as inaccessible. Few actions proved more bloody; there were about twenty thousand killed, including both sides, the French having lost eight, and the allies about twelve thousand men: the greatest loss of the latter fell on the foot, especially the English, who fought bravely to the last: the duke of Ormond was wounded in several places, and taken prisoner; and the count de Solmes had his leg shot off by a cannon-ball, of which he died in a few hours. The allies lost sixty pieces of cannon and nine mortars. The enemy, though they had gained the day, had little reason to boast of their victory: besides the common men, they lost two thousand officers, either killed or wounded, and were so much weakened that they either were not able or willing to pursue the confederates; while king William having sent to the duke of Wirtemberg to join him, and in a little time the scattered soldiers coming to their colours, the army was so well recruited, that in a few days it took the field again, and marched against the enemy, who thought fit to retire, having had enough of hot work for one campaign. This battle was called the Battle of Landen by the allies, and by the

the French the Battle of Neer Winden. The remaining part of the campaign produced nothing memorable, except the reduction of Charleroy, which, after sustaining a regular siege of six-and-twenty days, surrendered, on the tenth of September, to the enemy on honourable terms.

The French were equally successful in every other quarter, though the advantages they gained were generally purchased at a dear rate. In Catalonia they reduced Roses and the castle of Ampurias, a circumstance which threw the whole kingdom of Spain into the utmost consternation. But no where did the confederates receive so entire a defeat as at Marlaglia, in Piedmont, where the duke of Schomberg commanded the troops in English pay, and those celebrated generals, the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, his brother, the rest of that army. Catinat, the French general, obtained this victory by a stratagem never used before, which was making his soldiers screw their bayonets over the barrels of their pieces, and charge with them loaded: the generals of the allied army observing bayonets at the end of the enemies musquets, imagined they had been discharged, and were thrown into confusion; when they found their mistake, and were saluted with a terrible volley of shot. Soon after this action pikes began to be laid aside, and bayonets to be used in their room, all over Europe. Duke Schomberg was mortally wounded, and taken prisoner by the French in this engagement, which was fought on the fourth of October.

The English were as unsuccessful at sea this year, as the allies had been by land. About the middle of May the fleet assembled at St. Helen's, and soon after were joined by the Dutch, when they made a formidable appearance*, and every one expected something very considerable would be performed. It appeared, however, but too soon, that things were in a very distracted condition, and that the admirals had not proper orders to warrant their striking any blow of moment, and were too much divided in their opinions to undertake any thing of themselves: in short, the only service resolved on, was that sir George Rook should convoy the merchant-fleet going to the Mediterranean, amounting in all to about four hundred sail, belonging to England, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Hamburgh, and Flanders. Had this design been executed as soon as taken, it had been honourable for the nation and fortunate for the merchants; but such was the dilatoriness of either the admirals or the higher powers, that it was the beginning of June before this fleet sailed, and then we had no intelligence of the enemy's motions, but the admirals took their measures at random; a circumstance which, however disgraceful to our naval officers at that time, comes too well authenticated † to warrant a doubt, and is too important to be concealed. It was resolved that the combined fleets should accompany the trading vessels fifty leagues to the westward of Ushant, but were then to leave sir George Rooke, with a squadron of twenty-three ships of war, to proceed with them to their destined ports.

It was not long before the imprudence of these measures appeared: admiral Rooke had no sooner arrived off Cape St. Vincent, on the coast of Portugal, than he discovered, on the seventeenth of June, the French fleet, amounting to eighty sail, under the command of the counts de Tourville and d'Etrées. A council of war being called in this exigence, it was resolved that orders should be sent to the small ships that were near the land, and therefore not likely to keep up with the fleet, to use their utmost endeavours in the night to slip into the neighbouring ports of Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz, while the admiral should stand off to sea, with an easy sail, for the protection of the rest. About six in the evening, the French admiral and vice-admiral of the blue, which had the whole afternoon gained upon the squadron, notwithstanding all the sail they could make, came up with the leeward and sternmost ships of the confederate fleet; these were Dutch men of war, commanded by the captains Schrijver and Vander Poel, who, finding there was no probability of escaping, tacked-in for the shore, and thereby drew the enemy after them, which saved the rest of the fleet. The Dutch captains made a most obstinate defence, and for five hours together bravely fought, first eleven and then seven of the enemy's ships, till at length, overpowered by numbers, they were constrained to yield. Admiral Rooke stood off all night with a fresh gale, and the next morning saw fifty-four ships of the convoy about him; he also descried five sail of the enemy's ships to leeward, and one to windward, which last continued to dog him all that day. On the nineteenth the admiral sent for the officers of the men of war and merchant-ships on board, in order to get an account of the condition they were in, and to concert the proper measures for securing the remainder of the trade; the result was, that the admiral bore away for the Madeiras, where he hoped to meet with a part of his scattered fleet; and having provided himself at that place with wood and water, of which he stood in need, he set sail for Ireland, and on the third day of August arrived at Corke, with about fifty sail, including ships of war and trading vessels.

Had the French admirals pursued their advantage properly, there is hardly any probability that any part of the men of war or merchant-ships could have escaped; but either from a wrong disposition of their fleet, or from their orders not being obeyed by the commanders of the respective ships, they made but a very poor use of their prodigious superiority; not but that the English and Dutch trade sustained a severe loss by this attack: according to the best accounts, the marquis de Coetlogon took seven large Smyrna ships, and burnt or sunk four more at Gibraltar; and M. de Tourville and the count d'Etrées took two Dutch men of war, burnt a rich pinnace and an English man of war, took twenty-nine merchantmen, and destroyed about fifty more: the value of the cargoes and the men of war together, was computed at twenty millions of French livres, or one million sterling; whereas had the French admirals exerted themselves properly, they must have been gainers four millions. The sieur Du Mont, who then wrote a political journal in Holland, speaks thus of the matter: "It is certain that the French missed taking the greatest part of the convoy; and that sir George

* Of the English there were six first rates, nine second, twenty-six third, five fourths, two fifths, and three sixths, besides thirteen fireships; of the Dutch, six first rates, three second, fourteen third, six fourths, three sixths, and six fireships:

Rooke upon this occasion acquired infinitely more honour than those who commanded the French fleet: for the one, unable to resist such as attacked him, in the midst of threatening danger, by his prudence, dexterity, and courage, saved the best part of the fleet committed to his charge, at a time that the others suffered themselves to be deprived, by the superior skill of this admiral, of a booty which, if they could have kept it, fortune put into their hands." The French admirals next made an attempt to surprize Cadiz, but found the design impracticable. They then bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants sunk their ships to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands, who afterwards sailed along the coast of Spain, burnt some English and Dutch ships at Malaga and Alicant, and then returned to Toulon about the latter end of September.

On the nineteenth of the same month fifteen Dutch ships of the line of battle, and two frigates, were ordered by his majesty to Holland, and twenty-six men of war and seven fire-ships were assigned for the winter fleet, which it was then thought would have put an end to the naval operations of this year; but it soon after appeared that there was yet a secret expedition to be undertaken, in order to check the immoderate boasting of the French for their late successful exploits by sea.

Our trade had suffered most terrible losses for a considerable time by the privateers from St. Malo's: never did one port send out so great a number of these cruizers, nor any place acquire, in so short a space of time, so much wealth, without engaging in any trade. The sea was covered with their cruizers from the Channel to the Mediterranean, and their very names were dreaded by the merchants of London, Amsterdam, and Cadiz. The repeated complaints of the sufferers by this predatory war so alarmed our government, that a resolution was taken to make a descent and destroy St. Malo's, the nest of these formidable enemies to our trade: and commodore Benbow, in conjunction with captain Philips, a famous engineer, was appointed to the command of this expedition, who, with a squadron of twelve men of war, four bomb-ketches, and other vessels, sailed for St. Malo's, where they arrived on the sixteenth of November, and about four in the afternoon came to an anchor before the place. After bombarding the town for three days, on the night of the nineteenth, taking advantage of a fresh gale of wind, a strong tide, and very dark weather, they sent in a fire-ship of an extraordinary construction*, and which was intended to reduce the town to ashes: this it would unavoidably have done, but for an accident; for when she had got, unperceived by the enemy, within pistol-shot of the place where they intended to have moored her, a sudden flurry of wind drove her upon a rock, from which all the skill of those on board could not get her off. At last, the engineer who was on board finding her beginning to open, and fearing she might sink, set fire to her; the explosion of which was so terrible as to shake the whole town like an earthquake, unroofed three hundred houses, and broke all the glass and earthen-ware for three leagues round. The inhabitants were struck with such consternation, that a small body of troops might easily have taken the place: but the ministry, by an effect of their usual inattention, or somewhat worse, had sent out this squadron without a single soldier on board. Sir George Rooke's squadron was by this time arrived in England, and laid up. Thus ended the naval expeditions of this year, as little for the honour of the English nation as any that had ever been set on foot.

The discontents begotten by such a continued series of miscarriages, were too violent to be dormant: every mouth in the nation was opened against the ministers, whom they scrupled not openly to accuse of treachery. It was affirmed that the French court was privately acquainted with all the designs of ours, and were thereby enabled to take their measures for rendering them ineffectual; while the English remained, or affected to remain, in the most profound ignorance of the schemes of our adversaries. The weight of this accusation fell chiefly on the earl of Nottingham, Killigrew, and Delaval, two of the admirals, the marquis of Caermarthen, and the earl of Rochester. Certain it is, these persons were all then known to have been strongly attached to the late king, and were not yet reconciled to the present government, though possessing lucrative and honourable posts and employments under it. It is not for us rashly to assert that the accusations against these persons were absolutely true: it is sufficient to remark, that the proofs alleged in support of them were very striking, and that their conduct had given but too much occasion to unfavourable surmises.

While we were thus pining under our losses in England, the French were starving amidst their victories: that kingdom was afflicted with a dreadful famine, which swept off many thousands; and the whole nation was reduced to poverty and distress. Lewis XIV. in this conjuncture thought it his duty to free his people, if possible, from the burthen of that ruinous war in which his ambition had involved them. With this view he attempted to conclude a separate peace with some of the allies; but as his demands were still so high as to afford the allies no prospect of a just peace, these offers were rejected.

The campaign being now closed in Flanders, king William returned to England the latter end of the month of October, when his first care was to quiet the murmurings among his people, by making a total change in his ministry. The earl of Nottingham, secretary of state, was now laid aside, and his department filled by the earl of Shrewsbury. The command of the fleet was taken

* The reader may not be displeased to see a description of this famous engine of destruction: I shall therefore give it a place in this note, as I find it in Campbell's Lives of the Admirals, vol. iii. p. 103, 104. The French writers say that this was one of those dreadful machines, stiled Infernal, which the Dutch made use of to destroy the bridge over the Schelde, when the prince of Parma besieged Antwerp in the year 1585. The reader will perceive by the following description, that it was in fact a fire-ship, contrived to operate when moored close to the town walls. It was a new ship of about three hundred, or, as the marquis de Quincey says, 350 tons. At the bottom of the hold were one hundred barrels of powder: these were covered with pitch, sulphur, rosin, tow, straw, and faggots; over which lay beams bored through, to give air to the fire, and upon these lay three hundred carcasses, filled with granadoes, chain shot, iron bars, and the bottoms of glass bottles. There were six holes or mouths to let out the flames, which were so vehement as to consume the hardest substances, and could be checked by nothing but the pouring in of hot water.

out of the hands of the commissioners, and committed solely to the gallant admiral Ruffel: in a word, the Tory party were in general forced to make way for their adversaries the Whigs, such only of the former who were thought staunch to the present government being continued in office. These measures were chiefly owing to the representations of the earl of Sunderland, who had acquired a considerable influence with his majesty, and had found means to persuade him that the Whigs were his only true friends, while the Tories, under a mark of pretended loyalty to him, were in their hearts devoted to the interests of the late sovereign: and yet it seems hard to reconcile this imputation with the conduct they had observed ever since the Revolution; for no parliament ever contributed more bountifully to the necessities of the state than this (which was chiefly composed of those called Tories) had done. It is no wonder indeed that king William should shew distinguishing marks of favour to the earl of Sunderland, who, by the intelligence he afforded him when prince of Orange, and the double part he acted towards king James, contributed principally to the success of the Revolution: but I shall forbear entering into remarks, in which it will be impossible to please all my readers.

On the king's coming over a thanksgiving was observed for his preservation in the field, and his safe return. The parliament meeting on the seventh of November, his majesty made a speech to both houses, wherein he took notice of the several disadvantages the confederates had received by land, and of our own miscarriages at sea: "The former, he said, were occasioned by the superior numbers of the enemy in all places: as to the latter, he told them he would make them the particular objects of his strict enquiry; promised to inflict condign punishment on such as should, upon trial, appear to have been wanting in their duty; and would use his utmost endeavours that our naval power should be rightly managed for the future. He recommended to the parliament the increasing our forces by sea and land, as the allies, he said, had resolved to increase theirs. He then concluded with desiring the commons to take such timely resolutions that their supplies might be effectual, and our preparations in that forwardness, as to ensure the safety and honour of the nation §."

The commons, in answer to this speech, unanimously resolved, "that they would support their majesties and their government, and grant a sufficient supply for the vigorous prosecution of the war." But before they proceeded upon that matter, they thought proper to make enquiry into the miscarriages of the fleet last summer. Bishop Burnet's account of this enquiry is so concise, and at the same time so strong and to the purpose, that I think myself obliged to lay it before the reader, as the best information he can receive on this head.

"The enquiry into the conduct at sea (says that right reverend author *), particularly with relation to the Smyrna fleet, took up much time, and held long. Great exceptions were taken to the many delays, by which it seemed a train was laid, that they should not get out of our ports till the French were ready to lie in their way, and intercept them. Our want of intelligence was much complained of; the instructions that the admirals, who commanded the fleet, had received from the cabinet-council, were thought ill-given, and yet worse executed: their orders seemed weakly drawn, ambiguous, and defective; nor had they shewed any zeal in doing more than strictly to obey such orders; they had very cautiously kept within them, and had been very careful never to exceed them in a tittle. They had used no diligence to get certain information concerning the French fleet, whether it was still in Brest, or had sailed out; but in that important matter they had trusted general and uncertain reports too easily: nor had they sailed far enough with Rooke to see him past danger. To all this their answer was, that they had observed their orders; they had reason to think the French were still in Brest; that therefore it was not safe to sail too far from the coast of England, when they had, as they understood, ground to believe that they had left behind them a great naval force, which might make an impression on our coast, when they were at too great a distance from it. The getting certain intelligence from Brest was represented as impracticable. They had many specious things to say in their own defence, and many friends to support them; for it was now the business of one party to accuse, and of another to justify their conduct. In conclusion, there was not ground sufficient to condemn the admirals, since they had followed their instructions, so a vote passed in their favour." A protest, however, against this resolution was entered by several peers †, who mentioned a number of facts which reflected greatly on the conduct of the admirals.

On the twenty-fifth of November the commons proceeded to take into consideration the estimates and supplies for the ensuing year, when they voted the following sums; viz. five hundred thousand pounds to pay the arrears due to the seamen, two millions for the service of the fleet, and two millions five hundred thousand pounds and upwards, for the army, which it was resolved to increase to the number of eighty-three thousand one hundred and twenty-one men, including officers; and there appearing a deficiency of one hundred and eighteen thousand pounds in the late annuity-act, this was agreed to be made good by enlarging the time for paying in the sum of one million, intended to be raised by that act; and towards raising the money for the maintenance of the fleet, it was agreed that any person might add a second life to the life already named in the annuity-act, upon paying thirty-five pounds more to every hundred already paid in; and a third life for the farther sum of twenty pounds ‡.

The king coming to the house on the twenty-fifth of January, gave the royal assent to an act for raising four shillings in the pound upon lands; to an act for the importation of Italian thrown silk; and to some other acts of lesser moment; but he again refused the place-bill, which so piqued the commons that they passed, the next day, the following vote: "That whoever had advised the king not to give the royal assent to that bill, was an enemy to their majesties and the kingdom §." They also drew up an address, or representation, which they presented to his majesty, wherein they expressed themselves in the following terms: "That it was with great grief of heart they observed, since his majesty's accession, that this and several other bills had not obtained the royal assent, which they could not impute to any other cause than the insinuations of particular persons, who took upon them, for their own private ends, to advise his majesty contrary to the advice given him by his parliament." To which address his majesty returned an answer, thanking them for their zeal, professing his attachment to the constitution of the kingdom, assuring them that he was fully sensible of the absolute necessity of a good understanding between the sovereign and his people, and declaring that he would look upon all those as his enemies who should endeavour to lessen that mutual confidence. This answer, however, appeared too vague and general to many in the house, and therefore they made a motion, "that his majesty should be intreated to return a more particular answer;" but the question being put, it was carried in the negative by a great majority, two hundred and twenty-nine against twenty-eight.

On the sixteenth of December, the earl of Bellamont having presented articles of impeachment against Thomas, lord Coningsby, and sir Charles Porter, two of the late lords justices in Ireland, the commons, after several debates, agreed that there were not sufficient grounds to found a charge of high-treason upon. If the lords-justices had been guilty of any arbitrary and violent proceedings, the earl of Bellamont, by bringing a charge so much above the nature of the offence, defeated his own design.

But the lord Falkland, a member of the commons, did not escape so well; for Mr. Harley, one of the commissioners for taking and stating the public accounts, delivered a report to the house, which contained a charge of peculation against that nobleman, for having received from his majesty two thousand pounds, contrary to the usual method of issuing and bestowing the king's money. Upon examination he was found guilty of a high misdemeanor and breach of trust, and committed to the Tower, there to continue during the pleasure of the house. He was, however, set at liberty a very short time afterwards*.

The revenues of the city of London having in some former times been under bad management, the fund for the orphans of freemen was suffered to run so far in arrears, that the chamber of London was shut for several years: hereof great complaints were made at sundry times; at length the magistracy coming into better hands, they, in this session, obtained an act of parliament "for the relief of the orphans and other creditors of the city of London," by which the city was empowered to pay the yearly interest of these sums at the rate of four per cent. This act consisted of several articles, extending to different charges on the city-lands, aqueducts, personal estates, and imposing duties on binding apprentices, and admitting freemen, as also upon wines and coals imported into London †.

The East India company having, on the eleventh of November this year, 1693, obtained a new charter ‖, some merchants moved the house of commons against the same, entreating them to erect a new company; whereupon the house having examined the charter of the old company, the book of new subscriptions, the state of the present stock, and the petition of the merchants, resolved, on the nineteenth of January, "that all the subjects of England have equal right to trade to the East Indies, unless prohibited by act of parliament." This gave the first hint to forming a new East India company by statute.

Among other expedients for raising money this year, the parliament hit upon one that was not thought of before, which was by way of lottery, for which certain duties upon salt, beer, and ale, were assigned as a fund; and by this means a million of money was raised to defray the charges of the war.

On the twenty-eighth of February the royal assent was given to the bill for making good the deficiencies of the late annuity-act; to an act to prevent disputes concerning the royal mines; and on the twenty-third of March to an act for granting certain aids on salt, and on beer and ale, to be a fund for the intended lottery. This session is also memorable for the first erection of the present most useful and laudable corporation of the Bank of England, which has not only proved extremely beneficial to commerce, but has also, on many emergencies, been a great support to the public credit

"II. Seven hundred and forty-four thousand pounds shall be the whole capital of the company.

"III. None shall subscribe above ten thousand pounds.

"IV. In general courts, one thousand pounds stock to have one vote; nor none shall have above ten votes.

"V. Such as shall become proprietors by purchase, shall pay for their freedom five pounds, who (as also the new subscribers) shall take the oaths appointed by law, and also the freeman's oath.

"VI. The governor, or, in his absence, the deputy-governor, to have a casting vote in all courts; each of them to have four thousand pounds in their own right; and each committeeman one thousand pounds. [They had not as yet got the modern name of Directors]

"VII. No permission shall be granted for ships to India on a private account, on penalty of forfeiting the Charters.

"VIII. No private contract is to be made for sale of the company's goods (salt-petre only excepted, sold for the king's use), but all to be openly and publicly sold; and no one lot (jewels excepted) to exceed five hundred pounds value.

"IX. The company shall annually export to India, of the growth and product of England, to the value of at least one hundred thousand pounds.

"X. The company shall annually supply the crown with five hundred tons of salt-petre, at thirty-eight pounds ten shillings per ton in time of peace, and at forty-five pounds in time of war.

"XI. All dividends of the company's profits shall, for the future, be made in money only.

"XII. A book hereafter to be kept by the company, wherein the value of their stock shall be entered, as attested upon oath; and to be viewed by all concerned: and the like as to all mortgages, alienations, transfers, and Assignments.

"XIII. The joint-stock of the company shall continue for twenty-one years; and one year before its expiration, books shall lie open for new subscriptions to a new joint-stock." Anderson, vol. ii. p. 199, 200.

of the nation : and it is, indeed, somewhat strange that a public or general bank, capable of not only supporting its own credit by a paper-currency, for the benefit of trade (especially in respect to large payments), but also for assisting or supporting the national credit, was not sooner established in a country so much abounding in wealth and commerce.

We must not forget to observe, that a new corporation was erected by an act of parliament this session, for the Greenland trade, by the name of the Company of Merchants of London trading to Greenland, with the usual powers of succession, &c. this company having already subscribed forty thousand pounds for that end : the master and only one third of the mariners of each vessel employed in this trade, to be natives of this kingdom, the want of English harponeers being then very great ; the ships were to be English built. This corporation was to exist for only fourteen years, from the first of October, 1694*.

On the twenty-third of March the Bank-act was passed, as was also another act for granting to their majesties several duties on vellum, parchment, and paper ; and a third for raising money by licensing hackney and stage-coaches and chairs. Thus there were granted this session, for the ordinary and extraordinary charges of the government, upwards of six millions. Besides the acts of supply, and those already mentioned, there passed several other acts, which the reader will find in the note at the bottom of the page†.

These being all ready for the royal assent, and his majesty being impatient to return to the continent, he came to the house of peers on the twenty-fifth of April, 1694, and closed the session with a short speech, in which he thanked the commons for the large supplies they had given ; and as the posture of affairs made his absence necessary, he recommended it to both houses to preserve the public peace ; then the lord-keeper, by his majesty's command, prorogued the parliament till the eighteenth of September ; and soon after this prorogation the king bestowed the following honours and preferments : lord Butler, brother to the duke of Ormond, was created lord Butler of Weston in England, and earl of Arran in Ireland. The earl of Shrewsbury was dignified with the title of duke : the earl of Mulgrave was gratified with a pension of three thousand pounds, and the title of marquis of Normandy : Henry Herbert, esq. was ennobled by the title of baron Herbert of Cherbury, in the county of Salop : the earls of Bedford and Devonshire were promoted to the rank of dukes : the marquis of Caermarthen was made duke of Leeds : the earl of Clare, duke of Newcastle : lord viscount Sidney, earl of Rumney : and the viscount Newport, earl of Bradford. Peregrine Bertie was appointed vice-chamberlain to his majesty, in the room of sir John Lowther, who resigned : admiral Russel, sir George Rooke, and sir John Houblon, were appointed commissioners of the admiralty : Charles Montague was made chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer : and lord Godolphin, sir Stephen Fox, sir William Trumball, and John Smith, were constituted commissioners of the Treasury.

There were several occurrences that happened in the year 1693 that must not be passed over in silence, though I chose to give the preference to the proceedings in parliament, and to continue them to the end of the session without interruption.

The whole presbyterian party in Scotland were now again in the king's interest : the matters of the church were now brought into better temper than was expected. The episcopal clergy had more moderate terms offered them : they were only required to make an address to the general-assembly, offering to subscribe to a general confession of faith, and to acknowledge presbytery to be the only government of that church, with a promise to submit to it ; upon which, within a fortnight after such submission and subscription, if no matter of scandal was objected to them, the assembly was either to receive them into the government of the church ; or if they could not be brought to that, the king was to take them into his protection, and maintain them in their churches, without any dependence on the presbytery. The Scottish parliament augmented their taxes so as to proportion them to the maintenance of six thousand three hundred men, to supply the magazines of the kingdom with arms and stores, and to satisfy the country for their arrears and quarters ; so that the whole sum then given amounted to one hundred and fifty-six thousand pounds sterling, to be raised in eighteen months, by a poll-tax, an excise upon beer and malt, and by continuing the cess upon land, which was then to last seven months and an half to ten months and an half beyond that term. Duke Hamilton, who had for some time withdrawn from business, was now prevailed on to resume it, and was appointed his majesty's high-commissioner to this parliament, which met on the eighteenth of April 1693. The Jacobite party, however, and the discontented Highlanders were very busy all this year in cutting out work for the government ; and they even made a proposition, which if the court of St. Germain's had accepted, as it appeared to be its interest to do, might have thrown the nation into great cabals and disorders : this was no other than that king James should offer to resign his title in favour of his son, and send him to be bred up in England under the directions of the parliament till he should be of age ; but for some reasons this was not complied with†.

A parliament had been summoned this year in Ireland ; but they met full of discontent, so that the lord Sidney, the lord-lieutenant, dismissed them before they had brought any of their bills to perfection. There were indeed great complaints of an ill administration in that government, chiefly in the revenue, in the paying of the army, and in the embezzling of the stores, which made much noise in England, and, as we have related, occafioned both houses of parliament to address his majesty upon the subject; the result of which was, that the king recalled the lord Sidney (who was afterwards made master of the ordnance) and put the government of Ireland into the hands of three lords-justices, viz. lord Capel, sir Cecil Wych, and Mr. William Duncomb, who had lately been ambassador extraordinary to the court of Sweden.

On the twenty-fourth of November this year died the most reverend father in God, Dr. William Sancroft, late archbishop of Canterbury, who had retired to a little estate he had at Fretchingfield in Suffolk, where, by his own direction, he was buried in the church-yard of that place.

On the thirty-first of December prince Lewis of Baden arrived at Gravesend, and continued in England till the fourteenth of February; during which time he concerted measures with the king, and was treated with singular respect, and at a great expence, not only by his majesty, but also by several of the nobility, particularly the duke of Ormond.

The duke of Schomberg, commander of the forces in Piedmont, in the pay of Great Britain, being killed, as has been related, at the battle of Marsaglia in the last campaign, monsieur de Ruigny, who had been so instrumental in the reduction of Ireland, and for his services had been lately honoured by his majesty with the title of earl of Galway in that kingdom, was this winter appointed to the command of those forces in the duke's stead, and at the same time received the character of his majesty's envoy-extraordinary to the duke of Savoy.

In the beginning of the year 1694 the nation sustained a great misfortune in the fate of sir Francis Wheeler, who with three men of war, and several Turkey ships of great value, were lost in a most terrible storm on the nineteenth of February, off Gibraltar-Bay, in the Mediterranean. The Suffex, on board which the admiral was, foundered, and himself, with all his crew, to the number of five hundred and fifty, were lost. The admiral's body was soon after found on a sand-bank in his shirt and slippers, from whence it was conjectured that he had thrown himself over-board, in order to save his life, if possible, by swimming. His body was afterwards embalmed and sent to England.

His majesty having settled all affairs in England, embarked for Holland on the sixth of May 1694, and after a very short passage got safe into the Brill in Holland, from whence he set out for the Hague, where having presided at an assembly of the States, he went to Loo; at which place he remained till matters were ripe for opening the campaign in Flanders, which, as we shall hereafter see, proved a very languid one.

In Spain indeed the French exerted themselves with great activity, and their arms were attended with no less success. Lewis, pursuing his project of obtaining a separate peace, in order to relieve the miseries his subjects suffered from famine, and the other melancholy consequences of a long war, had applied to the court of Spain to induce them to accept a separate peace, and to declare the duke of Anjou, one of his grandsons, heir to that crown; but these overtures being rejected, Lewis proposed this spring to have forced the Spaniard into his measures, by invading that kingdom by sea and land, and particularly on the side of Catalonia. With this view the marshal de Noailles, taking the field early in the spring, advanced at the head of thirty thousand men to the banks of the Ter, and forced the passage of that river on the twenty-eighth day of May, in the face of sixteen thousand of the Spanish forces encamped there to oppose him. After that he proceeded to Palamos, which he immediately invested; while the combined squadrons of Brest and Toulon, under Tourville and d'Estrees, kept it blocked up by sea. On the seventh of June the place was taken by storm, and the French exercised great cruelties on the wretched inhabitants, which struck the Spaniards with such dread, that they immediately withdrew their garrisons out of Felieu de Quixolo and the castle of St. Elmo, with which they reinforced that of Gironne, a town well fortified, and capable of holding out a long siege: yet such was the panic that prevailed among the soldiers, that it submitted on the nineteenth of June, upon very humiliating terms. From Gironne Noailles led his troops before Ostalric, a town on the road to Barcelona, which he carried without meeting with the smallest resistance. This success encouraged the marshal, after having given his troops time to refresh themselves, on account of the extreme heat of the country at that season, to attempt the reduction of Barcelona, the capital, and the only fortified town in the province of Catalonia now remaining to the Spaniards. His plan was to attack the town both by sea and land at the same time, and upon meeting with the success he expected, he intended afterwards to have secured the whole sea-coast of Spain, destroying every town of any note he came to. These designs however were happily frustrated, by the arrival of the English admiral Russel in the Mediterranean, with a numerous fleet under his command.

King William having been previously informed of the enemy's design upon Barcelona, had resolved to send a strong fleet up the Mediterranean, as well to assist the king of Spain, as to prevent the Toulon squadron from coming into the Ocean, and thereby hindering the French from making any figure this year at sea. With this view all imaginable pains had been taken both in England and Holland to fit out a more numerous fleet, and to send it earlier to sea than in any year since the war began. Accordingly Russel, who, as we have already observed, was again appointed to the command of the fleet, sailed from St. Helen's on the third of May with the combined squadrons, consisting of fifty-two English, and forty-one Dutch ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, and other smaller vessels: but when he came off Brest, he found the squadron that had been fitted out there under Tourville, had already quitted that harbour. Upon which he determined to follow them: but being informed by the captain of a Swedish ship, that there was a fleet of French merchant ships laying in an harbour near Conquet-Bay, he detached captain Pritchard, in the Monmouth, with the Roebuck and Resolution fire-ships, to attempt the taking or destroying them. This service Pritchard performed so effectually, that out of fifty-five sail he burnt or sunk thirty-five, and drove the man of war, which was to protect them, ashore on the rock, where she was lost. The admiral, not having been able to find the Brest fleet, returned to St. Helen's, which he again left on the twenty-ninth; and, after having detached several of his ships to go upon the intended expedition against Brest, of which we shall speak hereafter, he proceeded for the Mediterranean with the rest. On the twenty-fifth of June he arrived off the Rock of Lisbon, where he was joined by rear-admiral Neville from Cadiz, together with the Dutch vice-admirals Callemberg and Evertzen, with sixteen ships of the line, which increased the number of those already under his command to sixty-three. Russel now made the best of his way for Barcelona, in order to save that city and the province of Catalonia from falling into the hands of the French, who had by this time blocked it up both by land and sea. On his appearance before that place on the last day of July, the French admirals, not being able to look such a fleet in the face, returned, pursuant to their orders, into the harbour of Toulon, and Noailles abandoned his enterprize. The siege of Barcelona was now raised, to the infinite joy of the king of Spain, whose empire was just before reduced to the most desperate condition. The French durst not appear at sea while Russel continued in the Mediterranean, which he did all the winter of this year; and it was now out of dispute that France was no longer in a condition, as she had vainly boasted, to give laws to the other maritime powers*.

The death of the bishop and prince of Liege towards the beginning of this year, gave the French a fair prospect of embroiling the affairs of the confederates on that side; but the elector of Cologne being chosen in his room against the cardinal of Bouillon, whom the French court had put up and strongly supported in this election, together with the great power of the allies in Flanders this campaign, changed the face of affairs, greatly to the disadvantage of Lewis. The confederate army under king William's command took the field the latter end of June, and encamped at Mont St. André, consisting of thirty-one thousand horse and dragoons, and fifty-one thousand foot, all prime troops; besides a body of seven thousand men under count Thian near Ghent. The French were not much inferior in number: but the dauphin of France, who commanded in person, declared that he had orders not to stir out of his camp so long as the allies continued in theirs; so that these two great armies continued looking at each other only, and waiting to take their advantages, till the latter end of the year, when king William attempted to pass the Schelde, and force the French lines; but was disappointed by an incredible swift march of the enemy, who thereby prevented the allies from penetrating into French Flanders, where, considering their strength, they would in all probability have made some important conquest, or at least secured winter-quarters. The king having in vain, by marches and counter-marches, endeavoured to bring the French to an engagement, gave orders for besieging Huy, which was accordingly invested by the count de Tilly, in the beginning of September, and after a siege of ten days surrendered to the allies, by whom it was garrisoned. By this conquest the bishopric of Liege was secured from the insults of the French; and now the season advancing for putting an end to the campaign on this side, William, after having ordered Dixmuyde, Deynse, Nivove, and Tillemont, to be secured for winter-quarters to part of the army, quitted the camp on the last day of September. The dauphin soon afterwards left his army, and returned to Versailles, and both camps broke up about the middle of October. Thus ended this fruitless campaign in Flanders, not a little to the mortification of the confederates, especially the Dutch and English, who loudly complained of being obliged to bear the burthen of such an expensive war to so little purpose, either in point of honour or advantage.

On the side of the Rhine the prince of Baden, at the head of the Imperialists, being impatient of action, crossed the river, and marched towards the French under marshal de Lorges, who being apprized of the prince's motions, retired towards Landau. In this retreat however great part of his rear was cut off by the Imperialists, who, as the French still retreated before them, advanced and plundered several towns in their way, and then returned unopposed, having raised contributions all over the adjacent country, and made a very considerable booty; and thus ended the campaign in Germany.

The war was carried on with as little spirit in Piedmont; for though the duke of Savoy had openly rejected the terms which had been offered him by France after his defeat at Marsaglia, he yet engaged in secret negotiations with that court, which made him neglect the military operations of the campaign, notwithstanding the pressing remonstrances of Ruvigny, lord Galway, who, as we have before observed, had succeeded the duke of Schomberg in the command of the British forces in that country. Casal indeed was blocked up by the reduction of Fort St. George, and the Vaudois gained some petty advantages in the Valley of Ragelas; but no enterprize of importance was attempted during the whole campaign.

King William, persuaded that there was no way left effectually to humble France, but by carrying the war into her own bowels, had, before his departure from England, concerted a plan to make a descent on Brest, and other places on her sea-coast. The execution of this was committed to lieutenant-general Talmash. Accordingly, when admiral Russel sailed with the grand fleet for the Streights in June this year, the lord Berkeley, with thirty sail of men of war and transports, having a body of six or seven thousand men on board, under the command of the afore-named general, was ordered to make a descent at Camaret-Bay, near Brest, in order to ruin that harbour, or render it useless to the French. There is a high rock or promontory that runs up from Camaret to the entrance of the harbour of Brest, which whoever is master of, may command the shipping going in and out. This promontory is joined to the continent by a narrow isthmus, which it was proposed to possess ourselves of, and which might be defended with four or five thousand men against any force that could have been brought against it. By the possession of this important spot, where we were to have built a fort, we should not only have prevented the French from assembling their fleets there as usual, but have had it in our power to make incursions into the province of Brittany at pleasure. Had this succeeded, the French would not have had one port upon the Ocean fit for receiving their large men of war: but the French king being apprised of the design, as indeed he was at this time of most that we formed, and sensible of the fatal consequence it would be attended with, had taken care, under the conduct of the famous engineer Vauban, to have the isthmus, the rock, and all the avenues to it, so fortified as to render it inaccessible. An army had also been drawn down, twice the number of ours which was to attack them; and strong batteries were raised, that commanded every place where there appeared the least possibility of landing. Such was the state of the place, when our fleet, having on board the lord Berkeley, general Talmash, the marquis of Caermarthen, the lord Cutts, and other brave commanders, arrived before it on the seventh of June.

The disadvantages of making an attempt upon a place well prepared for annoyance, as well as defence, was warmly represented by several of the officers to general Talmash, and he was advised not to expose himself or his men: to which he answered, "This advice comes too late; the honour of the English nation is at stake, and therefore I must and will land." Hereupon the marquis of Caermarthen, with great bravery, stood in with seven or eight of the men of war, and came to an anchor very near the shore, in order to cover the descent of our troops. He had not been long in this station before he found himself exposed to a most terrible fire from several batteries, none of which they discovered till they felt the shot from them. The marquis, however, not in the least daunted, kept up a brisk and continual fire from his ships, in return. The first eight hundred men that went on shore in the boats were commanded by general Talmash in person; who was no sooner landed but he found the enterprize impracticable, and made a signal to retreat; but it happening to be tide of ebb, the boats stuck fast upon the ooze, and the men being all the while exposed to the fire from the batteries, and the troops in the entrenchments, no less than six hundred of them were slain; and a squadron of the French coming down to the shore, obliged those that were left alive to lay down their arms and demand quarter. Upon this several other boats full of men, who were hasting from the fleet to land and join their comrades, returned on board with precipitation. The boat in which general Talmash was, did indeed fortunately get off, but not till that gallant officer had received a wound in his thigh by a ball, of which he died at sea on his return to England. The ships that covered the descent were also very roughly handled, having lost six or seven hundred of their men, and their masts and rigging almost cut in pieces by the batteries from the shore. The marquis of Caermarthen however brought them all off, with infinite difficulty and hazard, except a Dutch frigate of thirty guns, which fell into the hands of the enemy: a council of war being now called on board the lord Berkeley's ship, it was resolved to return immediately to Spithead*, where the fleet arrived on the fifteenth of June: there they found the queen's orders to call a council of war, to consider how the ships and troops might be best employed. After several consultations, it was resolved to make some attempts on the coast of Normandy: accordingly, putting to sea on the twenty-seventh of June, after being driven about for some time by hard and contrary winds, they arrived before Dieppe on the 8th of July, and on the twelfth they began to play upon the town, and continued firing without ceasing for the space of twelve hours, during which time they threw one thousand one hundred bombs and carcases into the town: and the streets being narrow, the houses old, and most of them built of timber, the town was set on fire in twenty places at once; so that the far greater part of it was consumed to ashes. After this execution, the English squadron sailed along the coast, and obliged the French troops quartered thereabouts to march night and day, in order to be ready, in case we should attempt a descent, which however was no part of the admiral's orders. On the fifteenth, about noon, the lord Berkeley came off Havre de Grace, and about four o'clock began to bombard it. The marquis de Quincy says, that but very few houses were destroyed on this occasion: however, he owns that not only the inhabitants, but the soldiers, of which the French had poured in great numbers, laboured excessively in putting out the fires wherever the bombs fell, which must have been attended with great loss of men. On the other hand, this could not be done without loss on our side; for during this service, which lasted, with intervals, six days, the Grenada bomb vessel was blown up, with all the men on board, and several other of the smaller craft so shattered, that it was thought convenient to retire, and the fleet returned to St. Helen's on the twenty-fifth of July to refit. An attempt was afterwards made, by a squadron under sir Cloudesley Shovel, upon Dunkirk: but as that place was well fortified, and strongly garrisoned, the design at last was found impracticable, and sir Cloudesley drew off his ships; but in his way home he came before Calais; and sent the bomb-vessel in, which discharged so many shells upon the town, that about forty houses were ruined. After this the admiral returned with his whole squadron into the Downs. Secretary Burchet, in speaking of these bombarding expeditions, gives it as his opinion (and indeed it seems to be a just one) that the expence the nation was put to by them, was more than equivalent to what the enemy suffered by them†.

* The marquis of Caermarthen, in his account of this desperate action, does great justice to all the officers employed therein. He says (page 46.) "My lord Berkeley, during all this expedition, has had a great deal of unusual trouble, by reason of the embarkation of the soldiers: notwithstanding which, both by his advice at councils of war and issuing orders, which his lordship has done very methodically, he hath behaved himself, in my opinion, with all the conduct and prudence that could be expected from a gentleman in his station."

† Lieutenant-general Talmash, the earl of Macclesfield, my lord Cutts, and all the officers of the land-forces, I think, have shewn all the forwardness and readiness imaginable for the attempting any thing that was possible to be done on this occasion. There are no officers of note, that I can yet hear of, killed in this action but monsieur Lamote, and lieutenant-general Talmash died the Tuesday following of the wound he received in his thigh."

† Naval Memoirs, p. 234.

The government, however, seem to have seen the matter in another light; for a medal was struck on the bombarding of Havre, which had on one side the king's head in profile, with these words, GULIELMUS MAGNUS INVICTISSIMUS: on the reverse, Perillus' bull, with this inscription, suis PERIT IGNIBUS AUCTOR; alluding to the French king's having begun this barbarous kind of war, by burning the Palatinate, and bombarding Genoa. In the exergue were these words, PORTUS GRATIÆ EXUSTUS ET EVERsus BOMBARDIS ANGLO BATAVIS, 1694.

No domestic transaction of any moment happened in England during the king's absence, if we except the affair of colonel Parker, who was apprehended and committed to the Tower, having been charged with a design to assassinate his majesty some time before. This man, according to Mr. Oldmixon*, knew so much of the designs of the Jacobite party, that they used all their endeavours to get him out of prison, as he was looked upon as the most daring and desperate, as well as the most active and bloody, of all king James's agents. While he was in the Tower a person came and offered to procure him his liberty for two hundred pounds. Parker told him he should have three: upon which, by this man's means, he got out of the Tower in the night of the eleventh of August, and made his escape to France, though a reward of four hundred pounds was offered for apprehending him.

The campaign in Flanders being closed, and his majesty having settled the affairs of the confederacy at the Hague, embarked the eighth of November at Helvoetsluys, and the next day landed at Margate. He lay that night at Rochester: the day following he came to Kensington; and on Monday the 12th the parliament met, when the king opened the session with a short speech, wherein he observed, "That the designs of the French had been disappointed by sending a fleet into the Mediterranean, and this year a stop had been put to the progress of their arms; and earnestly recommended the providing supplies to prosecute the war with vigour, as the only effectual means to procure an honourable peace. He put them in mind that the act of tonnage and poundage, given for the civil list, would expire at Christmas; and hoped they would continue that revenue to the crown, and also take care for discharging the debt for the transport ships employed in the reduction of Ireland, which was still undischarged †."

This session proved the most unanimous and tranquil of any held during this reign: the supplies demanded by the government were very weighty; little less than five millions! ‡ but they were granted without any opposition. In order to raise this sum, the land-tax of four shillings in the pound was continued; the subsidy of tonnage and poundage renewed for five years; and certain rates and duties were imposed upon marriages, births and burials, bachelors and widows. An act was passed for laying additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate, towards discharging the debt for the transport ships; and another, imposing duties upon glass-wares, stone and earthen bottles, coals, and culm.

The commons, however, while they were shewing their loyalty to their sovereign in the liberality of their grants, forgot not what they looked upon as their own interest and that of the nation; the triennial bill, or bill for the frequent meeting and calling of parliaments, was now insisted on afresh, as the price of these compliances: and William, unable to resist the repeated applications of his subjects, or unwilling to ruffle a parliament that appeared in such a favourable disposition for giving, gave the royal assent to this bill on the twenty-second of December. It enacted, that a new parliament should be summoned every third year; and that the present parliament should cease and determine before the first day of January 1696, unless their majesties should think fit to dissolve it sooner. Universal was the joy expressed by the people on the passing this act; they fondly imagined that the door was now effectually shut to all those methods of corruption which long parliaments had given birth to; but they soon found themselves miserably deceived: candidates had still the same ends to answer; ministers had still favourite points to carry; and, in proportion as the time was shorter for them to accomplish their ends in, they were induced to bid up higher, and, more generally, to carry a majority.

About this period died Dr. John Tillotson, archbishop of Canterbury, being in his sixty-third year. He had filled the metropolitan chair from the deprivation of archbishop Sancroft in 1690. Few prelates ever left behind them a more excellent character: no writer ever exceeded, few, very few, have equalled him in sacred composition, his sermons being to this day read with equal pleasure and instruction, by those who do not deem it too unfashionable to peruse works of that kind. He was succeeded by Dr. Tennison, bishop of Lincoln, who was also indulged with the permission of recommending Dr. Gardiner to the bishopric from which he had been translated. Most people, however, thought that Dr. Stillingfleet was better qualified for the archiepiscopal function; but he had too little of the courtier about him to be trusted in a station of that importance.

Queen Mary did not long survive her favourite prelate. She was taken ill of the small-pox; a distemper which had proved fatal to several of her family, on the twenty-first of December, and died the twenty-eighth, in the thirty-third year of her age, and in the sixth of her joint reign. Mary, though perhaps not quite so perfect as her panegyrists have made her, was certainly an excellent woman, and had many virtues which adorn the sex. Her charity was extensive, and without ostentation. She was an example of conjugal affection, beyond most we meet with in her exalted station, the will of the king her husband being the sole rule of all her actions; and to this only we can impute the little reluctance she discovered in mounting the throne from which her father had been deposed, by the assistance of that husband to whom, probably, she thought herself more strictly bound, than by any other earthly ties. Her treatment of her sister Anne is not perhaps so easily to be justified: all we shall therefore attempt to bring, in extenuation of her conduct in this respect is, that Mary was not exempt from those failings which are the necessary attendants on human nature. She was in her person tall and well proportioned: her shape, till latterly, was easy and genteel, but began to be somewhat clogged: with a light brown complexion, and a visage perfectly oval, she had a quick and lively eye, and a pleasing regularity of features: she had a natural air of greatness that commanded respect, which was however tempered by a graceful countenance and an affable disposition. Her apprehension was clear and ready; her memory exact; her judgment solid: equally able to bear prosperity or adversity, she seemed to add the courage of the other sex to the softness of her own.

The parliament, sensible that his majesty's interest was extremely weakened by the queen's death, both houses attended him on the thirty-first of December with the following address, in which the lords led the way.

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, do with inexpressible grief humbly assure your majesty of the deep sense we have of the loss your majesty, and the whole kingdom, doth sustain, by the death of that excellent princess our sovereign lady the queen; most humbly beseeching your majesty that you would not indulge your grief upon this sad occasion, to the prejudice of the health of your royal person; in whole preservation, not only the welfare of your own subjects, but of all Christendom, is so much concerned. We further beg leave, upon this sad occasion, humbly to renew to your majesty the hearty and sincere assurances of our utmost assistance against all your enemies both at home and abroad, and of all other demonstrations of the greatest duty and affection that can possibly be paid by the most faithful subjects." To which his majesty returned them his hearty thanks for their kindness manifested to him, and especially for the sense they shewed of the great loss he had sustained, "which, says he, is above what I can express *." The example of the two houses was followed by the whole nation, and consolatory addresses now poured in upon his majesty from all quarters of the kingdom; but nothing gave him greater satisfaction than a letter he received from the princess of Denmark on this occasion, and which we shall here insert, for the reader's perusal:

"Sir, I beg your majesty's favourable acceptance of my sincere and hearty sorrow for your great affliction in the loss of the queen; and I do assure your majesty I am as sensibly touched with this sad misfortune, as if I had never been so unhappy as to have fallen into her displeasure.

"It is my earnest desire your majesty would give me leave to wait upon you, as soon as it can be without danger of increasing your affliction, that I may have an opportunity myself not only of repeating this, but of assuring your majesty of my real intentions to omit no occasion of giving you constant proofs of my sincere respect and concern for your person and interest, as becomes, sir,

Your majesty's most affectionate sister and servant,

A N N E." †

This letter removing his majesty's apprehensions of the princess's forming a party against him, he listened to the instances of the earl of Sunderland, who brought about a reconciliation between them, and he made the princess a present of most of the late queen's jewels, and assigned her St. James's palace for her residence: but notwithstanding these appearances of friendship, there seems to have still subsisted a jealousy on the king's side: a few formal visits passed between him and his sister-in-law, but he admitted her to no share in public business, nor would he suffer his ministers to attend her, or inform her of any of the transactions of state. Bishop Burnet tells us, that the king was inconsolable upon the death of his consort, insomuch that he could not for a long time give any attention to the business of royalty, seeming insensible of any thing but his great loss. I shall only observe here, that this extreme tenderness is not very agreeable to the character generally given of William as an husband; nor can we think he shewed any great respect to the memory of the deceased queen, by going to the house in person before she was buried, to give the royal assent to the land-tax bill, which he might have done by commission. Mary's corpse having lain in state at Whitehall till the fifth of March, was interred in Henry VII's chapel that evening, the duchess of Somerset being chief mourner; and both houses attending the solemnity, a funeral sermon was preached in the Abbey on this occasion by archbishop Tension.

Before we put an end to the transactions of the year 1694, it will be necessary briefly to mention some occurrences which we could not so conveniently introduce in their proper order of time.

Towards the beginning of this winter the public attention had been engaged by the trial of some papists in Lancashire, who had been detected in a conspiracy against the government. Their designs had been discovered by one Lunt, an Irishman; upon whose circumstantial evidence orders were issued for taking the principal conspirators into custody; and they were soon after brought to their trials at Manchester, where the witnesses for the crown proved that the prisoners, and particularly one Mr. Standish, of Standish-hall, had received commissions from the late king James to levy war against the present government; for which purpose they had bought up arms, and enlisted and maintained soldiers at their own expence. To corroborate this, captain Baker, and other officers employed in securing the conspirators, deposed to the finding such a quantity of arms in several of their houses, as plainly indicated a treasonable design to be on foot against the government. There was likewise found in Mr. Standish's closet the draught of a declaration, in the name of king James, which was to be published at his landing. Notwithstanding the force of this evidence, the friends of the plotters found means to manage matters so, by corrupting some of the king's witnesses, and getting others out of the way, that the accused gentlemen were acquitted, and several who had been taken into custody were immediately discharged without trial. The affair was afterwards brought into parliament at the instance of the Jacobite party, who accused Lunt and his fellow-witnesses of a conspiracy against the lives and estates of the persons they had charged with the conspiracy: but upon a fair and candid examination into the merits of the cause, the commons resolved that there was sufficient ground for the prosecution and trial of the gentlemen at Manchester; and that there was a dangerous conspiracy against the king and government. The conspirators, disappointed in this quarter, preferred their complaints before the house of peers; but their lordships concurred in the vote of the commons, the earls of Rochester and Nottingham only excepted, who entered their protests against this resolution. After this another indictment for perjury was preferred against Lunt and three more of the king's witnesses at the Lancaster assizes, and all of them were found guilty. They were likewise indicted by the crown for a conspiracy against the lives and estates of the gentlemen accused. The design of the ministry in this indictment, was to discover the falsehoods which had been advanced by the witnesses in favour of the gentlemen: but the latter not chusing to abide that issue, dropped the prosecution, and the prisoners were released.

On the twenty-eighth of September, 1694, the English East-India Company had a second charter of regulations, which, after reciting the substance of the preceding charter, made the following alterations and explanations, viz.

I. "The Company may licence their own commanders and mariners [but none other] to trade on their own private account in such commodities, and to such value as a general court shall direct, provided entry be first duly made, as well as custom paid, before landing the same.

II. "To the intent that the Company's annually exporting to India the value of one hundred thousand pounds of English goods, may truly be proved, a just account thereof in writing, signed by the governor or deputy, shall be annually laid before the king and council, attested by the oaths of the proper officers; which goods shall not be re-landed, nor carried any where out of the Company's limits.

III. "Neither the governor, deputy, nor committee, shall lend out the Company's money, without the authority of a general court, &c.

IV. "If this and the two last charters shall not appear to be profitable to the crown, and either in whole or in part, then after three years warning all the said three charters shall be determined and void, and the said governor and Company shall no longer continue a corporation. Lastly,

V. "This Company shall, by a writing under their common seal, declare their acceptance and submission to this and the said two charters, or else they shall no longer act as a corporation."

Affairs in the West-Indies had for some time been in a very bad situation: the French destroyed our trade by their privateers, disturbed our settlements continually, and frequently made descents upon them, particularly on Jamaica, where they committed great devastation, and enriched themselves by the booty they carried off in their different incursions. The few ships of war we had in those parts were so far from being able to defend our colonies with any effect, that several of them were taken by the enemy, insomuch that the loss of our colonies seemed no improbable, or indeed remote, consequence; since all their trade was destroyed, and their coasts plundered at will by their privateers that were equipped in whole squadrons from the settlements the French had established in Hispaniola. These advantages, however, seem not to have been so much owing to the superior force or courage of the French in those parts, as to the notorious want of public spirit and right management in us and the Spaniards. Our governors there had from time to time made the most pressing instances to the ministry at home, to take more care of our concerns in the West-Indies, by sending proper squadrons, and with them a sufficient supply of land-forces, into those parts: but other business intervening, and the Spaniards not appearing either willing or able to join us in the curbing the insolence of the enemy, neither the council nor the admiralty seem to have thought any more about the plantations till towards the end of this year, when they were alarmed with an account of a brisk attempt made upon Jamaica by monsieur Ducasse, the French governor of St. Domingo. This officer sailed in the month of June, with three men of war and twenty-three transports, having on board one thousand five hundred men, for the coast of Jamaica, where they arrived on the twenty-fourth of the same month, and made a descent on Port Morant, which they found abandoned; and marching from thence up the country, they plundered, burnt, and destroyed all they found in their way, and carried off money and effects to a considerable value *, having found that their schemes of conquest were altogether impracticable: for the people of Jamaica, when they found their property in danger, assembled readily for its defence, and behaved themselves so well in an engagement with the French, that it contributed not a little to make the latter lay aside their design, and to hinder them from resuming it afterwards †.

In this same year a beginning was made at home to the design of the now noble and magnificent hospital of Greenwich, for the reception of the decayed sailors serving in the royal navy. King William and queen Mary had for some time had this establishment much at heart, and they accordingly made a grant of the royal palace at Greenwich (a part of which, on the west side, had been begun to be rebuilt for a royal palace for king Charles II.) as also of a large adjoining space of ground. For this end king William, after the death of his royal consort, appointed by patent a number of commissioners for directing the building and endowing of this intended hospital, and granted a large sum out of his civil list for that purpose; and his royal successors were considerable benefactors to it. At length annual sums were granted by parliament for the finishing of this truly noble structure, which was fully completed in the reign of his late majesty king George the Second.

WILLIAM III. alone. A. D. 1695.

THE death of queen Mary gave the enemies of the government a desirable opportunity to attempt distressing the nation, by pretending that the parliament was legally dissolved by her majesty's decease. This, however singular, was the opinion of her majesty's uncle the earl of Rochester, and of some others, who maintained it in the house of peers, though it was certainly very ill founded. The executive part of the government was by law in king William only, though the title, as well as the right, was declared to be in their majesties jointly. The calling of a parliament was undoubtedly an act of the executive power, and consequently it ought to have been understood in law as the special and immediate act of the king, though the writs ran in the joint names of both their majesties, as all other acts of state did, yet without impeachment or diminution of the king's authority. Upon this principle, and nobody's seconding the earl of Rochester in his motion in the house of lords, the parliament was held to be no way affected by her death, but proceeded in its deliberations as if no such accident had happened*. It is evident, if this could have been carried, and the parliament dissolved, things must have run into the utmost confusion; and therefore it is amazing that any man, who pretended the least regard for his country, should espouse so destructive a scheme, even though his sentiments had been opposite to those of the persons intrusted with the administration!

While the commons were employed in finding out ways and means for raising the money they had voted, they found their attention called off by the discovery of a surprising scene of bribery and corruption, in which not only the agents of the army, some members of parliament, but even the privy-counsellors themselves were deeply concerned. This discovery was made by a petition presented to the house by the inhabitants of Royston in Hertfordshire, January 12, complaining, that the officers and soldiers of the regiment belonging to colonel Hastings, which was quartered upon them, demanded and exacted subsistence-money in their quarters and upon their march, and were guilty of many other abuses. Upon this, colonel Hastings, his agent, Mr. Tracey Pauncefort, his brother Edward Pauncefort, major Montell, and the agents of some other regiments, were sent for, and examined before the house, who thought proper to commit Tracey Pauncefort to the Tower, for having refused to answer certain questions put to him; as they also did his brother, for having defrauded colonel Hastings's regiment of five hundred guineas. These two were soon followed by Henry Guy, esq. a member of the house, and secretary to the treasury, who was proved to have received a bribe of two hundred guineas, for procuring the payment of the arrears which were due to the regiment.

The house next proceeded to draw up an address to his majesty, which was presented on the fourth of March, and which we shall lay before the reader for his further insight into this shocking scene of military tyranny and corruption. The representation was as follows: "I. That the violences complained of from the soldiers, were in great measure occasioned by the ill practices of the agents of the army, who detained the soldiers pay, and converted it to their own use. II. By their intolerable exactions and extortions upon the officers and soldiers for paying money by way of advance, by charging more for the discount of tallies than they actually paid. III. That colonel Hastings in particular had compelled some officers of his regiment to take their cloaths from him at an exorbitant price, to promote his own private advantage, without any regard to his majesty's service, or to the discipline of the army. IV. That the said colonel Hastings had fraudulently detained five hundred guineas out of a bounty given by his majesty to the officers of his regiment, under pretence of having paid that sum as a bribe to obtain the said bounty; and had also taken two-pence in the pound out of the money due to the officers and soldiers, without having any warrant for making such deduction. V. That colonel Hastings's agent had refused or neglected to give an account of the pay due to the captains of his regiment and their companies, which tended apparently to the defrauding the officers and soldiers. VI. That many grievous and great deductions had been arbitrarily made by the agents, who had endeavoured to cover their frauds under the uncertain head of contingencies. VII. That colonel Hastings had discharged an ensign by putting another in his room, contrary to the true discipline of the army. VIII. and lastly, That the said colonel Hastings had taken money for recommending to commands in his regiment, to the discouragement of the officers who were to serve in his majesty's armies; who ought to be such as merited their commands, and not such as paid for them†." To all which abuses the house humbly intreated his majesty to give immediate redress. The king received this representation very graciously, and assured the house of his compliance with their request. Accordingly, colonel Hastings was cashiered, and his regiment given to sir John Jacob, his lieutenant-colonel. His majesty likewise appointed a council of officers to sit weekly, and examine all complaints against any officer or soldier; and published a proclamation for the strict discipline of the army, and the payment of quarters.

The commons however still continued to prosecute their enquiries, and on the seventh of March called before them several of the contractors for cloathing the army, particularly Mr. James Craggs and Mr. Richard Harnage, who refusing to be examined upon oath, or to produce their books, were committed: and a bill was brought in to compel the agents to discover their practices; but so great was the interest of the offenders, that the bill was dropped; and it does not appear that either the agents or superior officers of the army, who had cheated the soldiers, and defrauded the government in a most egregious manner, were ever punished according to their demerits. The commissioners for licensing hackney-coaches next came under censure, for having, by receiving bribes and other undue means, acted corruptly and arbitrarily, and his majesty was addressed to remove three of them, who were accordingly displaced*.

But the affair of the East-India Company, and of the bill for satisfying the debt due to orphans of London, made the greatest noise, on account of the high rank of those concerned in this scene of iniquity. The East-India Company had been struck at in several sessions: their patent was represented as an illegal monopoly, and another company proposed to be erected by parliament, or at least the trade laid open to all his majesty's subjects; which when the Company found the parliament inclined to concur in, they applied themselves to some leading men, whom they gratified with considerable sums to obtain a new charter, and an act of parliament to confirm it. The disinterested part of both houses being greatly surprised, to hear the very members who had been most zealous against the Company's patent, now declare themselves their warmest advocates, suspected some iniquitous mystery, and therefore resolved to dive to the bottom of it, and to vindicate, if possible, the honour of parliament. The first enquiry set on foot was concerning the orphans bill, which was supposed to have been procured by the like undue influence†. A committee was accordingly appointed to inspect into the books of the chamberlain of London, and of the East-India Company; and was also empowered to send for persons and papers. After a due examination, the committee reported, "That they found an order made by the committee of the common-council of the city, directing the chamberlain to pay sir John Trevor, speaker of the house of commons, one thousand guineas; and another order for paying Paul Jodrel, esq. clerk of the house, one hundred guineas, for his pains and service in assisting the orphans bill to pass the parliament: that several other sums were entered into the chamberlain's books, paid to Mr. Barret the city-solicitor, to defray the charge of drawing the said bill, and making copies thereof; and of the petitions and orders relating to the same: among which payments were, five guineas paid to Mr. solicitor-general for his advice, five guineas to Mr. Harcourt, twenty guineas to Mr. Hungerford, chairman of the committee, for his pains and service, and sixty pounds to Mr. Jodrel; and they understood that the orphans had given bond to Mr. Smith and Mr. Charles Noyes to allow them twelve-pence in the pound when the bill passed: that the said Noyes and Smith produced to the committee of the common-council a bill of their charges, amounting to upwards of three thousand pounds monies disbursed‡." Upon these reports the commons resolved, "That sir John Trevor their speaker receiving a gratuity of a thousand guineas, after passing the orphans bills, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor." Sir John Trevor, to his infinite disgrace, was himself obliged to put the question from the chair for his own expulsion. He did not think fit to offer any defence, but the next day absented himself, and sent the mace to the house, who thereupon chose Paul Foley, esq. their speaker in his stead; at the same time, Mr. Hungerford the other member was expelled the house.

The commons next proceeded to enquire into the means by which the East-India Company had obtained their late charter, and appointed a committee (of which Mr. Foley was chairman) to inspect the books of the said company, when, upon examination, the most flagrant instances of venality and corruption were quickly manifested. It appeared that the Company had issued for the single articles of secret service, no less than one hundred and seventy thousand pounds, and that sir Thomas Cook, one of the members of the house of commons, had been the chief manager of this infamous traffic. Cook, upon being examined, at first refused to answer; so that on the twenty-sixth of March the commons enacted, "That sir Thomas Cook, a member, having refused to give an account of the money of the East-India Company by him distributed, be committed to the Tower, and a bill be brought in to oblige him to give such account." But this was dropped, and a bill passed to indemnify him upon making a due discovery. Hereupon he delivered in writing, to a committee of both houses, an account of the disposal of large sums to several persons§: but his discovery not being deemed satisfactory, a bill passed both houses, which afterwards received the royal assent, for imprisoning sir Thomas Cook, sir Basil Firebrace, Charles Bates, esq. and James Craggs; and for restraining them from alienating their estates: and in consequence of further discoveries made, the commons, on the twenty-seventh of April, drew up articles of impeachment against the duke of Leeds, president of the council, "for contracting and agreeing with the merchants trading to the East-Indies, or their agents, for five thousand five hundred guineas, to procure a charter of confirmation and a charter of regulations, or by his agents and servants, with his privity and consent." The articles of impeachment being presented at the bar of the upper house, the duke pleaded Not Guilty, and the commons promised to make good the charge. The duke, however, sent his servant Robart, who had received the money for him, out of the kingdom; and his absence prevented the matter being ever brought to a trial: but the duke's character suffered an indelible stain from the discovery that had been already made.

On the second of May the commons resolved, "That the offer of any money, or other advantage, to any member of parliament, for promoting any matter whatsoever depending in parliament, was a high crime and misdemeanor, and tended to the subversion of the constitution." By this time such discoveries were made, and such numbers of considerable persons appeared to be concerned in the grand scene of corruption, that a full detection was equally dreaded by both parties; so that his majesty, to put an end to the proceedings of the commons, who were about to impeach several other persons, came to the house of peers on the third of May, and sending for the commons, closed the session with the following speech:

"My lords and gentlemen, I am come to give you thanks for the supplies provided for carrying on the war in which we are engaged, and at the same time to conclude this session, which cannot be continued any longer without manifest prejudice to the ends for which these supplies are given, the season of the year making it so necessary for me to be abroad, that it were to be wished our business at home would have allowed me to have been there sooner.

"I will take care to place the administration of affairs during my absence, in such persons on whose care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my lords and gentlemen, but every one of you in your several stations will be assisting to them. This is what I require of you, and that you will be more than ordinarily vigilant in preserving the public peace." Then the lord-keeper, by his majesty's order, prorogued the parliament to the eighteenth of June *.

The same day the king appointed the following high personages to be lords-justices of England for the administration of the government during his absence, viz. Thomas lord archbishop of Canterbury; sir John Somers, lord-keeper of the great-seal; Thomas earl of Pembroke, lord privy-seal; William duke of Devonshire, lord-steward of his majesty's household; Charles duke of Shrewsbury, principal secretary of state; Charles earl of Dorset, lord-chamberlain of the household; and Sidney lord Godolphin, first commissioner of the treasury. It is remarkable, that neither the princess of Denmark nor her husband were admitted into any share of the administration; a neglect which could not but produce great heart-burnings in the friends of that princess, who was now heir-apparent to the crown.

His majesty also about this time made the following promotions, viz. sir William Trumbal was appointed secretary of state, in the room of sir John Trenchard, lately deceased; Henry lord Capel was constituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland; William de Nassau, lord of Zuylestein, was created baron of Enfield, viscount Tunbridge, and earl of Rochford; and Ford lord Grey of Werk was created viscount Glendale and earl of Tankerville; and on the twelfth of May his majesty embarked at Gravesend for Holland, from whence he soon after went to the army in Flanders.

The campaign of 1695 was a glorious one to king William and the allies, whose army being superior to that of the French in the Netherlands, his majesty resolved to strike some memorable blow.

Accordingly, after having for some time amused marshal Villeroy (who commanded the French army in the room of Luxemburg, who died the preceding winter) by several feints, he at length invested the city of Namur on the third of July. This place, the capital fortress in the Netherlands, was strong by art and nature, before it fell into the hands of the enemy, since which it had received additional fortifications, so that it was looked upon as altogether impregnable. It was defended by a garrison of fifteen thousand chosen men, commanded by the count de Guiscard; and marshal Boufflers, who conducted a separate army from that of Villeroy, though subjected to the other's orders, found means to throw himself into the town with several regiments, and thereby increased the garrison to twenty or twenty-five thousand men. It would be tedious to enumerate all the particulars of this celebrated siege, one of the most important events of the war. We shall therefore relate only the principal circumstances.

It is however necessary to set before the reader the disposition of the French army and that of the allies, for his better understanding what follows. The enemy, conscious of their own inferiority, had thought proper to secure their late conquests, by a new line drawn between the Lys and the Schelde, and to make dispositions for covering Dunkirk, Ypres, Tournay, and Namur; some of which they apprehended would be attacked by the allies. Mean while, the confederates formed two great armies in Flanders and Brabant: the first, composed of seventy-two battalions of foot, and eighty-two squadrons of horse and dragoons, was encamped at Aerseele, Canghem, and Wanterghem, between Theildt and Deynse, and commanded by the king in person, assisted by the old prince of Vaudemont, the best general in the allied army after the death of prince Waldeck. The other army, consisting of sixteen battalions of foot, and one hundred and thirty squadrons of horse, encamped at Zellrich and Ham, on the road from Brussels to Dendermonde, under the command of the elector of Bavaria, seconded by the duke of Holstein-Ploen, the earl of Athlone, and several other excellent generals. There was also a third little army, called the Body of the Maese, which lay encamped between Bref and Talais on the Me-haigne. This body consisted of eighteen battalions of Brandenburgers, and seven of Dutch, and thirty-two squadrons of horse; the whole commanded by the baron de Heyden, lieutenant-general of Brandenburg, and the count de Berlo, general of the Liege cavalry. On the other hand, the marshal de Villeroy had drawn his army together at Liege, between Condé, Tournay, and Aeth: marshal de Boufflers, with another body of about twelve thousand horse and foot, lay encamped about the Sambre; and monsieur Montal, with another small body, was posted between Ypres and the fort La Knocque.

King William having succeeded according to his wish, by drawing all the enemy's forces on one

* Few acts of any consequence were passed this session besides the money-acts, and an act against clipping and coining. It appears that about this time the silver coin of the kingdom was so much diminished by the villany of clippers, as to be reduced near half in value, to the great detriment of trade, and embarrassment of the public revenue. Various expedients were proposed for remedying this grievance; but some of them were dangerous, and others impracticable. An act, however, passed, containing very strict penalties against clippers; but the remedy was not perfected till the next parliament.

side by his feigned marches, directed baron Heyden and the earl of Athlone to invest Namur, which was accordingly done. The king sent them a plan of the siege, which he had previously formed, and which the elector of Bavaria highly applauded, as a well-concerted project. On the eleventh of July the trenches were opened, and the next day the batteries began to play with incredible fury.

It was natural to expect, that a place of so much importance as Namur, so strong in its fortifications, and defended by such a numerous garrison commanded by a marshal of France, would dispute every foot of ground; and indeed it made a most bold and desperate defence for near two months. During the siege marshal Villeroy attempted to cut off prince Vaudemont, who commanded the army that covered the siege, consisting of fifty battalions of foot, and as many squadrons of horse, encamped at Aerseele. The French out-numbered the prince by more than two to one, and were very high surprising him in his trenches; but he effected a retreat to Ghent, in a manner hardly to be paralleled in antient or modern history. He first detached his baggage and artillery: these were soon followed by his infantry: lastly, he drew off his horse; and all this was performed with such secrecy and address, that the enemy had not the least suspicion of his design. Enraged to find himself thus baffled, Villeroy dispatched Montal to attack the prince's rear; but the Frenchmen met with so warm a reception, that they were glad to retire, after having killed a few of the prince's men, and suffered very considerably themselves. King William was so highly pleased with the prince's conduct, that he wrote him a letter with his own hand, wherein he acknowledged himself obliged to him; adding, "That he had given greater marks of a general consummate in the art of war, than if he had gained a victory."

Villeroy, disappointed in this attempt, afterwards endeavoured to surprize Nieuport, and was disappointed there also. He then, with better success, attacked the forts of Dixmuyde and Deynse, both which surrendered to him without striking a blow, though their garrisons consisted of near seven thousand men, among whom were two garrisons of English; and what rendered this misfortune the greater was, that the French detained these garrisons prisoners of war, refusing to ransom or exchange them according to cartel; insomuch that many of them, by the hardships they suffered, were forced into the French service, and sent quite across France into Catalonia. The next stratagem Villeroy made use of to draw off the allies from the siege of Namur, was the bombarding of Brussels, which was executed with such fury*, that within the space of forty-eight hours two thousand houses and upwards, in the heart of the town, were reduced to ashes; the stadthouse, the great church, and several others, demolished; and the very foundations of them thrown up by the bombs. The electress of Bavaria, who was then in the city, though removed out of danger from these ministers of destruction, was yet so terrified by their dreadful and incessant noise, that she miscarried; and it was with the utmost difficulty that she escaped with life. This terrible destruction of a capital city, which by the cartel was to have been exempt from bombardments, was justified by the French, on account of the bombardments that the English had made upon the coast of France.

After the perpetrating of this unmanly revenge, Villeroy being considerably reinforced by all the troops that could be spared out of the garrisons, and the forces from the sea-coasts, marched directly towards Namur, with an army, as the French themselves gave out, of no less than eighty thousand men, and which came just time enough to be witness to the surrender of that important fortress. King William having taken up the camp which the French army had occupied when they covered the siege of that place, the marshal found there was no attacking him, and therefore returned towards the Meuse; so that the garrison now lost all hopes of being relieved. It had indeed made a most noble resistance, and never was military valour and skill more illustriously displayed than in the attack and defence of this place. The genius, or the superior courage of the allies, however, at length succeeded. Count Guiscard finding that the enemy, after having effected several successive lodgments of great importance, were preparing for a general assault, surrendered the town on the fourth of August, and on the sixth the French retired into the castle, against which twelve batteries were opened on the thirteenth. Boufflers made several bold attempts to break through the camp of the allies, but was always disappointed, by the prudent precautions of king William. At length the garrison being from near twenty thousand, now reduced to little better than six thousand, the marshal thought proper to surrender, and the capitulation was signed on the evening of the second of September. Villeroy, who lay encamped at Gemblours, was no sooner informed of the surrender of Namur than he passed the Sambre, near Charleroi, with great precipitation; and having reinforced the garrison of Dinant with two thousand men, retreated with the rest of his army towards the lines in the neighbourhood of Mons.

On the fifth day of September the French garrison marched out of the castle, when king William caused marshal Boufflers to be arrested and detained prisoner, by way of reprisal for the detention of the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse, contrary to the cartel established between the two nations. Hereupon the court of Versailles thought proper to give its parole of honour that the said garrisons should be restored, and the marshal was immediately set at liberty. The reduction of Namur, in the sight of an army of eighty thousand men, seemed to establish the military character of king William, and more than ever confirmed him in the confidence of the allies: the Dutch in particular testified their acknowledgements, by every possible mark of gratitude and respect. His majesty now entrusted the command of the army to the elector of Bavaria, and retired to Loo, the usual place of his recess. Soon after both armies went into winter-quarters. We are not to suppose that so capital a conquest as that of Namur, could be gained without a considerable loss on the side of the victors: the allies left near twelve thousand men before the place. Among the slain were the count de Rivera, the baron de Heckeren, and several other officers of note. Among the wounded were the prince of Holstein-Norburgh, the prince of Hesse-Homburgh, and several inferior officers. The elector of Bavaria distinguished himself in a particular manner during the whole siege.

On the Rhine nothing was done this whole campaign; the army of the empire under prince Baden, and that of the French commanded by the marshal de Lorges, being so nearly equal, that neither of the two generals would venture upon a battle, but contented themselves with watching the motions of each other: nor did Italy this year furnish any military transactions deserving notice since the siege of Casal, which was yielded up to the duke of Savoy in fourteen days; to the surprize of all the world, as that place was esteemed the strongest perhaps in Europe: but it appeared afterwards that the duke and the French king were privately negotiating with each other; and it was conjectured that the latter made a voluntary sacrifice of this fortress to the duke, in order to engage his forbearance during the remaining part of the campaign. The French made but a very indifferent figure in Catalonia this year. Admiral Ruffel, who wintered at Cadiz, prevented them from forming the siege of Barcelona; upon which they retired to Palamos, which our admiral bombarded so furiously, that the greatest part of the town and castle were laid in ruins: after which he retired again to Cadiz; there he made the necessary dispositions for securing our trade in the Mediterranean from any interruption, by leaving a sufficient force to frustrate the designs of the enemy, and even to assist the Spaniards in case they had shewn any activity in their own concerns. Having settled these matters, and given proper instructions to sir David Mitchel, rear-admiral of the red, who was to be left with a squadron of twenty-three ships of the line, besides frigates and bomb-vessels, he turned his thoughts entirely to the carrying the rest of the fleet back to England; which design he happily accomplished in the beginning of the winter.

I shall now consider what passed at home, in respect to the design of humbling the French on the Ocean. The great men in the cabinet had determined to prosecute the methods of bombardment which had been set on foot the last year; and St. Malo's and Dunkirk were the places marked out to be demolished. The fleet intended for this service was in such forwardness, that the lord Berkeley of Stratton, who was to command it, sailed from Spithead on the twenty-third of June, and on the fourth of July came before St. Malo's. On the fifth the bombardment began about six in the morning, and was so vigorously pursued, that in about two hours time a great fire broke out in the east part of the town, and vast clouds of smoke were seen ascending in several places. About four in the afternoon another great fire broke out in the west part of the town. By seven in the evening the bomb-vessels had spent their whole cargo of nine thousand bombs and carcasses, and therefore the signal was given to put to sea. This enterprize against St. Malo's was executed by six English and four Dutch men of war, nine galliots, fourteen flat-bottomed boats, and two brigantines. The loss we sustained on this occasion was sixty men, killed and wounded, by the enemy's fire from their batteries, and one bomb-vessel sunk. The bombardment lasted somewhat more than eleven hours, and laid the greatest part of the town in ruins.

After this affair was over, it was resolved to send a second squadron to Granville, a place of great trade, under the command of captain Bernbow, who on the eighth of July anchored before the place, and began the bombardment, which lasted from nine in the morning till six in the evening; and then the squadron sailed away, leaving the town all in flames. After this the fleet sailed to Portsmouth, in order to make the necessary preparations there for an attempt upon Dunkirk; the destruction of which port was eagerly desired both by the English and Dutch, whose trade had suffered prodigiously from the enemy's privateers that were fitted out from thence. Lord Berkeley putting to sea again with the fleet on the last day of July, came the next day before Dunkirk, which he battered for eight hours: but the French had in all places made such strong preparations for their defence, as rendered an attempt to land altogether impracticable. Two of the machines, called Infernals, were sent in by the admiral, but did little or no execution. His lordship therefore drew off the fleet, and proceeded to Calais, which he bombarded without interruption for nine hours, in which time six hundred shells were thrown into the place. The magazine and the Rife-Bank were entirely burnt, several houses destroyed, and many others very much damaged. It is remarkable, that notwithstanding all the efforts of the enemy, and a prodigious fire from their batteries, we suffered very little loss, only the captain of a ketch being killed by a cannon-ball.

Our trade however suffered severely this year from the enemy's privateers, who, notwithstanding all the vigilance of the government, and our uncontrolled dominion at sea, found means to slip out of their ports, and take a number of our merchant ships. The marquis of Caermarthen, son to the duke of Leeds, a young and inexperienced nobleman, being stationed with a squadron off the isles of Scilly, mistook a fleet of merchant-ships for the Brest fleet, and retired with precipitation into Milford-Haven, without taking any pains to be satisfied whether he was right or not in his conjecture. By this rash step, to give it no worse a name, the Barbadoes fleet, then on its return home, was left a defenceless prey to the French privateers, who took a great number of them, and also five East-India ships, valued at a million sterling. This occasioned a great clamour at home, especially on the part of the merchants of London, who complained loudly, that neither the admiralty nor the government took the care that was necessary for preserving our trade. A French man of war at the same time fell upon our factory on the coast of Guinea, took a small fort we had there, and destroyed it. These losses sensibly abated the joy the nation would otherwise have felt from the success of our arms on the continent.

In the course of this year a parliament was held in Scotland, which met the ninth of May; and three things were chiefly proposed to their consideration by the ministry of that kingdom, in virtue of a letter sent from his majesty, just before his departure for Holland, to the marquis of Twedale, his high-commissioner: for not only the duke of Hamilton, but his brother the duke of Queensberry, died the last winter. The matters proposed were these: 1. Supplies for the ensuing year. 2. Moderation in church affairs. His majesty at the same time gave them his assurances of his maintaining presbytery. 3. The advancement of trade. As to the supplies, this parliament granted one hundred and forty thousand pounds for the maintenance of their forces by sea and land. They also passed an act in relation to their kirk, in which however there was not one word in favour of episcopacy, or any thing that looked like a toleration of the members of the church of England; but the act that made the most noise in England was that for settling a trade and colonies in the western plantations, it being proposed to carry on a trade from thence to the East Indies, by the assistance of some wealthy merchants and interlopers in London, which alarmed the East India company greatly, and was the occasion of a misunderstanding between the two nations, as will be related hereafter.

But this session of the Scottish parliament was chiefly remarkable for its strict enquiry into the affair of Glencoe (of which we have already given an account) when they entirely acquitted the king from any share of guilt in that barbarous massacre, by unanimously resolving, "That his majesty's instructions to sir Thomas Livingstone contained no warrant for the execution of the Macdonalds: that the said execution was a downright murder: that the Master of Stair's letters exceeded the king's instructions: that sir Thomas Livingstone had reason to give the orders he had given. They likewise ordered that lieutenant-colonel Hamilton should be instantly arrested, and brought to his trial for the murder of the Macdonalds: that Campbell of Glenlion, captain Drummond, lieutenant Lindsey, ensign Lundy, and serjeant Barber, who had been concerned in the said massacre, should be likewise prosecuted; and that an impeachment should be lodged against the earl of Braidalbin, who had so grossly imposed upon his majesty, and abused his authority." Notwithstanding these resolutions, by which the king appears to be so solemnly acquitted, his ill-judged lenity, in inflicting no punishments on such inhuman delinquents, subjected him to much censure, which his enemies took care to improve with all their art, insomuch as to deprive him of the affection of the Scots.

A parliament being assembled in Ireland this summer by the new lieutenant, the lord Capel, they granted the king a supply of one hundred and sixty-three thousand pounds, to be raised by a poll-tax, and a further sum by additional duties of excise and on wine, foreign merchandize, &c. They also passed some acts for preventing the growth of popery, and the disarming of papists. Let us now resume the affairs of England.

King William arriving at Kensington from Holland, the tenth of October, issued a proclamation the next day for dissolving the parliament, and assembling another on the twenty-second of November; and it having been represented to his majesty how much it might conduce to his interest in the ensuing elections, to endeavour to gain the affections of his people, by a more open and familiar deportment than he had hitherto observed, he thought fit to go to the races at Newmarket this season, where he was met and complimented by the vice-chancellor and heads of the university of Cambridge. From thence he made a tour through Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Warwickshire, and several other counties, visiting the nobility and persons of distinction, who vied with each other in the magnificence of their entertainments. In his progress he visited the city and university of Oxford, where he was received by the duke of Ormond, chancellor of that university, the vice-chancellor, and the rest of the members, in their academical habits; and an elegant entertainment was prepared in the Theatre, from the presumption that his majesty would honour them with his presence at dinner: but an anonymous letter having been conveyed to his majesty, in which the writer acquainted him that there was a design laid to poison him, he immediately set out for Windsor; nor could all the intreaties of the university prevail on him to stay: he did indeed condescend to assign something like a reason for his abrupt departure, by saying, "He only paid them this visit to manifest his affection for them: that he had before seen the curiosities of the university, and therefore did not propose the making any stay at this time."

On Friday the twenty-second of November the new parliament met, in pursuance of the summons; and the commons being directed to chuse a speaker, elected Paul Foley, esq. who was approved by his majesty the next day, when the king made a speech to both houses, to the following effect:

"He engaged in the present war, he said, by the advice of his first parliament; and the last had with great chearfulness assisted him in carrying it on, and he doubted not but the present one would as willingly support him in it by their supplies: that he could not but take notice on this occasion of the signal bravery of the English forces during the last campaign, which had reflected equal honour on themselves, and on the nation to which they belonged. He lamented, as a great misfortune, his having been obliged, from the beginning of his reign, to ask such large aids of his people; but, he observed, they were absolutely necessary, for the effectual prosecution of the war. He took notice that the funds had been deficient, and the condition of the civil list such, that he could not possibly subsist without their care. He told them, that compassion obliged him to mention the miserable condition of the French protestants who suffered for their religion, and the redress of the ill state of the coin, would prove a farther charge. He recommended to them the framing bills for the encouragement and increase of seamen, the advancement of trade, particularly that of the West-Indies, and that the army might be properly recruited, without giving the subject cause of complaint; and concluded with exhorting them to use dispatch, and to avoid heats and divisions."

Hereupon the two houses addressed his majesty separately, but to the same effect, congratulating him on his successes this campaign, and his safe return; assuring him they would support his government, and assist him in the prosecution of the war. The commons addressed his majesty to appoint a fast for the success of their deliberations; and accordingly cordingly the eleventh of December was appointed for London, and the eighteenth for the rest of England. Great complaints being made to the house of the abuse of written protections which had been given by the members, all such protections were called in, and declared void in law: at the same time, however, it was declared, that their menial servants should enjoy their usual privileges, but no person should be taken into custody upon complaint of breach of privilege till this matter should be examined. This order was not to extend to any breach of privilege upon the person of a member.

On the fourth day of the session the bill was introduced for regulating trials in cases of high-treason, which was suddenly passed thro' both houses, tho' it had met with such opposition in former parliaments, on account of the clause added by the lords, "That all the peers should be summoned to attend at the trial of every peer and peeress:" which amendment was now agreed to by the lower house*.

The commons next proceeded to take into their consideration the supply for the year 1696, when, upon going through the accounts and estimates laid before them, they voted five millions twenty-four thousand eight hundred and fifty-three pounds for that service, viz. two millions and an half for the navy, and the rest for the army and ordnance, to be raised on the following funds, viz. 1. By a land-tax of four shillings in the pound. 2. By duties continued on wine, vinegar, tobacco, East India goods, and other merchandizes, from 1698 to 1701. 3. An additional duty upon all French goods, wines twenty-five pounds per ton, brandy thirty pounds per ton, vinegar fifteen shillings per ton; all other French goods twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, for the term of twenty-one years. 4. Duties upon low wines or spirits of the French extraction. 5. Duties continued upon salt, glass-ware, tobacco-pipes, &c. Pursuant to that part of the king's speech relating to the civil list, and to the distressed condition of the French protestants, the commons also settled a fund for raising 500,000 l. a-year for the former, and 15,000 l. a-year for the relief of the latter†.

The necessity of amending our money at this time occasioned several debates, which ended in a resolution to proceed to a new coinage, by calling the diminished silver-money into the mint by tale, whereby the people had good new silver coin returned them from the Mint. The next point to be determined was, whether the new coin, in its different denominations, should retain the original weight and purity of the old, or the established standard be raised in value. Mr. Lowndes, secretary of the Treasury, who was the chief advocate for the enhancing method, alleged in favour of his scheme, That the raising the standard would prevent the exportation of our coin, as also the melting of it down; and that thereby people would be more induced to bring in their plate and bullion to the Mint. On the other side it was argued very justly, that the common consent of all nations had fixed silver at one and the same price, or very nearly: that the worth of it was relative: that the weight and fineness, or the quantity of pure silver, and not the bare denomination, were the only rules which governed not only foreign nations in their exchanges and other dealings with us, but also our own people in their home-trade; since six shillings and three-pence, for which it was proposed a crown-piece of the new currency should pass, would purchase no more of any commodity, nor go farther in paying bills of exchange, than five shillings of our unclipped present coin would purchase, because the latter contained as much pure silver as the former: that this was clear in the case of guineas, now at thirty shillings, all commodities being raised in price in proportion to the said price of guineas: that an ounce of silver was not even at present worth six shillings and three pence of our good coin, but only of the diminished or clipped money, since one ounce of silver could not be worth more than another ounce of the same fineness; and with five shillings and two-pence per ounce of the new milled money they could buy as much bullion as they pleased: that with respect to the before-named argument, that the raising the denomination would keep our silver at home, it is of no weight, since nothing can keep or bring in money but our getting the balance of trade in our favour: for if we take more goods from foreign parts than they take from us, the balance must be paid them in our money, or in bullion, which is all one: that with regard to our home concerns in particular, there are many objections against raising the standard. First, All poor labourers, soldiers, and sailors, would thereby be defrauded of part of their just wages, as would also creditors of part of their just debts, and the landlord of part of his rent, or else great confusion and dispute would arise about these matters. These arguments were most judiciously and clearly handled, and the truth of them demonstrated by the great Mr. Locke, in his excellent Treatise on Coin, which he published at this time, in answer to Mr. Lowndes's Essay for the Amendment of the Silver Coin.

In conclusion, the arguments of the philosopher were deemed more convincing than those of the projector; and the commons resolved that the established standard should be preserved, with regard to weight and fineness; and that the loss arising from calling in the old money, which was calculated at two millions sterling (though it afterwards

* By this act it is decreed, That persons indicted for high-treason, or misprision of treason, should be supplied with a copy of the indictment five days before the indictment, and indulged with two counsellors to plead in their defence: that no person should be indicted but upon the oaths of two lawful witnesses swearing to the same overt-act; or at least to different acts of the same treason: that in two or more treasons of divers kinds, alleged in the same bill of indictment, one witness to one, and another witness to another, should not be deemed two witnesses: that no person should be prosecuted for any such crime, unless the indictment was found within three years after the offence was committed; except in case of a design or attempt to assassinate or poison the king, which should not be subject to this limitation: that persons indicted for treason, or misprision of treason, should be furnished with copies of the pannel of jurors, two days at least before their trial; and should have the same process to compel their witnesses to appear, which is usually granted to witnesses against them: that no evidence should be admitted of any overt-act not expressly laid in the indictment: and that this act shall not extend to any impeachment, or other proceedings in parliament; nor to any indictment for counterfeiting his majesty's coin, his great-seal, privy-seal, sign-manual, or signet. turned out to be near two millions and an half) should be borne by the public, and a fund settled for supplying the deficiency: accordingly, on the 31st of December the commons resolved to raise one million two hundred thousand pounds by a duty on houses or windows, for supplying the deficiency of the clipped money. A proclamation was also issued, at the instance of the house, for calling in the clipped money by degrees, which occasioned inexpressible confusion, the receivers refusing to take it for what it was coined, on pretence of its being clipped too near, or its being of bad alloy, &c. Whereupon the commons resolved, "That the recompence for supplying the deficiency of the clipped money should extend to all clipped money that was silver, though of a coarser alloy than the standard; and that the collectors and receivers of taxes should receive all such: that a reward of five per cent. should be given to such persons as brought in milled or unclipped money: that three-pence per ounce should be given for all wrought plate brought in to the Mint, above the value; and that commissioners should be appointed in every county to pay and distribute the milled and broad unclipped money, and the new coined money, and to receive the clipped money." These resolutions were formed into a bill, with a clause to prohibit the melting down and exportation of our coin and bullion, and to prohibit the use of plate in public houses: which article proved the best expedient to supply the mints with bullion, there being at this time scarce any public house in England that had not silver tankards, and other utensils of the same metal; which the owners chose rather to carry to the Mint and turn into ready money, than keep so much useless and dead silver at home. Means were also used for gradually reducing the price of guineas to near their just value in silver in foreign parts, the parliament with great judgment directing the manner of gradually lowering them, viz. from thirty shillings to twenty-nine shillings, twenty-eight shillings, twenty-five shillings, and lastly to twenty-two shillings, whereby very little loss accrued to individuals.

Thus in about a year's time, or a little more, our silver coin came forth from the Mint, the finest and most beautiful of any in Europe: and although many inconveniencies happened in trade till this recoinage was completed, yet in the end it astonished and confounded all the enemies of this kingdom both at home and abroad, and procured great credit to Mr. Montagu (afterwards lord Halifax) who then had the chief management of the Treasury.

It was on this occasion that Mr. Montagu first set on foot a new circulating paper-credit, by issuing bills from the Exchequer, at the same time contracting (as has ever since been done) for their being circulated for ready money on demand: and as many of these first exchequer-bills were for sums so low as five pounds and ten pounds, they were of singular use during the great scarcity of silver occasioned by the re-coinage, as they were taken at the Exchequer for all payments of the revenue; and as, when re-issued, they were then allowed seven pounds twelve shillings per cent. interest, they soon arose, from a small discount, to be better than par. These have since been issued yearly; and the Bank of England has constantly, for many years past, been the contractor for their circulation at a certain premium; for which end the said Bank takes annual subscriptions for enabling it to circulate them. This famous re-coinage was performed at London, Exeter, Bristol, Chester, York, and Norwich*.

While the parliament thus manifested their attachment to the present government, they likewise resolved to support the liberties of the subject. The king had a particular regard for the earl of Portland (Mynheer Bentinck) who had been a faithful servant to him, and had accompanied him from Holland at his coming to take possession of the crown of these realms. To this nobleman he had lately made a grant of some lordships in the county of Denbigh, including part of the antient demesnes of the principality of Wales. The vassals and tenants of these lordships presented a petition to the parliament, remonstrating against the legality of the grant, and insisting on the right which they had always enjoyed, of holding solely of the prince of Wales. The commons took the affair into consideration; and finding the objections advanced by the petitioners to be well founded, addressed the king to recal his grant. His majesty was not a little piqued at this address, which seemed to reflect on his conduct. He promised however to recal his grant, and said he would find some other way of shewing his favour to the earl of Portland†.

In this remarkable year, the parliament, gentry, and merchants of Scotland, made a very great effort (perhaps the greatest that had ever been made by one European nation in the first attempt) for establishing a colony of their own people in America, and at the same time a company for trading to Africa and East India, which however proved in the end very fatal to Scotland. It was said to have been underhand set on foot, and encouraged by the interlopers in the English East India trade, who finding that both king and parliament inclined to favour the company, flattered themselves with hopes, that by encouraging the designs of the Scots, they might obtain their own particular ends.

Be that as it may, it is certain that the Scots had long lamented their being almost the only maritime country in Europe without the Mediterranean and Baltic Seas, which had no colony nor settlement out of Europe. This point had more especially occupied their thoughts since the Restoration; but the arbitrary measures of king Charles II. and his brother the late king James, prevented their carrying this national concern. Upon the accession of king William, they began to think more sincerely about mercantile schemes; and in 1693 their parliament passed an act "for encouraging of foreign trade," by empowering merchants to enter into commercial societies, more especially for trading to Asia, Africa, and America. And in this year, 1695, in the parliament of which we have already made mention, they obtained a royal charter, incorporating a company to trade to those parts.

It seems the king had, as usual, empowered his commissioner (then the marquis of Tweddale) to promise his assent to any bill for the encouragement of trade, provided it did not interfere with the commerce of England. The commissioner, not properly regarding this restriction, gave his assent to an act for establishing a company trading to the East or West Indies, empowering them to plant colonies, build cities, towns, or forts, in places uninhabited, or in others, with the consent of the natives, vesting them with an exclusive right, and an exemption for twenty-one years from all duties and impositions. This act was likewise confirmed by letters-patent under the great-seal, without any further warrant from the crown. It had been framed by Mr. William Paterson, the projector of the Bank of England and of the new Orphans Fund. He had lived some years in America, as well as in sundry other foreign parts, and had entered far into speculations relating to commerce and colonies. This gentleman had thought of a place called Darien, very near the Isthmus which joins North and South America, uninhabited by any European people, and where his countrymen the Scots might make a good settlement; as also another opposite to it on the south side of the Isthmus, near Panama, whereby he proposed that a trade might be carried on both to the East and West Indies.

No sooner was the company erected in virtue of the royal patent obtained, than Mr. Paterson and his friends in England had influence enough to get three hundred thousand pounds sterling subscribed in nine days time. Soon after three hundred thousand pounds more was subscribed in Scotland, the whole capital being at first designed to be but six hundred thousand pounds sterling: but fearing that the English subscribers would be soon obliged to withdraw their subscriptions, Mr. Paterson and his associates went to Amsterdam, where they at first met with good encouragement, till the Dutch magistrates, apprehending that this new company might do great prejudice both to their East and West India companies, entirely frustrated their subscriptions there. Their next attempt was at Hamburgh, where they were very cordially received, and the subscription was presently filled. Thus far the company's wishes succeeded, and they began with all expedition to build and purchase ships of great burthen, both at Amsterdam and Hamburgh, when suddenly this fine prospect was overclouded, by the alarm taken by both the English houses of parliament, who appointed a committee to enquire into the act which had lately passed in Scotland, for erecting a company trading to Africa and the East Indies. After a full and impartial examination of all the particulars relating to this act, the committee made its report, when the two houses presented an address to his majesty on the twenty-fifth of December, against the great advantages which he had consented to be granted to this company, "whereby (say they) a great part of the stock and shipping of England will be carried into Scotland, where there will be a free port for all East India commodities; and that consequently the several places of Europe, till now furnished from England, would be furnished much cheaper from thence. The said East India merchandize will be also run into England by the Scots, to the unspeak-able prejudice of the trade and navigation of England, and of your majesty's customs. And that if the Scots be suffered to settle plantations in America, our commerce in tobacco, sugar, cotton, skins, masts, &c. will be utterly lost:" with much more to the same effect*. To this address the king returned for answer, "That he had been ill served in Scotland; but he hoped some remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniencies which might arise from this act." Soon after his majesty turned out both the secretaries of state for Scotland and the marquis of Tweeddale, and great changes were made in the ministry of that kingdom: the lord Murray, son of the marquis of Athol, was made secretary of state.

The commons afterwards came to a resolution, on the twenty-sixth of January, 1696, "That the directors of the company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies, administering and taking here in this kingdom an oath De Fideli, and under colour of a Scottish act of parliament styling themselves a company, and acting as such, and raising money in this kingdom for carrying on the said trade, were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor; and that the lord Belhaven, William Paterson the projector, James Bateman, and the rest of the directors, who were resident in England, should be impeached:" but while the impeachments were drawing up, Roderic Mackenzie, who had been the chief informer against the company, began to retract his evidence, and was ordered into custody; but he made his escape, and could never be retaken, though the king issued a proclamation for that purpose. The Scots however proceeded in their project of making settlements in the West Indies, and actually settled a colony a year or two afterwards at Darien. But of this affair I shall have occasion to speak more particularly hereafter.

Towards the end of the year 1695, John Sobieski king of Poland, who, at the instance of his queen, a daughter of France, had hitherto refused to acknowledge king William's title to the crown of these realms, now consented to recognize him as king of Great Britain; as did also about the same time the republic of Venice. His majesty, soon after his accession to the throne, communicated the same to the senate in a very handsome letter, which they took no notice of, but recalled Sarotti, who resided as their secretary at London. About this time, however, they wrote an answer to it, and put it into the hands of signor Alexander Zeno, their ambassador at Vienna, to be by him delivered to lord Lexington, his majesty's envoy-extraordinary at the imperial court, who received it with marks of esteem and satisfaction; and then the senate proceeding to the choice of their ambassadors-extraordinary, the signors Lorenzo Soranzo and Gerolamo Venier were pitched upon, who made a very splendid public entry in the spring of the year 1696, and were received in a magnificent manner by the king, notwithstanding the compliment came so much after time.

The year 1696 opened with the discovery of a plot for assassinating king William and invading the kingdom, in order to restore the late king

James. The French king was by this time grown heartily weary of the war, after having in a manner ruined and depopulated his country. However, before he put a period to his military operations, he determined to make one grand effort to restore his good friend and ally James, in concert with the Jacobites here, whose spirits were greatly elated by the death of queen Mary; the decease of whom, they imagined, had considerably weakened the interest of her royal consort. The scheme of an invasion, and the design of taking off the king, were as early as the beginning of February this year publicly talked of in France; and that court had drawn down an army towards Dunkirk and Calais, so that nothing seemed wanting but the winds and weather to put them in action. On the eighteenth of February king James took post for Calais, when the troops, artillery, and stores, were ordered to be put on board the proper vessels, then lying ready, with the utmost diligence, while news of the success of the assassination was with great impatience expected from England, in order to set sail. The duke of Wirtemberg, on news of these preparations, and the reports current at that time, dispatched an aid de camp for England, to give king William notice of what was on foot. The prince of Vaudemont, who was then at Brussels with the elector of Bavaria, also dispatched expresses to the same purport. The duke of Wirtemberg's messenger came first to England, and acquainted his majesty that the duke had stopped all the ships in the harbour and canal of Ostend, as well as that of Brussels, in order to transport forces over for his service. The states of Holland made the like preparations at Sas Van Ghent: but notwithstanding all the expedition used by the duke of Wirtemberg, the king had some time before received certain intimation, not only of the invasion, but also of the conspiracy against his person. The earl of Aylesbury, lord Montgomery son to the marquis of Powis, sir John Fenwick, sir John Friend, captain Charnock, captain Porter, and one Mr. Goodman, appear to have been the principal persons concerned in this infamous design, which, from the chief and most bloody circumstance of it, obtained the name of The Assassination Plot. The duke of Berwick had come privately over to England in the beginning of February, in order to hasten the preparations of the conspirators, whom he assured of king James's being ready to make a descent with twenty-two thousand French forces; and distributed commissions, and gave directions for procuring men, arms, and horses, to join him at his arrival. There were various rumours about the nature of these commissions; some said it was only to levy war against the prince of Orange, and all his adherents; and that king James was in no way privy to the murdering part of the scheme. We shall not take upon us to decide this point, but shall relate the most remarkable circumstances of this affair from the best authorities.

It appears then that the conspirators, who were several in number, besides those already mentioned, had held several meetings, in order to concert the proper measures for executing their hellish purpose. One sir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, a man of undaunted courage, close, cautious, and circumspect, but a furious bigot to the church of Rome, had come over in January with a private commission from king James; in virtue of which the rest of the party here were implicitly to obey his orders. This man took upon himself the task of murdering the king, with the assistance of forty horsemen, each of the conspirators being to furnish their quota. Various methods were at first proposed for effecting this purpose; but at length it was resolved to attack his majesty on his return from Richmond, where he usually hunted on a Saturday; and the place pitched upon was a lane between Brentford and Turnham-Green: and indeed one more likely to do their business could not have been found out; for his majesty very often returning late from the chace, usually crossed the water at Queen's-ferry with a few of his guards, without coming out of his coach; and as he landed on the Middlesex side of the water, the coach drove on without waiting for the rest of the guards, who could not cross till the boat returned to the Surry side again to bring them over; so that the king must have unavoidably fallen into the hands of his murderers, before the rest of his guards could have come up to his assistance.

Nor was the time and place more artfully contrived than the disposition of their men; for having secured several places in Brentford, Turnham-Green, and other houses thereabouts, to set up their horses till the king's return from hunting, one of the conspirators was ordered to wait at the ferry till the guards appeared in sight on the Surry side of the water, and then to give speedy notice to the rest, to be ready at their respective posts while the king was crossing over. For this end they were divided into three parties, who were to make their approaches by three different ways, one from Turnham-Green, another from the lane that leads to the Thames, and a third from a road that goes round Brentford. One of these parties was to attack the king's guards in front, another in the rear, whilst ten or twelve of the most bloody and resolute were to assassinate his majesty, by firing their blunderbusses at him through the coach-windows. It was also agreed, that when the bloody purpose was accomplished, the conspirators should keep in a body till they had got beyond Hammer-smith, then to divide in small parties of three or four, and make the best of their way to London, and from thence to Dover, where the sudden landing of the French might secure them from the rage of the multitude, and the hand of justice. Horses were now the only necessities wanting; and sir George Barclay, complaining that the money he had brought over with him was so far exhausted that he could not out of the remainder provide so great a number as forty, they all agreed that he should find but half, and sir William Perkins, Porter, and Charnock, were to provide the rest.

Saturday the fifteenth of February was the day appointed to murder the king; and the leaders having quartered the assassins in several parts of the town to avoid suspicion, lay close and still, expecting notice from the scouts of the king's being gone to Richmond; but it happened, his majesty not being very well, did not go abroad that day; upon which the assassins were struck with dismay, fearing a discovery; but finding all quiet, they met and took further measures, appointing to be in readiness the Saturday following; but as they were setting out they had notice from Durant and Cham-

Chambers, two of their accomplices, that the guards were all come back in a foam, and that there was a muttering among the people that a horrid plot was discovered. This unexpected news put the conspirators into the utmost consternation, as really believing they were now detected, and accordingly, through a miraculous providence, it proved true; whereupon they dispersed, and gave over their design.

It seems that one Pendergrafs being made acquainted with the whole plot, a day before it was to have been put in execution, by captain Porter his intimate friend, and solicited to be one of their number, seemingly complied; but being struck with the blackness and barbarity of the act, he went to the earl of Portland on Friday the fourteenth of February, and discovered to him all the scheme, intreating to be introduced to the king. After a little time he waited on his majesty in his closet, when he fully made known all the particulars he knew of this horrid conspiracy; and after much pressing on the part of the king, who promised him he should not be produced as an evidence without his own consent, he gave in a list of the assassins. Pendergrafs's relation was confirmed the next day by one de la Rue, a Frenchman, one of the conspirators, who knew nothing of any discovery being made of the matter before.

The king having received a full account of the intended insurrection and invasion, with the design upon his person, a proclamation was forthwith issued for apprehending the conspirators. Barclay absconded, and could never be found; but most of the other conspirators were secured. Admiral Russel was immediately dispatched down to Chatham to hasten the fleet out to sea, and the rendezvous was appointed in the Downs, where all the men of war then in the sea-ports were ordered to sail and join the admiral, which was done with such amazing expedition, that in a few days time he had a fleet of at least fifty sail with him, with which he stood over to the French coast; and the enemy, confounded at his appearance, retired into their harbours with the utmost precipitation; while James, perceiving that his design was defeated, returned overwhelmed with despair to his court at St. Germain's, where he passed the rest of his days, living on Lewis's bounty, and a pension of seventy thousand francs, or about three thousand pounds per annum, which it is said he was mean-spirited enough to receive as a legacy of his daughter Mary, who had certainly been instrumental in dethroning him. He died at St. Germain's in 1700. Some Irish jesuits pretended to assert that miracles were performed at his tomb: they even carried the farce so far, as to pretend that his relics cured the bishop of Autun of a fistula.

"We have few examples in history, says M. de Voltaire (in his Life of Lewis XIV.) of a family for so long a time unfortunate. The first of the kings of Scotland, his ancestors, who bore the name of James, after having been detained for eighteen years a prisoner in England, was murdered, together with his queen*, by his own subjects. James II. the son of this prince, was killed in battle against the English, at nineteen years of age†. James III. after being imprisoned by his own subjects, was slain by the rebels in fight. James IV. fell in a battle which he lost. Mary Stuart, his grand-daughter, after being driven from her throne, and forced to take refuge in England, where she languished eighteen years in prison, was at length condemned to die by English judges, and lost her head on a scaffold. Charles I. grandson to this Mary, and king of England and Scotland, was sold by the Scots, sentenced to death by the English, and executed publicly as a traitor. His son James was driven from three kingdoms, and, to crown the misfortunes of the family, even the birth of his son was disputed. This son, by the efforts he made to recover the throne of his fathers, brought many of his friends to an untimely end; [and of late days we have seen Charles-Edward, his eldest son, making the same attempts, and with the like or still more fatal consequences, both to himself and his adherents, and suffering calamities almost beyond the reach of credit]. If any thing can justify those who believe in an unavoidable fatality, it must be the continued series of misfortunes which have befallen the family of the Stuarts for upwards of three hundred years."

Several of the conspirators being now taken up, and full discoveries made of their designs, king William went to the house of peers on the twenty-fourth of February, and, in a speech to both houses, acquainted them with the conspiracy and intended invasion. Upon which they, in a very affectionate and loyal address, congratulated him on the escape of his royal person from the designs of his enemies, declaring their abhorrence of such villainous and traitorous attempts, and solemnly promising to stand by and assist his majesty, and defend his royal person against all his enemies, open and private; and if he should come by a violent death, to revenge it upon the papists. They likewise drew up an association to the same purpose, which was signed by all the members of the house, wherein they declare king William their rightful and lawful king, mutually engaged to stand by each other in his defence against king James, &c. &c. From the parliament the association was carried over the whole kingdom, and was signed by all sorts of people. The bishops drew up a particular form, much in the same spirit, which was subscribed by the greatest part of the clergy. The commons also brought in a bill for the sitting and continuing of the parliament, if the king should happen to die, till the next heir in succession should come to dissolve it: and that commissions should continue in force till the further pleasure of the successor was signified. A pardon was also offered to such as were knowing of the conspiracy, who would come in and make any farther discovery: and a bill likewise passed both houses, importing, that such as refused to take the oaths to his majesty, should be subject to the forfeitures and penalties of popish recusants: that severe penalties should be inflicted on those who, by words or writing, should affirm that king William was not the rightful and lawful sovereign of these realms; or that the late king James, or the pretended prince of Wales, or any other person than those named in the Act of Succession, had any right to the crown of these kingdoms: that no person who refused to subscribe the association, should be capable of holding a seat in parliament, or any other office or post of trust, whether civil or military; and that the same penalties should be inflicted on those who came out of France as those who went thither*. The king was highly pleased with those marks of duty and affection from his parliament, and returned them thanks for the same. While those matters were passing, the duke of Wirtemberg brought over to England twenty battalions from the confederate army for the assistance of king William, but happily all danger was over before he arrived.

The king coming to the house on the seventh of March, gave the royal assent to a bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus act, and empowering his majesty to apprehend and detain such persons as were conspiring against his government, with three other acts. And three or four days afterwards, viz. on the eleventh of March, Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keys, three of the conspirators, were brought from Newgate to their trials at the Old Bailey upon a special commission; when, having been indulged by the court with all the liberty they could desire to make their defence, they were, upon full and plain evidence, found guilty of high-treason, for conspiring the death of the king; and sentence passing on them, they were drawn to Tyburn on the eighteenth of March, and there hanged and quartered. Charnock and King daringly confessed the fact in the paper they delivered at the gallows, and Keys did not deny it.

On the twenty-third of March sir John Friend, a brewer in the Minories, was brought to his trial, being charged with levying horse to join the enemy upon their landing; and having consulted with divers other persons about it, he was in some forwardness towards the execution. Sir William Perkins, who was formerly one of the six clerks in Chancery, was also tried for high-treason in levying war, &c. it being proved, amongst other things, that a great quantity of arms for that purpose were found in a garden of his country-house, where he had caused them to be buried upon the discovery. For this they both received sentence, and were drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged and quartered on the third of April. At the place of execution Mr. Collier, Mr. Snatt, and Mr. Cook, three nonjuring clergymen, gave them the absolution of the church, and then accompanied the ceremony with a solemn imposition of hands. The government, as may easily be imagined, was highly offended at this insult; nor was it suffered to pass unnoticed; Mr. Cook and Mr. Snatt were committed to Newgate, and an indictment was preferred against them in the King's-Bench on the eighth of April, but not proceeded upon.

On the twenty-first day of April, Rookwood, Lowick, and Cranborne, three of the other conspirators, were brought to the bar of the King's Bench, and were the first who had the benefit of the act passed in the last session for regulating trials in cases of high-treason, which allowed council, a copy of the indictment, and of the jury impannelled: but not all these assistances could avail them; the evidence against them was so plain and positive, that they were all three found guilty, and accordingly condemned as traitors. Mr. Peter Cook and captain Knightly were likewise brought to their trials: the first was convicted; the latter pleaded guilty: neither of them however suffered death; and soon after, most of the others being continued in confinement, the process ended. The evidences against the conspirators were, captain Porter, Mr. Harris, Blair, De la Rue, Bertram, Fisher, Goodman, Haywood, and Ewebank, all of them concerned in the design of an insurrection; some of them in the scheme of assassination. Pendergrafs likewise agreed to give testimony, notwithstanding the promise he had obtained from his majesty of not obliging him to it against his will. We must not forget that a proclamation was issued, offering a reward of five hundred pounds for apprehending the lord Montgomery and sir John Fenwick, suspected to be accomplices in the plot. The earl of Aylesbury had been already apprehended and committed to the Tower on the like suspicion.

The session of parliament was soon brought to a conclusion. A fund was created, upon which the sum of two millions five hundred and sixty-four thousand pounds was to be raised, which, in the opinion of the best judges, was neither just nor prudent. A new bank was proposed, called the Land Bank, because the securities were to be upon land: this was the main difference between it and the Bank of England. This scheme, supposed to have been contrived by Dr. Chamberlain, the famous man-midwife, was chiefly managed by Foley and Harley, and was generally thought to be a plan of the Tory party to ruin the Bank of England. The company of the latter petitioned against the bill, but without effect; for it passed through both houses, and at last received the royal assent: but this Bank came to nothing, nobody subscribing to it; and therefore I refer the reader to the Statutes, if he desires to see the plan on which it was attempted.

On the twenty-seventh of April the king came to the house of peers, and closed the session with a speech, in which he thanked the houses for the generous concern they had shewn for his person, and the zealous attachment they had manifested to his government; as also for the large supplies they had granted him, and desired they would preserve the public peace, and assist the lords justices while he was abroad: and then, his majesty having given his royal assent to several acts, the parliament was prorogued to the sixteenth of June †.

* Proceedings of the House of Commons, iii. 21, &c.

† Besides the laws already mentioned, an act was passed this session for voiding all elections, at which the elected had been at any expence in meat, drink, or money, to procure votes. From the present scandalous practice, which reflects equal dishonour upon the electors and elected, one would imagine that this law had been formally repealed. Another act was passed against unlawful and double returns. A third for the more easy recovery of small tythes. A fourth to prevent marriages without licence or bans; imposing a fine of one hundred pounds upon the minister, and ten pounds upon the bridegroom. A fifth, enabling the inhabitants of Wales to dispose of all their personal estates as they should think fit. This law was intended to abolish an ancient custom which prevailed in that country, by which the widow and younger children claim a share of the effects, commonly called their reasonable part, though the effects had been otherwise disposed of by will or deed. See stat. 8. W. III.

The parliament being up, his majesty was pleased to appoint the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-keeper Somers, and five other great officers of state, lords justices for governing the kingdom in his absence. The same day he created sir John Lowther, baronet, Baron Lowther and Viscount Lonsdale; and sir John Thompson, baronet, was created Baron Haverham. On the fifth of May the king embarked for Holland, and arrived at the Hague on the seventh, where I shall leave him till I relate some other occurrences that happened while the parliament was sitting.

Admiral Russel, as we have said, going upon the French coast, battered many of their ships and transports that lay in the harbours ready for invading this country; and the rest ran so close in shore, that finding it impossible to burn them, he determined to quit his station and return into Dover Road, leaving sir Cloudesley Shovel to watch the motions of the enemy. This squadron continued cruising off the French coast all the month of March, without attempting any thing; but towards the end of the month, being reinforced with several Dutch ships, fire-ships, and bomb-vessels, he received orders to undertake the bombardment of Calais; in pursuance of which he immediately came before that town, and made the necessary dispositions for executing his orders. On the third of April the bomb-vessels began firing about noon, and continued till the evening, in which time above three hundred bombs and carcasses fell either in the town or among the ships in that harbour, with such effect as to set many houses and vessels on fire, and did otherwise very great mischief: but as most of the bomb-vessels had their rigging destroyed and their mortars dismounted, the wind too blowing very hard from the shore, sir Cloudesley, having left a squadron to keep in the French men of war at Dunkirk, returned into the Downs, where he received orders to join the grand fleet at Spithead. In the mean while the fleet arrived from Cadiz under sir George Rooke, who had, upon occasion of the first discovery of the plot, orders sent him, for the better security of the nation, to return home; and he arrived safely at Spithead towards the latter end of April.

The confederates began this campaign with burning a vast magazine which the enemy had laid up for their army at Givet. Notwithstanding this rough beginning, the campaign in Flanders proved the most pacific of any that had happened during the war; and indeed the difficulties that both armies had to struggle with were such, that very little was to be expected. The French, by keeping such numerous armies on foot, had entirely exhausted their country; and it is certain that towards the close of the preceding year Lewis had seriously thought of making peace; nor is it probable that any thing would have retarded his overtures to that end but the prospect of the invasion of England succeeding: but this design failing, and there being now a very fair view of our being able to weather our other inconveniences, there was no room for nor occasion of delay. Lewis therefore sent M. de Callieres as his ambassador to the States-general, for settling such preliminaries as might be a sufficient basis for a treaty. The Dutch, with the consent of king William, who was so distressed for want of money, that though at the head of an army greatly superior to the enemy, he found he could not avail himself of that advantage, listened to the proposal; and it was agreed to accept the mediation of the king of Sweden, which the baron Lillenroot his ambassador at the Hague had offered. However, before any treaty was set on foot, the duke of Savoy made a separate peace with France, without the privity of the allies.

Victor Amadeus, duke of Savoy, was a prince of all others the most easily persuaded to break his engagements when his interest was concerned. Lewis XIV. knew this, and omitted no endeavours to detach the duke from the grand alliance: he had ordered the count de Tessé, afterwards marshal of France, an amiable and able man, of a genius formed for pleasing, which is the first qualification of a negociator, to begin a private treaty at Turin; and marshal Catinat, who was equally skilled in making peace and war, put the finishing hand to the affair. There did not want two such able men to determine the duke of Savoy to accept of what was to his advantage: they restored him his country, gave him a sum of money, and proposed a marriage between the young duke of Burgundy, son to the dauphin of France, and his daughter. Matters were soon agreed between them: the duke and Catinat concluded the treaty in the month of July at our Lady of Loretto, whether they went under pretence of a pilgrimage of devotion*.

The allies in general were highly enraged at this perfidious conduct of the duke: his ministers indeed attempted to excuse it, by alleging the necessity he lay under of preventing his own ruin, and that he could not in common prudence let slip a conjuncture which brought such singular and happy advantages to his family. Lord Galway, our general and minister at Turin, was very warm in his expostulations on this occasion; and, agreeable to William's instructions, after having condemned the duke's ingratitude, on account of the large subsidies paid him, and assuring him that the allies would not come into the neutrality, made him an offer of larger subsidies, to be paid monthly, if he would recede from the treaty: but the duke had chosen his side, and was not to be diverted from his new engagements: nay, he soon after exerted a stretch of policy, or rather perfidy, not to be paralleled in history; for it being one of the articles of his treaty with the court of France, that if the allies should refuse to depart the duke's dominions, they should be expelled by the joint arms of France and Savoy; and they refusing this condition, as also a neutrality for Italy that was offered them, the duke being appointed generalissimo of the French king, put himself at the head of Catinat's army of fifty thousand men, which had advanced into the plains of Turin, and entering the duchy of Milan, laid siege to Valencia; so that in one campaign he commanded two contending armies. Valencia was reduced to the utmost extremity, when it was saved by the king of Spain's agreeing to accept of a neutrality for Italy. Thus ended the war in Piedmont, after it had lasted six years.

On the seventeenth of June this year died John Sobieski, the martial king of Poland, of an apoplectic fit, in the seventieth year of his age, leaving that elective kingdom in much confusion, of which the French king thought to have made great advantage, by getting the prince of Conti, of the blood royal of France, chosen in the late king's room; and it cost Lewis vast sums to make a party for that purpose: but when all was done he was disappointed in his views, and Augustus elector of Saxony was placed on the throne of Poland, after having changed his religion.

The campaign in Catalonia and on the Rhine was as inconsiderable as that in Flanders: the advantage, if any, was on the side of the allies; but all the armies went into quarters about the beginning of October. Though our armies did so little by land, which indeed was chiefly owing to their want of pay, the generals being more taken up with providing a subsistence for their troops than in military enterprizes, yet our fleet was not altogether idle by sea; for besides the bombardment of Calais already mentioned, lord Berkeley, to whom the command of the fleet was given this summer, greatly insulted the French coasts, pillaging and burning a number of villages on the islands of Grouais, Houat, and Heydic. He also took a ship from Newfoundland, with twenty small vessels, and carried off about one thousand five hundred horses and black cattle. On the fifth of July he sent captain Beckman with a squadron of ten men of war and bomb-vessels, to bombard the town of St. Martin's in the Isle of Rhé, who performed his commission very exactly, throwing in the space of one night two thousand two hundred and thirty bombs and carcasses into the place, by which the best part of the town was burnt down, with all the warehouses and the goods contained in them, notwithstanding the place was very well fortified, and our ships had to sustain a very warm fire all the time. On the 7th the same squadron bombarded Olonne with the like success. After this, the admiral finding it not convenient to land on Belleisle, which had been projected, continued to alarm the French coast till towards the beginning of August, when he was under the necessity to return to Spithead to clean and revictual his ships.

These enterprizes, however inconsiderable the French writers affect to represent them, were certainly of great service, by keeping the maritime coasts of France under perpetual apprehension, in so much that the ministry of that kingdom were obliged to keep sixty thousand men continually in arms to oppose an invasion, which they expected from the English. In the mean while, rear-admiral Benbow was with a small squadron blocking up M. Du Bart, the French admiral, in Dunkirk; but that bold adventurer found means to escape in a fog; and sailing to the Baltic, fell in with a large fleet of Dutch merchant ships, under convoy of six or seven frigates. These he took, together with a great number of the trading vessels; but in the height of this victory the outward-bound Boston fleet appeared in sight, under an escort of thirteen men of war, who immediately attacked Du Bart, and forced him to burn four of the frigates and thirty-five merchantmen, and make the best of his way into Dunkirk. Thus ended the naval operations of this year, during the whole course of which we rode incontestible masters of the sea, blocked up the best part of the French fleets in their harbours, insulted their coasts, and protected our trade better than it had been known for many years past*.

As the distress of the army abroad was very great for want of their pay, occasioned by the calling in and recoinage of the money, so was there a sad confusion in England, especially among the labourers and meaner sort of people, who could get little or no money for their work, and indeed few could employ any workmen: whereupon an order of council was issued in July this summer, that the justices of peace should frequently meet in their divisions, to consider of the most effectual means to relieve and subsist the poor people till money became more plentiful; and another order was issued, commanding the attorney-general to prosecute all those who entered into confederacies not to employ any persons in the woollen and other manufactures during this scarcity of money. These difficulties it was that in a manner compelled king William to hearken to terms of peace, which he would otherwise scarcely have done.

While the king was abroad a parliament was held in Scotland, and another in Ireland; the former was opened on the eighth of September by the lord Murray, secretary of state, lately created earl of Tullibardine, and appointed king's commissioner. The Scots seemed to vie with the English in expressing their abhorrence of the late intended invasion and conspiracy: the parliament unanimously signed an association similar to that of England: they granted a supply of one million four hundred and forty thousand pounds for maintaining their forces by sea and land; and passed an act for securing their religion, lives, and liberties, in case his majesty should come to an untimely death; and they obliged all persons enjoying public posts or offices to sign the association; after which they were prorogued†.

Lord Capel, lord-deputy of Ireland, dying on the thirtieth of May this year, the council, in pursuance of an act made in the thirty-third year of Henry VIII. elected the lord-chancellor Porter to be lord-justice and chief governor of that kingdom till his majesty's further pleasure should be known. The Irish parliament met at Dublin on the twenty-seventh of June, when the commons expelled Mr. Sanderson, the only member of their house who had not signed the Association. By this time sir Charles Porter, lord-chancellor, and the earls of Montrath and Drogheda, were by the king's letter appointed lords-justices of Ireland; and the parliament having passed a bill transmitted from England, called, "An act for confirming several outlawries and attainders, as also for vesting in his majesty the estates of those who were dead in rebellion there or in foreign parts;" and being fearful this act might prove prejudicial to the protestants, they presented an address to the lords-justices, "beseeching their excellencies to transmit to England certain heads of a bill which they had prepared, and therewith presented to their excellencies, for saving the estates, rights, titles, and posessions of protestants, from being prejudiced by the said act; and they unanimously, earnestly, and humbly intreated their excellencies to recommend the same so effectually to his majesty, that it might be returned to them in order to be passed into a law."

Their excellencies hereupon were pleased to return the following answer: "That they believed the whole kingdom was satisfied that the king designed nothing more than the good of his protestant subjects, the orders he had been pleased to give them being express to that effect; and they had reason to hope it had been observed how exactly they had followed those orders: that they should always continue so to do, and in that case particularly should be very careful to represent to his majesty the preservation of the interests of the protestants, to the end that no one of them might suffer by that law, which they did believe so advantageous to the protestant interest in general." The lords justices and the parliament agreeing thus well, and the latter having by way of excise and other means raised the money expected from them, and having also passed an act for banishing all papists exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and all regulars of the popish clergy, out of the kingdom; another to confirm the articles of Limeric; and a third to prevent protestants intermarrying with papists; they were by the lords justices prorogued. In the mean while, sir Charles Porter was seized with a fit of the apoplexy, which carried him off instantly*.

The winter season now advancing, put a conclusion to all military and naval operations for this year; and king William leaving Holland, arrived in England on the fourth of October to meet his parliament, which after several prorogations met on the twentieth of the same month, when his majesty opened the session with a speech from the throne to the following purport:

He told them, "That he thought it a great happiness that this year had passed without any disadvantage abroad, or disorder at home, considering the great disappointments in the funds†, and the difficulties that had arisen in receiving the money: that the business they had before them would be attended with great difficulties, as they were not only to provide for the next year's service, but to make good the vast deficiencies of the last. He observed, that overtures of peace had indeed been made him, but he said he was certain they would not agree with him: that the only way to procure an honourable peace was to treat sword in hand; for this purpose he said, the supplies for this year must at least be equal to those for the last. Besides which, he pressed them to maintain the honour of parliament, by making good the funds they had granted. He again put them in mind of the civil list and the French protestants, of making some further provision, for remedying "the difficulties relating to the coin, and for the recovery of the national credit‡."

In answer to this speech the commons presented an address to his majesty, wherein they assured him, "that, although this was the eighth year they had assisted him with large supplies to carry on this just and necessary war, they should not be amused nor diverted from their firm resolutions of obtaining by war a safe and honourable peace; and concluded with declaring, that they would continue to support his majesty against all enemies, both at home and abroad†."

After these expressions of loyalty they began to deliberate upon the three important points which the king had recommended to their consideration in his speech, and which indeed seemed to demand the most immediate and serious attention; these were, the farther remedying the bad state of the coin, the providing supplies for the ensuing year, and the restoring the public credit.

With regard to the coin, they brought in a bill repealing the act for taking off the obligation and encouragement of coining guineas, and allowing the importation and coining of gold in the mint‡; for as the currency of guineas was now reduced to nearly their real value, the reason for importing them no longer subsisted, and the act which had passed for that purpose was of consequence become unnecessary.

They next proceeded to take into consideration the estimates and accounts, and voted five millions for the sea and land-service, besides a supply for the civil list, and new funds for making good the deficiencies and securing the public debts, amounting to ten or twelve millions¶.

The last and the most difficult point was to restore the public credit, which was at this time in a miserable condition, owing to the great scarcity of money, insomuch that government tallies and debentures were at forty, fifty, and sixty per cent. discount, and even bank-bills at twenty per cent. discount. And as the sellers of the government securities and bank-notes became very numerous, they were in a manner hawked about the Exchange, where several persons who were possessed of money, which they had hoarded up as it was delivered from the mint, raised vast fortunes by buying them up. This, it is said, gave rise to the infamous practice of Stock-jobbing, many buying that had no money to purchase, and selling stock they were not possessed of: a thousand stories were framed to raise or lower this kind of stock, in order to purchase or sell to advantage; which traffick continued till an effectual stop was put to it by an act of the last session.

Such was the diligence of this parliament, that, notwithstanding the complicated difficulties they had to encounter, they contrived a scheme for discharging the debts of the government by a continuation of certain duties upon births, marriages, windows, the subsidy on tonnage and poundage, and various other articles, for ten years; and all the branches constituted a general fund, since known by the name of the General Mortgage. As

† All the funds for this year proved defective; and the land-bank failed, without having produced any other effect than that of injuring the credit of the national bank by its opposition. The loss of the nation upon the recoinage amounted to two millions two hundred thousand pounds: and though the mint was constantly employed, so as to furnish about eighty thousand pounds a week, yet was not this sufficient to supply the circulation, especially as those who received the new money either kept it up, or disposed of it at an unreasonable advantage.

the Bank had been found of singular service to the government, in order to raise the credit of it, they agreed to increase the capital stock another million, by new subscriptions, and to continue their term to the year 1710; and those new subscriptions were allowed to be made in tallies and bank-notes; yet, as there were good funds now settled for paying them off, the monied men, who could bear stock, ran into it, by which means bank-bills and notes in a short time rose to par again. But nothing supplied the want of cash at this time better than the parliament's authorizing the treasury to issue out near three millions in Exchequer-bills, which being allowed in taxes, and circulated by the Bank for a moderate premium, contributed greatly to restore things to their ancient state. In fine, never were more vigorous measures taken to support the credit of government; though it must be confessed, the weight of the enormous impositions laid upon the subject to create the several funds for this purpose, is severely felt at this day.

These affairs being thus happily settled, the attention of the commons was transferred to the case of sir John Fenwick, who had been concerned in the late conspiracy: this affair was of such a nature that it deserves to be related in a particular manner. This gentleman had been concealed in London from the time of the discovery of the plot till the beginning of June this year, when he endeavoured to make his escape over to France, but was taken at Romney, on the coast of Kent, before he could get on shipboard. He had, when taken, written a letter to his lady, the daughter of the earl of Carlisle, which fell into the government's hands, and contained such matter as plainly evidenced him guilty: for he appeared thereby so far sensible of his crime and danger, that he could propose no other way for the present to save himself, but by getting a jury packed that would be obstinate and not bring him in guilty; or by making friends to the king for a pardon, or reprieve at least, to gain time. Being brought to town and committed to Newgate, after consulting with his friends, and it being concluded that none of the said methods would avail him, there was another expedient pitched upon, which had a more apparent prospect of success; this was, to set up a counter-plot, by accusing a number of the king's best friends of having been guilty of conspiring against him: it was thought this would get his trial (which was to have been brought on at common-law), deferred till the king's return to England, especially as some promises had been made him, if he would discover his accomplices.

Sir John accordingly entered into a treaty with the court for turning evidence, and amused the ministry from time to time with one plausible story or other, and at length delivered in a long paper of information, wherein he charged the duke of Shrewsbury, the earl of Marlborough, the earl of Bath, admiral Ruffel, the lord Godolphin, and commissary Crawford, with holding a correspondence with king James: this gave him an opportunity of having his trial put off for some time. In the mean time his friends had another game to play, which was to seduce the evidences who swore the treason against him; these were captain Porter and Mr. Goodman, and he was so fortunate as to succeed with Goodman, who went over to France; but Porter had been a witness against so many of the conspirators, that he did not think he should be safe in France, and having a pension of three hundred pounds a year from king William, he determined to discover those who had attempted to buy him off, tho' they offered him a thousand pounds a year, upon his retiring, and a large sum of money in hand: he also contrived the matter so, that when a payment of six hundred pounds was made him by one captain Donalow and one Clancy, in behalf of sir John, he had some of the king's messengers in the next room, who rushed in and seized the two agents, the latter of whom was afterwards convicted of tampering with the king's evidence, condemned to pay a fine of five thousand marks, and to stand three times in the pillory, which sentence was executed upon him. However, as one witness only remained, sir John began to think himself out of danger: the lords-justices did not think proper to proceed to his trial, but deferred the prosecution of him till his majesty came over, when they proposed to bring the matter before the parliament.

Accordingly, when the session began, notwithstanding the multiplicity of important affairs in which that assembly were engaged, the great men who had been charged by sir John Fenwick with corresponding with king James, being determined to clear their reputations and make the informer feel the weight of their resentment, found means to introduce the affair into the house. Admiral Ruffel, who was one of the persons accused, on the sixth of November brought the several papers containing the informations of sir John Fenwick into the house of commons, and moved that they might be read, that he might have an opportunity of justifying himself. The papers being read, Fenwick was ordered to be brought before the house; who, finding that he gave no satisfactory answers to the questions then put to him, nor could support his charge against the several noble peers and members of the house whom he had accused in his information, the house voted his informations false and scandalous, and ordered a bill to be brought in to attain sir John Fenwick of high treason; at the second reading of which, on the thirteenth of November, the prisoner, at his own request, was heard by his counsel against the bill. The king's counsel, the serjeants Gould and Lovell, opened the evidence they had for proving the suggestions of the bill; they were answered by sir Thomas Powis and sir Bartholomew Shower, the prisoner's counsel, who alleged, that if the others would only call in evidence the suggestions of the bill, they were ready to answer to that; but if they meant to prove sir John guilty of the conspiracy by living witnesses, they were not prepared for that, as they did not know whether they should have the liberty of producing any. And being thereupon ordered to withdraw, the house debated the same a long time; and, after much contestation, it was at last resolved, "That the counsel, in managing evidence against sir John Fenwick, be allowed to produce evidence touching the allegations of the bill, and of the treasons for which he was indicted."

The house resuming the consideration of this matter on the sixteenth of November, the king's counsel produced their evidence, captain Porter, who gave an ample relation of what he knew concerning lady Fenwick's having practised with him about his evidence; though it was objected by sir John's counsel, that what a wife said or did, could be no evidence against her husband. Then the king's counsel produced the records of Clancy's conviction, and so proceeded to Goodman's examination, taken under the hand of Mr. secretary Vernon, which they desired might be read; but this was opposed by the prisoner's counsel, and the house entered into a hot debate about it; but at length it was carried, that the information should be read, and that afterwards some of the grand-jury should give an account upon what evidence they found the bill of indictment against sir John Fenwick. This was also objected to by the counsel, as an extraordinary step. The record of the conviction of Mr. Peter Cook, son to sir Miles Cook, at whose trial Goodman had deposed against sir John Fenwick, was also read, which was objected to, as illegal, by the prisoner's counsel, who, it must be confessed, appear to have said as much in behalf of their client, as the nature of the case would admit. It was agreed, that the counsel for the prisoner might, if they had any witnesses to examine on his behalf, do it that night; but they having nothing but a record to produce, accepted of the time offered them till the next day, to make their observations on the evidence for the king; and then they and the prisoner were ordered to withdraw. The next day, sir John still declining to deal more clearly and candidly in respect to his accusations of several persons of quality, and his counsel having offered all they could in his behalf, it was resolved by the house, that Mr. secretary Vernon should give in his evidence relating to the various artifices sir John, or persons by his direction, had made use of to put off his trial, and that in his and the counsel's presence on both sides.

Here the counsel were discharged from their farther attendance at that time, and the order for reading the bill a second time being read, and the same afterwards opened by the speaker, and no member rising to speak, he asked whether he should put the question for committing it? This brought on very long and warm debates on both sides, about the extraordinary method of proceeding, the power and justice of parliament compared with other inferior courts of judicature, with several precedents of former bills of attainder, pro and con, with a number of other arguments, all reducible to this single question, whether sir John Fenwick, who was confessedly guilty, should be condemned to the punishment which his crime deserved, though he was protected by the forms of law, two witnesses not being to be found against him; an advantage, however, which he had not been able to obtain without having recourse to bribery and corruption? The Whigs supported the affirmative, the Tories contended for the negative; but, upon the whole, the result was, that the bill should be committed. The bill was read for the third time on the twenty-fifth of November, when the contest upon the debate ran as high as ever, the members being no less divided in their opinions than before; but the question being at length put for passing the bill, the house divided upon it, about eleven at night, when it was carried in the affirmative, by one hundred and eighty-nine voices against one hundred and fifty-six. It was then sent up to the lords for their concurrence, where it met with a great opposition, and the debates were the warmest and the longest of any that had ever been known; the bill, however, passed by a majority of seven voices only, there being sixty-eight for it, and sixty-one against it.

The lords who were for the negative, among whom were several of the king's servants and counsellors, entered their protest, which they grounded on the following reasons:

"I. Because bills of attainder against persons in prison, and who are therefore liable to be tried by common law, are of a dangerous consequence to the lives of the subjects, and may tend to the subversion of the laws of the kingdom.

"II. Because the evidence of grand-jury men, of what was sworn before them against sir John Fenwick, as also the evidence of the petty-jury men, were admitted here, both which are against the rules of the law; besides that they disagreed in their testimony.

"III. Because the information of Goodman in writing was received, which by law was not admitted; and the prisoner, for want of appearing face to face (as is by law required), could not have the advantage of cross-examining him: and it did not appear by evidence, that sir John Fenwick, or any person employed by him, had persuaded Goodman to withdraw himself; and it would be of very dangerous consequence, that any person so accused should be condemned, for by this means a witness who should be found insufficient to convict a man, shall have more power to hurt a man by his absence, than if he were produced vivâ voce against him.

"IV. Because if Goodman had appeared against him, he was infamous in the whole course of his life, and could not be a good witness, especially in cases of blood.

"V. Because in this case there was but one evidence, Porter, and he a very doubtful one.

"VI. Lastly, because sir John Fenwick was so inconsiderable a man, as to the endangering the peace of government, that there was no necessity of proceeding against him in so extraordinary a manner."

The bill of attainder soon after had the royal assent; as at the same time another had to attain such as were concerned in the assassination plot, that had fled from justice, and for continuing several others of the conspirators in custody. Sir John Fenwick was complimented with the axe, in consideration of his rank and of his alliance with the family of Howard, and suffered on Tower-hill, on the twenty-eighth of March following, with seeming composure and resignation. He owned his loyalty to king James, and prayed for his restoration; but declared himself perfectly innocent of the assassination of king William, which he justly termed a most villainous project.

After Fenwick's business was over, the parliament proceeded to enact several laws for regulating the domestic œconomy of the nation, and, among others, passed an act for the more effectual relief of creditors in cases of escape, and for preventing abuses in prisons and pretended privileged places. It seems that, ever since the Reformation, certain places in and about the city of London, which had been sanctuaries during the prevalence of the popish religion, afforded asylum to debtors, and were become receptacles of desperate persons, who set all law at defiance. One of these places, called White Friars, was filled with a crew of ruffians, who every day committed acts of violence lence and outrage; but the law was so vigorously put in execution, that they were obliged to abandon the district, which was soon filled with more creditable inhabitants. The Mint, in Southwark, another of those infamous places, was likewise cleared of its dissolute tenants in the same manner.

Towards the beginning of this session, the commons entered into an enquiry concerning some late miscarriages of the fleet, when sir George Rooke was ordered to attend the house, to give an account why the Toulon squadron was suffered to get unmolested into Brest. That admiral attended accordingly, and produced copies both of his journal and of the orders he had received from the admiralty; which being examined, it was ordered that sir Cloudesley Shovel should lay before the house, copies of all such orders as he had received in relation to the joining sir George Rooke: which being done, and much time being spent in both houses about this affair, it did not appear that either of the admirals had failed in their duty, or were deserving that censure their enemies attempted to bring upon them †.

During this session, captain Thomas Vaughan, commander of the Royal Clancarty, was tried, convicted, and executed, as a traitor, for having accepted and acted under commission from the French king.

The Eddystone rock, lying off the port of Plymouth, having been experienced to be very dangerous to navigation, several ships having been cast away thereon, the corporation of the Trinity-house being applied to, they, in this year 1696, began a light-house thereon, and completed it in three years time, great numbers of masters and owners of English ships agreeing, in consideration thereof, to pay one penny per ton outwards, and the like inwards; and it proved of very great benefit to shipping passing that way, till, in the great and dreadful storm in 1703, it was blown down and destroyed. It was again directed to be rebuilt, by an act of parliament in the fourth year of queen Anne, and the like duty on tonnage of ships granted for its support to the Trinity-house. Yet it has lately been once more demolished, by fire; and is again restored by the like means to its former utility, to the great benefit of not only the British trade and navigation, but of the numerous shipping of other nations passing that way.

Upon the repeated complaints of the merchants of England, of their great sufferings by the French men of war and privateers, and of the little regard or care that had for many years past been taken of trade and commerce, king William, desirous to redress these grievances, did in this year erect a new and standing council for commerce and plantations, in their most comprehensive sense, commonly styled the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations: one of the first appointed to this board was the famous John Locke, esq. before-mentioned. This board (which still subsists) consists of a first lord-commissioner, who is usually a peer of the realm, and of seven other commissioners, with a salary of one thousand pounds per annum each. To this board proposals are made, by merchants and others, for the ease, improvement, and encouragement of our commerce, navigation, plantations, manufactures, fisheries, &c. for redressing all grievances and burdens on trade, which are there argued between one party and another, and all mostly heard by council: British consuls appointed to reside in foreign parts, for the benefit and protection of our commerce, receive their instructions from this board, with whom they are obliged to hold a constant correspondence; as are also the governors of our American plantations: and reports are made to the commissioners, from time to time, how Britain may be best supplied with naval stores from our said colonies; what new productions may be raised, or old ones improved, in America. Enquiries also come before this board for regaining of lost branches of trade, as well as to enlarge those we are possessed of, or set new ones on foot; with many other matters too tedious to relate, of which the commissioners are to make their reports, and give their opinions thereon, to the king and privy-council. From all which it appears, that this board of trade is a most excellent institution.

In this session an act passed for the increase and encouragement of seamen, establishing a register for thirty thousand sailors, to be in readiness at all times, as the preamble sets forth, for supplying the royal navy, in consideration of a yearly premium or bounty of forty shillings each. It enacts, That none but such registered seamen shall be capable of preferment to any commission or warrant-offices in the royal navy: they shall have a double share or dividend for all prizes, more than non-registered seamen of equal rank; with other privileges as in that act set forth: and particularly, they were to have the sole right, when maimed or superannuated, of being admitted into the newly established hospital for seamen at Greenwich; or, if killed in the service, their widows and children were to have the same admission †. The law for registering seamen was unhappily repealed by an act of the ninth year of queen Anne; and although sundry schemes have since been set on foot for the reviving such a register, yet so many objections have been started, that no law has as yet been framed for securing a body of seamen in readiness, in case of any sudden emergency, without having recourse to the cruel and unconstitutional practice of pressing.

By another act of this session our plantations were farther regulated, and the former acts of navigation improved ‡. By this act, no goods shall be imported or exported to or from any of the British colonies or plantations, in Asia, Africa, or America, but in ships built in England, Ireland, or the plantations, and navigated by three-fourths mariners of the said places, on pain of forfeiture of ship and goods: nor shall it be lawful to land in Scotland or Ireland any merchandize of the growth or product of the plantations, unless they have been first landed in England, and paid the duties there: and in order to subject the great charter colonies in America more closely to the kingdom of England, it was by this same act provided, that n charter proprietors of land on the continent of America shall sell or dispose of the same to any but natural-born subjects, without his majesty's licence in council for that purpose.

On the twelfth of December this year his majesty was pleased to nominate the earl of Pembroke lord privy-seal, the viscount Villiers, and sir Joseph Williamson, knight, lately admitted into the privy-council for that purpose, to be his majesty's plenipotentiaries, to treat with those of the French king, touching a general peace; the preliminaries of which had been settled between M. de Callieres and the States-general. The earl of Galway and Mr. Methuen were also constituted lords justices of Ireland, and the latter lord-chancellor of that kingdom, in the room of sir Charles Porter, deceased. The earl of Manchester was also appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the state of Venice. In February 1697 the earl of Aylesbury, who had been committed on account of the conspiracy, was released upon bail; but this privilege was denied to lord Montgomery, who had been imprisoned in Newgate on the same account. Much about the same died lord Berkeley of Stratton, who had signalized himself as a sea commander.

The act above-mentioned, and some others of less note, being ready for the royal assent, his majesty came to the house of peers on the sixteenth of April (1697) and signed them; after which he closed this long session with a speech, in which he thanked his parliament for the large supplies they had granted him; congratulated them on the success of their endeavours for restoring public credit; acquainted them with his intention of going over to the continent; and begged they would carry down into their respective counties the same loyal principles which they had so conspicuously displayed in parliament.

The earl of Dorset having resigned the office of lord-chamberlain of the household, his majesty was pleased to bestow it upon the earl of Sunderland, who was at the same time sworn of the privy-council, and was now looked upon as the greatest favourite of all the English ministers. Sir John Somers was also constituted lord-chancellor of England, and at the same time created baron of Evesham, in the county of Worcester. Arnold Van Keppel was created earl of Albemarle. On the twenty-second of April the king appointed the following noblemen lords justices during his absence; namely, the archbishop of Canterbury; the lord-chancellor Somers; the earl of Pembroke, lord privy-seal; the duke of Devonshire, lord-steward; the duke of Shrewsbury, secretary of state; the earl of Sunderland, lord-chamberlain; the earl of Dorset; the earl of Romney; and admiral Edward Russel, for whom a patent was preparing to create him Baron Russel of Shingey, viscount Barfleur in Normandy, and earl of Orford, which was accordingly done the beginning of the following month. William having made these promotions, embarked on the twenty-sixth of April for Holland, that he might be at hand to manage the negotiations for a general peace, the preliminaries of which had been already concluded at the Hague, under the mediation of Charles XI. king of Sweden, and were signed on the fourteenth of February, in the presence of Mr. Lillienroot the Swedish plenipotentiary, by Callieres the French ambassador, and by the ministers of all the allies, except the ambassador of Spain, who demanded as a sine qua non, that France should agree to restore all the places mentioned in a long list which that minister produced to the assembly. The preliminaries as agreed to were as follow:

I. The French agreed that the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be the basis of the ensuing negotiation.

II. That Strasburgh should be restored to the emperor, in the same condition as the French took it.

III. That Luxemburg should be restored to the Spaniards in the condition it was now [but here the French made the allies an offer of an equivalent for the said places.]

IV. That Mons and Charleroi should be surrendered as they were.

V. That all places taken by the French in Catalonia since the peace of Nimeguen, should be restored as they were.

VI. That the city and castle of Dinant should be ceded to the bishop of Liege.

VII. That all re-unions since the treaty of Nimeguen should be made void.

VIII. That Lorraine should be restored, according to the condition of that treaty. It was moreover agreed, that in case the conditions made in respect to that country should not please, that article should be referred to the general treaty, and that it should be the first point treated on in the negotiation.

Here it was also agreed more particularly, that upon the conclusion of the peace Lewis XIV. should acknowledge the prince of Orange for king of Great Britain, without any restriction, condition, or reservation; but as to the pretensions of other princes, whether in the confederacy or not, they were to be referred to the general negotiation.

Besides these, there were other preliminaries, founded on the demands of the several German ministers, which are not of consequence enough to claim particular notice. The preliminaries being thus settled, it next remained to fix upon a place for holding the general congress. The emperor proposed that it should be held at Aix la Chapelle or Francfort, or some other town in Germany: the other allies were more disposed to negotiate in Holland. At length the French king suggested, that no place would be more proper than a palace belonging to king William, called Newburgh-house, situated between the Hague and Delft, close by the village of Ryswick; and to this proposition the ministers agreed. The plenipotentiaries of England were, the earl of Pembroke, the lord Villiers, and sir Joseph Williamson; and France sent the famous president Harlay and M. de Crecy to the assistance of Callieres.

The several powers engaged in the war were actuated by very different motives in their desires for a peace. The English and Dutch had no other view than to restrain the power of France within proper bounds, to establish a good barrier for the Netherlands, and to procure an acknowledgement of king William's title. Lewis was desirous of a peace, on account of the miserable condition to which his kingdom was reduced; but he had yet another view, which he carefully concealed from the knowledge of the allies, and which was concerted with the deepest policy.

His grand design was to prevent the certain succession of the vast Spanish monarchy from devolving upon the other branch of the house of Austria, on the death of the king of Spain, who was now in a very declining state: and he even entertained hopes that the house of Bourbon might at last come in for a share in the dismemberment, and perhaps one day succeed to the whole. The formal renunciations made by his wife and mother seemed no other than trivial agreements, which ought to give way to a change of circumstances. In this view, to aggrandize the house of France, it was necessary to shew some moderation towards Europe, not to incense so many powers, who were still full of suspicions. The peace, he knew, would give him leisure to form new alliances, to settle the disorder in his finances, gain over those whom he had occasion for, and to form new bodies of militia in his kingdom: in a word, he found it requisite to give up something, in hopes of obtaining much more.

These were the private motives of the French court in the peace of Ryswick, which in the event actually procured the throne of Spain for the grandson of Lewis XIV. The emperor had an eye upon the same crown, and this had determined him to support the grand alliance. In pursuance of the resolutions of the plenipotentiaries, the conferences were opened on the ninth of May, N. S. (April 29, O. S.) at Ryswick; but the negotiations had like to have been interrupted by the death of Charles XI. king of Sweden, who had been received as mediator. He was succeeded by his son the famous Charles XII. then a minor: however, the late king having appointed the queen and five senators the administrators of the government during his son's minority, they resolved to continue the mediation, and sent full powers to M. Lillienroot for that purpose.

King William may justly be said to have been the great manager of this treaty, in respect to all the allies, especially if we consider that the Dutch plenipotentiaries acted nothing but in concert with him. This treaty was undoubtedly a matter of great concern to the court of St. Germain: the partizans of king James in England seemed all along confident that Lewis would never acknowledge the prince of Orange for king of England, and even ridiculed all notions of a peace founded on such a demand: yet it is certain that the French boggled the least of any thing at that. This James himself was soon made sensible of; and finding that he could not have a minister received from him at the treaty, he published a manifesto, setting forth the injustice done him, and protesting against all that was or should be done at the congress, in violation of his rights, as null and void. Besides this manifesto, he invited all the foreign ministers to a conference, and delivered to each a paper written in Latin to the same purport as his manifesto, and at the same time delivered himself to them to the following effect: "That if the calamitous state of his affairs had been less known to the world, and his case not so just, he had not even then, any more than before, broke silence, but would patiently have suffered all sorts of misfortunes, rather than have been instrumental in disturbing the peace then in agitation: that he was sensible the circumstances of the times, and much more that of his own fate, would not permit any one to engage in his quarrel; that therefore, without seeking any assistance or consolation, he was willing to submit to all his sufferings, as a punishment for his sins, in hopes that through the divine goodness he might one time or other enjoy the fruits of his patience. Nevertheless, added he, as I hold myself obliged by the laws of religion and nature to maintain, as far as I am able, my own interests and the rights of my son, I have in this instrument (delivering the Latin papers to the several ministers) expressed the sentiments I have always entertained, and always shall do as long as I live*."

Mean while the French, to bring down the demands of Spain, besieged and took Aeth in Flanders this year; king William, who had since recovered of a severe indisposition, not thinking proper to hazard his men for the relief of a place which, if taken, must necessarily be restored by the peace: nevertheless he effectually secured Brussels, which marshal Boufflers had determined to invest. In the month of June the duke of Vendome, who commanded the French forces in Catalonia, invested Barcelona both by sea and land, which, after having been gallantly defended for the space of nine weeks by the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt the governor, was at last surrendered, in consequence of an express order from the court of Madrid.

The Spaniards also suffered considerable losses in America this year, where monsieur de Pointis, a French commodore, with a small fleet equipped at the charge of a private company, had taken and plundered the town of Carthagena, and returned to France with a rich booty. Upon the whole, it appears that the king of England and the states-general, who had in a manner borne the whole burden of the war, connived at these conquests, to bring Spain the more readily to accept the offers of France; especially knowing, as I have observed before, that these places must be restored by the peace. This however was spinning the web of policy rather too fine; for the successes of the French at home and abroad were such as might have made Lewis master of the conditions of a peace, had he not been happily disappointed in another project of his, I mean that of placing the prince of Conti on the throne of Poland, vacant by the death of the famous John Sobieski.

This was the only regal crown then elective in the world. Natives and foreigners had equally a right to pretend to it; but to retain it required either a distinguished share of merit properly supported by intrigues to engage the suffrages, or else money enough to buy the kingdom, which is almost always put up at auction.

The candidates for the Polish crown were at first young Sobieski, son of the late king; the duke of Lorraine; prince Lewis of Baden; and Don Olivio de Odescalchi, the pope's nephew: but the abbe, afterwards cardinal, de Polignac had the art to engage the greater part of the suffrages in favour of the prince of Conti, known by the gallant actions he had performed at Steinkirk and Nerwende, or Landen: whereupon the other candidates finding themselves unable to oppose the superior influence of the French court, transferred their interest to Augustus elector of Saxony, who soon advanced with a considerable army to the frontiers of Poland. Lewis-Francis, prince of Conti, was however elected king by the majority of the nation, and proclaimed on the seventeenth of June, N. S. by the primate. Augustus was elected two hours after by another party, inferior in numbers: but Augustus was a sovereign prince, and powerful, and had a body of troops in readiness to support his interest: he had also privately secured the good offices of the imperial court, had engaged to change his religion, and to distribute eight millions of florins among the Poles, and to confirm all their privileges. The prince of Conti was absent, destitute of men, money, and power, and had nothing on his side but his name, and the intrigues of Polignac. Lewis XIV. contrary to his usual manner of proceeding, acted on this occasion with that lukewarm policy which begins an affair only to drop it again. The prince of Conti was sent over with only a small squadron of ships, and a few bills of exchange, with which he arrived in the road of Dantzic, in his way to Poland; but they would not even receive the prince at Dantzic, and his bills of exchange were protested. The intrigues of the pope and the emperor, and the money and troops of Saxony, had already secured the crown on his rival's head; and Conti returned with the empty glory of having been chosen king, while the court of France had the mortification of having shewn all Europe that she was not sufficiently powerful to make a petty northern prince*.

This disgrace which befel the prince of Conti, and the establishment of Augustus on the throne of Poland, was a great mortification to the French ministers at the congress of Ryswick, and made them more inclinable than ever to come to an accommodation. On the twentieth day of July the French ambassadors produced their project of a peace, in order to shorten the negotiation, which had hitherto proceeded very slowly, by reason of the numerous and complicated pretensions of the several powers; declaring at the same time, that if their project should not be accepted before the last day of August, France would not hold herself bound for the conditions she now offered: but Caunitz, the emperor's plenipotentiary, declared he would pay no regard to this limitation, unless France would previously engage to restore all the places and dominions she had wrested from the empire since the peace of Munster, whether by force of arms or pretence of right. On the thirtieth of August, however, he delivered to the mediator (M. Lillienroot) an ultimatum, importing, That he adhered to the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen, and accepted of Strasburg with its appurtenances: that he insisted upon the restoration of Lorraine to the prince of that name, and demanded that the church and chapter of Liege should be re-established in the possession of their incontestable rights. Next day the French plenipotentiaries declared, That the month of August being now expired, all their offers were vacated: that therefore the king of France would reserve Strasburg, and unite it with its dependencies to his crown for ever: that in other respects he would adhere to the project, and would restore Barcelona to the crown of Spain; but at the same time insisted that the terms must be accepted by the twentieth of September, otherwise he would think himself at liberty to recede. The Imperialists were much surprized at the short time prefixed by France for their answer. This was still the more mortifying to them, as they began now to be superior to the French on the Rhine; and the proceedings of the allies made them jealous lest the latter should sign a separate peace, and leave them out, especially as they saw that the Spaniards had now abated of their former obstinacy, and were ready to concur with England and Holland in putting a final hand to the negotiation. This occasioned some warm remonstrances on the part of the imperial plenipotentiary; but all that he could obtain was, that the term for adjusting the peace between France and the emperor should be prolonged to the first of November, and in the mean time an armistice be punctually observed. It was however resolved that the treaty between France, England, Spain, and Holland, should be signed on the twentieth of September, even though the emperor and empire should not concur†.

All this time we heard little or nothing of our plenipotentiaries; nor was it known whether they had done any thing at all till the very latter part of the negotiation; and the silence of the rest of the allies concerning the treaty had greatly amazed the French plenipotentiaries: but it seems the conclusion of the peace was to be owing to the same person who had been the cause of the war, king William: for while the negotiations at Ryswick were going on so slowly, it was so managed that the earl of Portland and Boufflers, when the confederate army was encamped near Brussels, and the French not far from thence, had four or five several meetings by order of their masters, in sight of the two armies. These interviews occasioned various speculations, and by the jealousies it raised in the minds of the several parties in the grand alliance, greatly conduced to the dispatch of the treaty. On the second of August the earl of Portland and marshal Boufflers signed a paper, in which the principal articles of the peace between France and England were adjusted. Next day king William quitted the camp of the allies, and retired to his house at Loo, sensible that he had taken such measures for a pacification as could not be disappointed.

It is said that the earl of Portland, in one of the conferences between him and Boufflers, insisted that king James and his family might be sent out of France, which the marshal would not yield to, but promised, in his master's name, that he would not disturb William in the possession of his crown. Lewis had before that imparted to king James the necessity he found himself under of coming to an accommodation with king William, but at the same time promised to allow him an annual pension of six hundred thousand livres, which James accepted with thanks; but added, that in any future treaties he would not consent that any proposals for his maintenance should be made or accepted, which might be an argument of his submission; and that he was resolved at least to transmit, uninjured, the succession of the title to his son, in hopes a series of more happy events might restore his fallen fortunes. Besides this subject of the field negotiation between the earl and the marshal, it was supposed by some of the deeper politicians, that the first foundation of the famous Partition-treaty was now laid; and it is not improbable but something of that kind was then proposed and considered.

At length the twentieth of September came, when either a happy peace or a long and bloody war was like to determine the fate of Europe. That day the English, Dutch, and Spanish plenipotentiaries, after a long conference with those of France, in which they adjusted all matters of difference remaining between any of them, mutually signed the peace a little before midnight, and then complimented each other upon the finishing so important a negotiation.

Caunitz and the other ministers of the empire were in the hall all or most part of that time; but they did not give their consent in what was done, nor contribute the least in bringing this matter to a period. On the contrary, they required M. Lillienroot, the mediator, to enter protests in the name of their respective masters and sovereign princes of the empire, "That this was a second time a separate peace had been made with France (meaning that of Nimeguen for one) in which the emperor and the empire had been excluded." On this occasion Don Bernardo de Quiros, and the other plenipotentiaries, excused themselves, by saying that they had for a considerable time been made acquainted with their sovereign's pleasure, and had received orders to make no farther delay, but to subscribe the treaty; and that if they had so done without suffering themselves to have been over-persuaded by the imperial ministers, it would have prevented the loss of the city of Barcelona, which was the consequence of their having deferred their assent."

The emperor was highly chagrined at the conduct of the allies; and his disgust was nothing alleviated by receiving advice, soon after the conclusion of the treaty, of a victory which his general prince Eugene of Savoy had obtained over the Turks at Zenta in Hungary, where the grand seignior commanded his army in person. In this battle, which was fought on the eleventh of September, the grand vizier, the aga of the janisaries, twenty-seven bashaws, and about thirty thousand men, were killed or drowned in the river Thiesse; six thousand men were wounded or taken, together with all their artillery, tents, baggage, provision, and ammunition, the grand seignior himself escaping with the utmost difficulty. Had the news of this important victory arrived some few weeks sooner, it might possibly have rendered the French more moderate in their demands on the empire; but having now taken off three of the most powerful states in the confederacy against them, they suffered it not to have the least influence on their conduct with regard to the others. The emperor therefore, fearing that he should be left alone to encounter the whole power of France, thought proper at length to submit to the terms which had been agreed on at the congress, and accordingly signed on the thirtieth day of October; and his example was followed by all the princes of the empire. It now remains to give the substance of the several treaties concluded at this famous congress of Ryswick.

The most material articles of the treaty between GREAT BRITAIN and FRANCE were as follow:

By the third (the two first being only words of form) all offences, injuries, and damages on either side, were to be forgotten.

By the fourth, the French king engaged that he would not, on any pretence, disturb or disquiet the king of Great Britain in the possession of his crown or government, nor assist his enemies, nor favour conspiracies against his person.

By the fifth, a free commerce was to be restored between the subjects of the two nations.

The seventh provides for the mutual restoration of all countries, islands, forts and colonies, which either the French or English possessed before the war.

By the eighth, commissaries were appointed to meet at London and settle the pretensions of each crown to Hudson's Bay, taken by the French during the late peace, and re-taken by the English in the course of the war; and to regulate the limits of places to be restored, as well as the exchanges to be made.

By the tenth, all ships and merchandizes taken on either side, twelve days after the publication of the peace, in the British and North seas, as far as Cape St. Vincent, within ten weeks beyond the said Cape and on this side the Equator, shall remain in the possession of the captors.

By the twelfth, six months are allowed to the subjects on either side to withdraw their effects, in case of a rupture between the two courts.

By the thirteenth, the principality of Orange, and all other lands belonging to the king of Great Britain as prince of Orange, were to be restored him with the mesne profits.

By the fifteenth, the treaty between the French king and the duke of Savoy, in 1696, is confirmed.

By the sixteenth, all powers were to be comprehended in this treaty which should be named within six months after the ratification thereof, and particularly the king of Sweden the mediator.

And by a separate article, the emperor was allowed to the first of November to accept the conditions agreed on for him between the two kings of England and France.

At the very instant that the French plenipotentiaries changed the name of prince of Orange, by which they usually designated king William, to that of king of Great Britain, the politicians of those times began to make some remarks on the fourth article; in which the French king barely allows king William the stile of king of Great Britain, without acknowledging his right, or stipulating not to support king James by name, or bringing him under any obligation to compel him to quit his dominions, as queen Anne obliged him to do in relation to the pretender at the peace of Utrecht: and indeed it was looked upon as a great defect in the treaty of Ryswick, that the succession of the princess Anne and her issue was not inserted. But the most melancholy part of this treaty was, that nothing was obtained in favour of the French protestants, tho' king William had obliged himself, by the grand alliance, not to make peace with France till the protestants of that kingdom had all their grants and and possessions restored them, with an entire liberty of conscience, nor till the estates of that kingdom might enjoy their antient and lawful privileges, with a great deal more to the same purpose. Lewis however on this occasion peremptorily refused to be laid under any restraint, or have any terms dictated to him in respect to his conduct towards his own subjects; and William, it is to be supposed, did not think this a sufficient reason for continuing the war, so that the French protestants were not so much as mentioned in the articles of peace, but abandoned to the fury of their incensed monarch. This negligence or acquiescence of William, by whichever name it may be called, does not seem to agree perfectly well with the title he was so fond of assuming on all occasions, that of the Protector of the Protestant Interest.

In the treaty between France and Holland it was agreed,

That all cities, lands, forts, islands, and places which had been taken on either side during the war, were to be restored, and particularly the fort of Pondicherry in the East Indies, was to be restored to the States.

But the greatest advantage the Dutch got by this peace was, the concluding a treaty of commerce with France very much in their favour*, while nothing of this kind was stipulated in behalf of England, only in general, that there should be a free trade on both sides.

Spain was in a particular manner benefited by this pacification; for by the treaty between that crown and France, Lewis engaged to restore the following places, viz. Gironne, Roses, Belver and Barcelona in Catalonia, Luxemburg, Charleroi, Mons, Courtray, Aeth, and all the towns, fortresses, and territories, taken by his arms in the provinces of Luxemburg, Namur, Brabant, Flanders, and Hainault, except eighty two towns and villages claimed by the French. These were to be left to the decision of commissioners; or in case they could not agree, to the arbitration of the States-general.

By the treaty between the emperor and empire and France, which was signed on the thirtieth of October, N. S. it was agreed,

That the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be the basis and foundation of this treaty, both in sacred and civil matters, unless where it was expressly covenanted to the contrary.

That the French king should restore to the emperor and empire, and the members thereof, whatever places had been taken, as well during the war by way of force, as by the name of unions and reunions, which were situated without Alsace, only the Roman catholic religion should remain in those places thus restored in the state it then was.

That France should yield up to the emperor and empire Fort Kiel, Friburg, Sturfort, Old Brisac, and Philipsburg.

That Dinant should be restored to the bishopric of Liege, and that the castles of Trierbach, Ebrenburg, Kiruburg, and the fortresses of Montroyal, works on which the great Vauban had exhausted his art, and the French king his treasury, should be demolished, and restored to their respective proprietors. And on the other hand it was agreed,

That the imperial town of Strasburg, the capital of Alsatia, and the dependencies on the left side of the Rhine, should be yielded up and united to France; so that the Rhine was looked upon as the boundary between the empire of France for some time†.

In certain preparatory articles settled between England and France, king William promised to pay a yearly pension to Mary d'Este, king James's queen, of fifty thousand pounds, or such sum as should be established for that purpose by act of parliament: now the English plenipotentiaries having declared this in the presence of those of Holland, the same was entered into the register of the ambassador-mediator, who delivered a copy of it to the ministers of France. It should seem however that these latter fell short in their politics on this occasion; for they should have required a more clear explanation of the matter, and that a time should be fixed for making the first payment. The British minister on this occasion insisted that the queen should give him a receipt on the behalf of his master, by the name and title of William III. king of Great Britain, which she absolutely refused, and so received no part of her dowry, at least during the continuance of this reign.

Europe was surprized, says M. de Voltaire, and the French filled with indignation, to see Lewis XIV. make peace as if he had been conquered. Harlai, Crecy, and Callieres, who negotiated and signed this treaty, durst not show themselves either at court or in the city; they were loaded with reproaches and derision, as if they had taken any step they had not been ordered by the king and the ministry. Certain it is, that by this treaty the French monarch found himself obliged to relinquish all his ambitious projects, and a stop was put, at least for some time, to the further progress of his arms. Had Lewis indeed had no latent design in thus yielding up so many important places which he had conquered, the world would have had reason to say he acted moderately: but his real view in this seeming moderation was to disarm and disunite the allies, that so he might the more easily seize on the Spanish monarchy, upon the death of its old and feeble king Charles II. now daily expected, tho' it did not happen till three years later.

King William having by the peace of Ryswick firmly established himself on the English throne, and accomplished his aim of putting a stop to the encroachments of the French monarch, returned

* This treaty of commerce was concluded for twenty years. It is thereby stipulated, that the Dutch subjects shall enjoy the same privileges, franchises, &c. in France as Lewis's own subjects did; and that they might freely carry to Marseilles, &c. the merchandize of the Levant, as well in their own ships as in French bottoms, without being liable to the twenty per cent on the Levant commerce, saving only in cases where the French themselves were liable to pay it. The Dutch also to England about the middle of November, and was received in London amidst the general acclamations of the people, who now again beheld him as their deliverer from a war, by the continuance of which they must have been infallibly beggared. Just before his majesty's return home, the lords justices had issued a proclamation for apprehending such of his majesty's British subjects as should return from France without leave; as also another proclamation for apprehending the duke of Berwick, sir George Barclay, and others attainted of high-treason, and supposed to be then lurking in England; for it was expected that king James's friends would have taken some desperate resolution on the conclusion of the peace; but nothing of this nature appeared.

The parliament meeting on the third of December, was opened with a speech from the throne, wherein his majesty observed, "That the war he had entered into by the advice of his people, was by their assistance brought to the end which he had ever proposed, a safe and honourable peace: that he was sorry however to acquaint them, that his subjects could not at first find that relief by the peace they might expect, the funds having fallen short, and there remaining so great a debt to the navy and army, besides what was wanting to support the civil list. He said, he made not the least doubt that his parliament would make such a provision for him during his life, as might be for his honour and that of his government. He observed, that our naval force was increased almost double since his accession, and could not be supported without a proportionable increase of money; and he believed they would agree with him in allowing that the chief strength of England must ever consist in a powerful navy. He gave it as his opinion, that considering the state of affairs on the continent, the kingdom could not be safe without a land-force. He promised to rectify such abuses as had crept into any part of the administration during the war, and effectually to discourage prophaneness and immorality. He expressed himself delighted with the proofs his subjects had given him of their loyalty and attachment to his person; and concluded, that as he had at the hazard of his life rescued the religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremest danger, so he should place the chief glory of his reign in preserving and leaving them entire to posterity."

To this speech the two houses returned an address by a compliment of congratulation upon the peace, and an assurance "that they would be ever ready to assist and support his majesty, who had confirmed them in the quiet possession of their rights and liberties; and by putting an end to the war, fully compleated the work of their deliverance *." Notwithstanding these appearances of good humour, the majority of the parliament, and indeed the whole nation, were equally alarmed at that part of the king's speech which discovered a project for maintaining a standing army: but before I go upon the proceedings of the parliament, which sat the longest, and was the most busy of any that had assembled for some years, and that I may not break in upon its transactions, I shall here give a brief account of our naval affairs during this year, 1697.

And first, I am to take notice of the expedition of vice-admiral Neville to the West Indies, who was sent thither on the first intelligence of Mr. Pointis' being sailed for that part of the world with a strong squadron. It was supposed that the true design of this armament, which was kept a profound secret by the French court, was against Jamaica, which alarmed us the more, because, considering the small force we had in that quarter, if the French had really attempted this island, there was but too great a probability of their succeeding. Their intent however appeared afterwards to have been against the Spanish settlements in that part of the globe. To parry this blow wherever it was intended, orders were given to assemble a squadron at Portsmouth, under the command of rear-admiral Meeze; and other orders were at the same time dispatched to Mr. Neville, who commanded our fleet in the Mediterranean; which orders he was directed to open in a certain latitude, by which he was instructed to join admiral Meeze at the island of Madeira, which he accordingly did on the seventeenth of April, and they bore away together for Antigua, where they arrived the third of May. Here they received advice that M. de Pointis was sailed from Hispaniola on the twenty-first of March, N. S. with twenty-six ships small and great. It was then resolved in a council of war to proceed forthwith to Jamaica. Before they reached their destined port, they met with a sloop, the master whereof informed them there was a report of the French squadron's being before Carthagen. Whereupon it was resolved to steer for that place, in hopes of finding the French either embarrassed in the siege, or in embarking the plunder. Had this resolve been put in execution immediately, we must have surprized monsieur Pointis, and destroyed his whole force; but it appears from admiral Neville's Journal, that he was under an absolute necessity of putting into Jamaica for a fresh supply of provisions and water, where he was detained so long by the winds and other cross accidents, that Pointis had time to do his business at Carthagen, and sail away. But though our fleet missed him there, yet on the twenty-seventh of May, being half seas over from Jamaica, the admiral saw the fleur de Pointis' squadron at no great distance; upon which he endeavoured all he could to engage, but could not come near enough. Five days the vice-admiral continued the pursuit, in which five ships (among which his own and rear-admiral Meeze's were included) sprung their masts; and their sails were so torn, that it was found impossible to continue the chase with any hopes of success †.

Hereupon the vice-admiral thought it expedient to proceed to Carthagen, in order to see if the galleons were safe, and how far he could be useful to the Spaniards. Here he had advice that the galleons were at the Havannah: he therefore proceeded for Jamaica, after having destroyed several sail of the Buccaneers*, who had assisted the French in their depredations upon the Spaniards. While the admiral lay at Jamaica, the governor, who at that time was sir William Beeston, proposed to him the destruction of that nest of pirates at Petit-Guavas†; with which Mr. Neville instantly complied, and detached rear-admiral Meeze with nine ships from the fleet on the twenty-second of June for this purpose; who on the twenty-ninth surprised Petit-Guavas before it was light, and immediately gave orders for burning it, which was done with so much precipitation, that notwithstanding there was abundance of gold and silver in the place, yet very little was saved or brought away. However, the burning the town, and carrying off prisoners a good number of negroes to Jamaica, was a great and seasonable service to the English colonies.

Vice-admiral Neville then proceeded to the Havannah, in order to take the galleons under his escort, which was the principal part of his instructions: but the general of the galleons excused putting his ships under our protection, pretending his orders would not warrant it; but, in reality, being fearful of trusting so rich a fleet, worth above fifty millions, in the vice-admiral's power: the same motive induced the governor of the Havannah to refuse admitting the admiral to enter the harbour with his squadron. This kind of treatment, from those whom he had come principally to serve, broke the vice-admiral's spirits very much: and this, added to the consciousness of the little service he had been able to do his country with so strong a squadron, threw him into a fit of sickness, which carried him off at Virginia, where he arrived on the seventh of August. Rear-admiral Meeze being also dead before our fleet reached the Havannah, the chief command devolved upon captain Robert Dilkes as senior captain, who brought the fleet home to England about the latter end of October this year, but in a very bad condition.

The English were highly enraged at being disappointed in the great hopes that had been entertained of this expedition; and their anger was farther raised by other cross accidents which happened about the same time in the same quarter of the world. It seems that Pointis, after escaping vice-admiral Neville, fell in on the coast of Newfoundland with another English squadron, commanded by commodore (afterwards sir John and admiral) Norris: but this officer, who proposed to attack him, was prevented from executing his resolution by the decision of a council of war. In his return Pointis was encountered by six English ships commanded by captain Harlow; but after maintaining a running fight during a whole day, he at length secured himself in the harbour of Brest, with the treasure he had taken at Carthage, amounting, by the best accounts, to upwards of twenty millions of livres, or near one million two hundred thousand pounds sterling. The blame of these miscarriages was laid upon the conduct of the admirals, and the orders of the admiralty: these were chiefly directed by admiral Russel (lately made earl of Orford) who presided at that board, and who, though neither deficient in courage nor integrity, was supposed to have been betrayed by those in whom he too much confided. Thus much is certain, that all our naval historians agree in asserting, that the officers of the fleet were divided by the most violent factions and animosities, which had as fatal an effect, with regard to the interests of the nation, as the blackest treachery and corruption.

This is the sum of what passed in the West Indies this year. I now come to the naval transactions in Europe, where we shall not find many extraordinary actions to detain us.

His majesty having before his going to Holland in the spring of this year, declared Edward Russel esq. admiral of the fleet, one of the lords justices in his absence, and soon after created him earl of Orford; he thereupon quitted his command of the fleet to take his seat at the head of the admiralty board, when the command in chief devolved on sir George Rooke, who in the beginning of June went down to Portsmouth to take upon him that office; and soon after being joined by vice-admiral Mitchel and rear-admiral Bembow, he put to sea with forty-four sail of the line, and continued cruising for a few weeks, when he was obliged to put into port again for provisions.

Previous to this, however, rear-admiral Benbow had been sent out with a separate squadron, consisting of seven third-rates, and two fire-ships, with strict instructions to use all his endeavours to protect our trade, and annoy the enemy; but he was able to perform nothing remarkable, and was therefore recalled, and ordered to join sir George Rooke as above. After the grand fleet had put in to revictual, admiral Benbow was sent to reinforce, and take command of a squadron which had for some time been cruising off Dunkirk, under the command of commodore Beaumont, to intercept M. du Bart, the French admiral, who was expected to sail from thence with a fleet that was to carry over the prince of Conti, whom the French attempted to make king of Poland. The French ships at Dunkirk were in all about eleven, from fifty to twenty-six guns. About the latter end of July Mr. Benbow was joined by rear-admiral Vandergoes with 11 Dutch ships; so that his fleet then consisted of about thirty sail large and small. The English admiral proposed to station one squadron to the northward of Dunkirk, and the other in or about Ostend-road, that if Du Bart attempted to pass out either at the east or north channel, they might the better discover him; but the Dutch commander representing that his ships were foul,

* As Jamaica was hitherto principally inhabited by the military men (and their offspring) who had possessed it ever since it was taken in the year 1656; those people, as generally disliking agriculture, betook themselves to cruising at sea against the Spaniards on the American seas, even after peace had been concluded between England and Spain in America; and allured by the wealth acquired thereby, they continued that illegal practice throughout all the reign of king Charles II. to this time, and got the name of the Buccaneers of Jamaica, some of whose bold exploits against the Spanish towns and

and in no condition to pursue the French fleet, should he even get sight of it, this disposition was laid aside. Du Bart having hawled his ships into the basin, where they were thoroughly cleaned, waited only for the next spring-tide to make a push out. Accordingly, on the twenty-third of August, he left Dunkirk with five sail, having the prince of Conti on board. Admiral Bembow immediately pursued him, but to no purpose, our ships as well as the Dutch being miserably foul: he therefore returned to his station, and in his way got sight of eight other ships that had sailed from the same port, which he pursued likewise, but with the same ill success; and this was the last action of the war, for on the twentieth of September following peace was concluded between England, Spain, Holland, and France*.

I shall close this account of our naval affairs with a short reflection on the consequences of this long war to the naval power and commerce of England. Mr. Burchet has clearly shewn us that the French suffered much more in their maritime power than we; and consequently, if we consider the great facility with which we were able to repair such losses as we sustained at sea, and the great difficulties the French lay under in this respect, however pompously their writers may dress up their accounts, it will be clear they were in no way able to struggle against the Dutch and us in a maritime war. King William, in his speech to both houses of parliament, of which we have just given an abstract, asserted that our naval force was near double to what it was at his accession; and upon carefully comparing the lists of the royal navy, and other authentic writers on this subject, the truth of this very clearly appears; while, on the other hand, the French never attempted to build any new ships in the room of those that were taken or destroyed during the progress of the war. The reader will find in the note an account of the loss sustained on each side, while we were disputing the empire of the sea†: from whence, and what we have remarked above, he will readily perceive that, as a maritime power, we were gainers by the war; but with respect to our trade, it is past all doubt that we suffered infinitely more than the enemy: our traffic was excessively disturbed; our merchants were many of them ruined, which occasioned an absolute distrust of and distaste against those who had the direction of naval affairs, a loud clamour against the war, and an universal desire of peace at any rate‡. Let us now proceed to a review of the parliamentary affairs of this year; and as an introduction, it may not be amiss to present the reader with a sketch of the ministry, as it stood at this juncture.

Bentinck earl of Portland had long possessed the chief place in the king's affections, but of late his interest with his royal master had been considerably weakened by the intervention of the earl of Sunderland, who had by every act of complacency and adulation insinuated himself into William's esteem. Tho' this nobleman could not but know by experience the insuperable dislike the people of

England

England entertained to a standing army; yet he no sooner found that the king was desirous of keeping up such a force, from an apprehension that a reduction of it would lessen his importance both at home and abroad, diminish the dependence upon his government, and tear from him those foreigners in whose attachments he chiefly confided: Sunderland, I say, no sooner discovered these sentiments in the king, than he laboured to encourage him with hopes of success; and as we are never upon our guard against those who flatter our passions or inclinations, king William soon made this minister his chief confident. He had also a female favourite, one Mrs. Villiers, on whom he had conferred several marks of his consideration: these two are said to have joined their interests to supplant Portland. Chance concurred with their design: the king had lately taken more than common notice of one M. Van Kepple, a gentleman of Guelderland, who had first served him as a page, and afterwards acted as a private secretary. The earl of Portland growing troublesome, from his jealousy of these competitors, the king resolved to send him into honourable exile, in quality of ambassador extraordinary to the court of France; and Trumbal, the earl's confident and friend, was dismissed from the office of secretary, which was bestowed upon Vernon, who had acted as under-secretary to the duke of Shrewsbury. This nobleman rivalled Sunderland at the council-board, and was supported by lord-chancellor Somers; Russell the new earl of Orford, first lord of the admiralty; and Charles Montagu, chancellor of the Exchequer. Somers was an upright judge, a discerning statesman, and an adroit courtier: he equalled the famous chancellor More in the sweetness and affability of his disposition; and the great Bacon in the depth of his learning. Orford was honest, but indelicate: he meant well, but his understanding was shallow; and he was by nature very headstrong and obstinate. Montagu had distinguished himself as the most able financier of his time: he was an encourager of the liberal arts, and the professed patron of projectors: as a statesman, he was bold, dogmatical, and aspiring.

The terrors of a military force had produced such a spirit of discontent in the nation, that when the commons came to consider that part of the king's speech which related to the maintenance of a standing army, several of the leading members warmly exclaimed against a practice to which the people had conceived an inveterate aversion, and the recommendation of which from the throne had not a little alarmed their fears. The spirit shewn on this occasion by the opposers of the court was such, that its friends and adherents were driven to a great dilemma. The matter was debated with much warmth, and many learned arguments were adduced on both sides in support of and against such a measure; the substance of which cannot fail to be entertaining to the curious reader.

It was alleged by those in the opposition, that a standing army being founded upon slavish principles, was by its very nature and constitution inconsistent with the spirit of a free government: that being absolutely subject to the will of a single person, whose orders it was capital to disobey; it might, if that person thought proper, be employed to the most dangerous and destructive purposes; to the subversion of that liberty which it was intended to protect; and the ruin of those by whom it was maintained: that supposing it could not carry these pernicious designs by open force, yet it would necessarily accomplish the same in the end, by over-awing elections, and prescribing to the legislature; and thus in a slow and insensible manner establish a tyranny, before the nation could be sufficiently on its guard to counteract such efforts, or secure its own safety: that allowing these inconveniencies to exist only in a chimerical apprehension; yet as the bulk of such an army is and would be generally composed of people indigent in their circumstances, and licentious in their morals, they would stop at nothing to gratify their appetites or resentments, and be ever the ready tools of a bad prince, who might think it his interest to make use of them for the oppressing or humbling his subjects. It was urged besides, that an army could at best be considered, in time of peace, but as an useless and unnecessary burden, and those who composed it as drones living on the labours of the more industrious and useful part of the nation; and this was more particularly the case in Great Britain, who, surrounded as she was by a boisterous ocean, secured by a numerous fleet, and blessed with a stout and hardy race of natives, stood not in need of the assistance or protection of hireling mercenaries to defend herself against the attempts of any enemy, foreign or domestic.

These arguments, cogent as they were, passed not unanswered: several individuals, and amongst those some who were the genuine friends of their country, espoused the opposite maxims: they said, that granting all the objections to a standing army to be founded on truth, and that it was really pregnant with all the mischiefs charged upon it; yet in the present situation of things it appeared to be a necessary evil: that would every state in Europe disband its forces on the conclusion of a peace, such a step must certainly conduce greatly to the ease and happiness of the respective subjects, and of Christendom in general: but while, on the contrary, every kingdom maintained a standing force of mercenaries, and that in particular the very nation who, by interest and inclination, were the inveterate enemies of England, kept on foot the greatest army of any state in Europe, it would be the utmost stretch of folly and madness to strip ourselves of every means of defence, and stand naked and exposed to every attempt that ambition or ill faith might think proper to make against us. In answer to the sufficiency of our numerous and formidable fleet for protecting us against all insults, it was observed, that a thousand unforeseen accidents might render this bulwark useless. The same wind, it was said, that wafted over to our shores an hostile fleet, might detain our ships in their harbours, as was actually the case when his present majesty arrived in this kingdom, when the east wind that brought over the Dutch fleet kept ours in the river till the Dutch fleet passed them; and when they got out a storm stopped and shattered them so, that without being able to come to any action, they were laid up. It is easy to infer what would have been the fatal consequences, if the king had then come to destroy our liberties, instead of rescuing them from a destroyer: and would any man, it was asked, hazard the nation upon such a contingency? especially knowing that England is an open country, full of plenty, every where able to subfist an army; our towns and cities all open; our rivers all fordable; and no paffes nor strong places to ftop an enemy, fhould they effect a defcent. In answer to the affertion that a ftanding army would be always fubject to the arbitrary will and command of the fovereign, who might at pleafure ufe it for the deftruction of his people's liberties; the late Revolution was again urged as a ftriking and memorable example againft fuch a fuppoftion. James, at the time his rival meditated a defcent on England, was at the head of an army of thirty thoufand well-difciplined troops; a force certainly fufficient to have driven out the prince of Orange, and have eftablifhed that tyranny which the reigning prince intended to erect, had they been actuated by a blind and implicit obedience to the royal will: but the event proved how differently they thought and acted; the infant that lawlefs prince attempted to employ them to fubvert the liberties and religion of their fellow-fubjects, they one and all rejected the propofal with an honeft indignation, and laid down their arms, a few catholics only excepted, repairing moft of them to the ftandard of the prince, who came to efpoufe the caufe of liberty againft the attempts of defpotifm. It was urged, moreover, that it was very improbable that the army fhould be rendered perpetual and independent while it remained on its prefent footing, being ftill fubject to the annual infpection of the parliament; and whenever that afsembly fhould fee caufe to fufpect the defigns of the prince, or the difpofitions of the military, they had it in their power to diminifh their number, or entirely difband them. In conclufion it was alleged, that nothing could be more abfurd than to expofe ourfelves to certain ruin, from a fuppoftion that what now preserves us from it, may at fome time hereafter have ill effects on our liberty: nor are thofe effects to be apprehended as confiderable, fo long as England remains true to itfelf; and whenever the nation has loft that fense of liberty by which it has been fo long preferved, it will foon make fetters for itfelf, though it fhould find none at hand ready*.

This difpute likewise gave occafion to feveral pamphlets which were published on the fubject, and in which the authors difplayed a propriety of language, a force and energy of ftile, and a ftrength of reasoning; rarely to be met with in the writings of our prefent politicians. The queftion, it muft be allowed, is of a very delicate and intricate nature: happily, however, it is now rendered in a great meafure ufelefs, by the revival of an old and excellent institution, the eftablifhment of a regular and well difciplined militia, who having acquired the dexterity of profefled foldiers, and animated by every concurring motive of intereft, fentiment, and affection, will, under the guidance of Providence, be found capable, with the concurrence of our fleet, effectually to protect this kingdom from the danger of an invafion. The oppofers of a ftanding army were at that time for forming fuch a body of native forces; but this fcheme would have defeated the purpofe of the government, which was more afraid of domeftic foes than foreign enemies, and induftrioufly avoided every plan of this nature which could contribute to render the party of the people more formidable: but though the Englifh at that time had no regular militia, they had conceived fuch an intolerable jealousy of a ftanding army, that though the miniftry ufed all their addrefs in perfuading the houfe to agree in part to the king's request, the commons paffed a vote, about a week after they met, "That all the forces raifed fince the year 1680 fhould be difbanded, and the forces be reduced to ten thoufand men†." Purfuant to this refolution, they granted a fupply for difbanding the army, and ordered the fum of two hundred and fifty thoufand pounds to be given as a gratuity to fuch officers and foldiers as were or fhould be difbanded, in the following proportions, viz. to every foot-foldier and non-commissioned officer, fourteen days fubfiftence, and fix days full pay to each private trooper and non-commissioned officer: provision was alfo made for half pay to commiffion-officers, being Englifhmen; and a bill was ordered to be brought in, that the difbanded foldiers might exercife their refpective trades in any town or corporation in the kingdom.

During the debates about a ftanding army in parliament, the earl of Sunderland had been particularly active both within and without doors, in fhewing the neceffity of keeping up a constant military force, by which he had drawn upon himfelf a great load of odium; and the Tories, who had now got the popular fide of the queftion, refolved to make a handle of this conduct to remove him from about court. They began by openly representing him as a perfon to whom they afcribed moft of the arbitrary meafures taken in the late reign, and fufpected of having counfelled the like in this, and particularly the keeping up a ftanding army. The earl, apprehenfive of a further attack from this party, and fearing he fhould be weakly fupported by the Whigs, who were moft of them jealous of his growing in favour with the king, refolved to avoid the danger with which he thought himfelf threatened, by a timely retreat: accordingly, on the twenty-fixth of December he refigned the office of lord-chamberlain, not only againft the intreaties of his friends, but even the king's earneft defire that he would continue about him.

To raife the fums for difbanding the army, paying their arrears, and making good all deficiencies, amongft other aids, a tax of three fhillings in the pound was laid upon land, which was to be affeffed in every county, in proportion to the rates it was affeffed at in the year 1692, when it brought in the moft, there having been fuch commiffioners appointed that year as the crown was pleafed to pitch upon, who, in the counties in the neighbourhood of London, taxed the people to the rack-rent, while the northern and western counties were fcarce rated half the value of their eftates; and thus it has been ever fince, and is likely to continue while the remote boroughs are too numerous for the reft of the kingdom. An additional duty was laid upon coal, culm, and falt; a duty was impofed upon all coals imported from Scotland, or from any part beyond sea. The toll-tax was continued for one year longer; and the duties upon coffee, tea, chocolate, spices, pedlars and hawkers, for three years; the duties upon stamped paper, parchment, vellum, and those upon imported alammodes and lustrings, were doubled; the time was enlarged for purchasing and granting annuities; and a bill passed for raising a sum not exceeding two millions, upon a fund for payment of annuities, at the rate of eight per cent. redeemable by parliament.

His majesty having expressed himself extremely displeased at the proceedings of the commons for disbanding the army, they, in order to sweeten the unpalatable cup, voted the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds per annum for the support of the civil list, distinct from all other services, to be paid his majesty for life, which was to be raised out of the duties arising from tonnage and poundage, or on merchandize imported and exported, former parliaments having granted it him from time to time only for a short term of years.

The king coming to the house on the fourteenth of January, 1698, gave the royal assent to an act for calling in the hammered silver money to be re-coined; to an act to prevent corresponding with king James and his adherents; and to an act for continuing the imprisonment of one Counter and others, then confined in Newgate, on suspicion of being accomplices in the Assassination Plot. The same day the commons voted three hundred and fifty thousand pounds for maintaining guards and garrisons for the year 1698, and a supply of two millions seven hundred thousand pounds for paying off and cancelling the exchequer-bills that had been issued. Then they took into consideration the subsidies due to foreign powers in the English pay, and other sums due to the contractors for bread and forage. Examining further the debts of the nation, they found the general debt of the navy amounted to one million three hundred ninety-two thousand seven hundred and forty-two thousand pounds; that of the ordnance to two hundred four thousand one hundred and fifty-seven thousand pounds. The transport debt contracted for the reduction of Ireland, did not fall short of four hundred sixty thousand four hundred and ninety-three pounds; and they owed forty-nine thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine pounds for quartering and cloathing the army which had been raised by an act of parliament in the year 1677, and disbanded by another in the year 1679. In order to lighten this great burden, provision was made for granting the proprietors an interest for their money till their debts should be paid.

But notwithstanding this vast load of debts, it was found that the officers concerned in the revenue had increased them, by robbing the public various ways, particularly by false indorsements on Exchequer notes, whereby they gained seven pounds twelve shillings per cent. which was allowed indeed upon the second issuing of Exchequer-bills, but not upon the first, till these honest gentlemen found means clandestinely to procure such indorsements to defraud the people. Among those plunderers of the nation were Mr. Charles Duncombe, receiver-general of the excise; Mr. John

Knight, treasurer of the customs; Bartholomew Burton, of the Excise-office; and Reginald Marriot, one of the deputy-tellers of the Exchequer; which last, to get his pardon, compounded to accuse the rest: whereupon Duncombe and Knight, who were members of the commons, were expelled the house, and committed to the Tower: Burton was sent to Newgate. A bill was brought into the house of commons for fining Duncombe about half his estate, valued at four hundred thousand pounds, and passed that house; but being sent up to the lords, the votes happening to be equal, the duke of Leeds gave his casting vote against the bill, which was accordingly laid aside: the lords also set Duncombe at liberty; but the commons resenting this, remanded him, and he remained in the Tower till the end of the session. The bill against Knight and Burton had the same fate; whereupon the prosecution was dropped, and they all escaped with their ill-gotten wealth, it being generally supposed they made their peace with part of the spoils they had gained from the nation. There were many in the commons at this time who had conceived a dislike against Mr. Charles Montagu, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on account of the affair of the re-coinage, and his having been a strenuous advocate for a standing army; and his majesty having made him a grant in the name of one Railton, this was brought upon the carpet, and it was moved in the house that he should withdraw; but that passing in the negative, it was resolved by a great majority, "That it was the opinion of the house that the honourable Charles Montagu, chancellor of the Exchequer, doth deserve his majesty's favour *;" a vote that must render his name famous to all posterity.

The commons now observing that the enemies of Christianity were never more audacious than at this time, in ridiculing the mysteries of the christian religion, both in their conversation and the blasphemous pamphlets they published; and, in a word, that prophaneness and immorality daily gained ground amongst us, presented an address to his majesty, beseeching him to give strict orders to all his judges, justices, and magistrates, to put the laws in execution against blasphemy, atheism, and other acts of immorality, and to discourage them in his officers and courtiers †. The king, who in his own conduct was particularly strict and regular, was pleased with this address, and readily promised to comply with their request. Accordingly, he issued a proclamation "for preventing and punishing immorality and prophaneness, and for suppressing certain impious books."

In the midst of the deluge of immorality which overspread the nation at this time, Dr. Thomas Bray, an active divine, formed a plan "for propagating the gospel in foreign parts." Missionaries, catechisms, liturgies, and other books for the instruction of ignorant people, were sent to the English colonies in America. This laudable design was supported by voluntary contribution; and a bill having been brought into the house of commons for the better discovery of estates given to superstitious uses, Dr. Bray presented a petition, praying that some part of these estates might be set apart for the propagation of the reformed religion in Maryland, Virginia, and the Leeward Islands.

At the same time king William encouraged the Society for the Reformation of Manners. Considerable collections were made for maintaining clergymen to read prayers in certain places of public worship, and administer the sacrament every Sunday. The members of this society engaged to inform the magistrates of all the vice and immorality that should fall under their cognizance; and with that part of the fines allowed by law to the informer, to constitute a fund of charity. This institution had been first set on foot by Dr. Beveridge and Dr. Horneck, in the reign of James II. who fearing it might tend to prevent the growth of that religion which he unhappily professed, industriously checked and discouraged it; so that it remained for a long time in a very weak and declining state: but being now honoured and protected by the sovereign, it soon acquired a more solid establishment, and for some time exercised its influence with a very considerable effect.

The king coming to the house the seventh of March, gave the royal assent to several acts relating to the civil polity, when the commons addressed his majesty, that he would be pleased to cause a list to be printed of the persons names to whom licence had been granted, pursuant to the late act, against corresponding with king James or his adherents: to which his majesty returned a gracious answer; and on the second of April came again to the house, when, besides private acts, he gave the royal assent to the two following public ones; 1. An act for granting his majesty the sum of one million four hundred eighty-four thousand fifteen hundred pounds, for disbanding the land forces, and paying off the seamen. 2. An act for supplying some defects in the laws made for the relief of the poor.

On the twenty-first of May a complaint was made to the commons of a printed book, entitled, The Case of Ireland being bound by Acts of Parliament in England stated; written by one Mr. Molyneux of Dublin, a gentleman of great parts and learning. In this book the author had endeavoured to prove that Ireland was independent of England, or the authority of its parliament. Such tenets as these were too dangerous to be passed over unnoticed: accordingly, a committee was appointed to enquire into the nature and tendency of this performance. Upon the report of the committee, it was unanimously resolved, "That the book entitled, &c. was of dangerous consequence, as tending to lessen the dependence that Ireland has and ought to have upon England, as being united and annexed to the imperial crown of this realm; and that an act "for the better securing of his majesty's person and government," transmitted under the great seal of Ireland, by which an English act of parliament was pretended to be re-enacted, and alterations made therein obligatory on the courts of justice and great-seal of England, had given occasion to the writing and publishing the dangerous assertions contained in the said book." After which the commons in a body addressed the king, beseeching him "to give effectual orders for preventing any such encroachment for the future, as well as the pernicious consequences of what was past, by punishing and discountenancing those who had been guilty of such pernicious attempts." This address his majesty received very graciously, and was pleased to assure the commons that he would comply with their request. About the same time also the commons addressed the king on the subject of some complaints that had been made to the house, that the woollen manufacture was carried on in Ireland, to the great prejudice of that staple commodity in England. To which address his majesty returned for answer, "That he should do all that in him lay to promote the trade of England, and to discourage the woollen, and encourage the linen, manufacture in Ireland." Orders were accordingly transmitted to the lords justices, who recommended the matter to the Irish parliament; and the members promised to use their utmost endeavours to effect a reformation in this article; and from hence may be dated the great increase and improvement of the Irish linen manufacture, which has turned out so advantageous to that country.

In this session the lustring company obtained an act of parliament, wherein the preamble sets forth, "That the said company have, with great labour and charge, brought that manufacture to perfection; but that by the fraudulent importation of foreign alamodes and lustrings, the company have not enjoyed the benefit intended them by the royal charter, but have wasted their time and stock in contending with many difficulties and obstructions which they had met with: and it now appearing that the said manufacture cannot be so well conducted and secured to England by any other means than by the establishing of an exclusive company for the same; it was therefore now enacted, first, That the said company be a perpetual corporation, with the usual powers, &c. of a body-politic, as in their charter. Secondly, That they shall enjoy the sole use, exercise, and benefit of making, dressing, and lustrating of plain black alamodes, renforcez, and lustrings, in England and Wales, for fourteen years to come *." All which however could not support this monopoly when the fashion changed, new fabrications driving out the former general wear of those silks, so that the company had run out their stock, and was quite broke up, even before the expiration of their said exclusive term, which therefore was not renewed.

We cannot pass over two good statutes for the benefit of inland commerce made in this same session: the one is "for determining differences by arbitration, whereby merchants, traders, and others desiring to end any controversy (for which there is no other remedy but by personal action or suit in equity) by arbitration, may agree their submission of their suit to the award of any person or persons, which should be made a rule of any court of record: by which agreement, so made and inserted in their submission, the parties shall be finally concluded by such arbitration." The other is "for the better payment of bills of exchange;" by which it is enacted, "That all bills of exchange drawn in England for five pounds or upwards to any other place in England, and payable at a certain number of days, weeks, or months after date, shall from and after presentation and acceptance

(which acceptance shall be by the under-writing the same under the party's hand so accepting) and after the expiration of three days after the said bill shall become due, the party to whom the said bill is made payable, his servant, agent, or assigns, may and shall cause the said bill to be protested by a notary public, or any other substantial person of the city, town, or place, in the presence of two or more creditable witnesses (refusal or neglect being first made of the payment) which protest shall be made and written under a fair written copy of the said bill, signifying, "That I A. B. on the — day of — at the usual place of abode of the said C. D. have demanded payment of the bill, of which this is a copy, which the said C. D. did not pay: wherefore I the said A. B. do hereby protest the said bill, dated at — this day of —:" which protest shall, within fourteen days after, be sent, or otherwise due notice shall be given thereof to the party from whom the bill was received; and who, upon producing such protest, shall repay the said bill, together with interest and charges: and on default of such protest (for which only C. D. shall be paid) on due notice, the person so failing shall be liable to all costs, damages, and interest accruing thereby, provided that if any such bill be lost or miscarried within the time limited for payment, the drawer shall be obliged to give another bill, the person to whom it is sent giving security (if demanded) to the drawer, to indemnify him in case the lost bill shall be found again."

Private and fallacious lotteries were at this time become so general, not only in London, but in most other great cities and towns in England, whereby the lower people, and the servants and children of good families were defrauded, that an act was passed for suppressing them; and a penalty of 500 l. was laid on the proprietors of such lotteries, and of twenty pounds on every adventurer in them: notwithstanding which, the like disposition of fraud on the one part, and of gaming on the other, continued still greatly to prevail.

The parliament likewise this session applied themselves with great diligence to discover and punish a set of offenders, who carried on a fraudulent and secret commerce with France, by which they had for divers years past surreptitiously brought in great quantities of French silks. The first occasion of this discovery was a pass from the admiral of France for an English ship, that served at once for the owling and smuggling trades; which pass, at the breaking out of the late conspiracy, was intercepted at the Post-office, since which time it had lain unnoticed in the hands of the secretary of state: but this paper coming by some accident to the sight of Mr. Hilary Reneu, an eminent French protestant merchant, who was the chief manager and promoter of the lustring company, he reported the matter to the house of commons, who having caused the persons and books of these smugglers to be seized, a full discovery was made of their pernicious trade; upon which eight of them were very severely fined, and ordered to be imprisoned in Newgate till such time as they should pay the money; and Mr. Reneu, as a reward for his part in the discovery, was gratified with a bill, which passed the two houses and received the royal assent, for naturalizing him and his family without paying any charges for the same.

But the affair of the greatest consequence in the commercial way which came under the cognizance of the commons this session, and with which we shall close our account of parliamentary affairs, was the election of a new East India company.

The many complaints which had been made against the English East India company's proceedings, together with the great losses of ships and cargoes during the war with France, which had prevented its making any dividends for sundry preceding years, had by this time occasioned a general dislike in the people against that company. This broke out more plainly during this session, when the house of commons again took the state of the company's trade into their serious consideration, although it had three years before appeared to be so delicate an affair, that it had been by the parliament referred to the king and council, and by the latter sent back to parliament again, who after all did nothing material in the main complaints relating to it. The company therefore now thought it prudent to make some proposals that might engage the government in their interest: accordingly they offered to advance seven hundred thousand pounds for the public service at four per cent. interest, provided the exclusive trade to India might be legally settled on them.

The ministry seemed inclined to accept this offer, when a certain number of merchants, headed by sir John Ward, sir Francis Eyles, sir Gilbert Heathcote, and Mr. Samuel Shephard, and countenanced by Mr. Montagu, chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed to the house of commons to advance two millions at eight per cent. interest, provided they might have the said sole exclusive trade to India settled on them. They likewise proposed that these subscribers should not be obliged to trade in a joint stock, but that if any number of members desired to be incorporated, a charter should be granted them for that purpose. This last named proposal was deemed the most eligible; and accordingly a bill was brought into parliament in favour of the new adventurers, which quickly passed the commons; but when it was sent up to the lords, the old company (for such we must now begin to call them) followed it thither, where they were heard by their counsel, sir Thomas Powis and sir Bartholomew Shower, who pleaded their exclusive charters, which, amongst other great privileges, stiled them lords proprietors of Bombay and St. Helena. They alleged, "That the company had actually acquired, at their own sole expence, revenues at Fort St. George, Fort St. David, and Bombay, as well as in Persia and elsewhere, to the amount of about forty-four thousand pounds per annum, arising from customs and licences for a number of different matters set forth in the pleadings*: that they had also erected forts and settlements, and had procured territories in the island of Sumatra, and on the coast of Malabar, without which the pepper-trade must have been actually lost to England: that they had also a strong fort in the kingdom of Bengal, and also many factories, buildings, and settlements in divers other parts, having moreover purchased of the Indian princes, at high rates, many privileges and immunities; all which they were encouraged to do, out of a firm belief that their said right and inheritance would on all occasions be objects of the nation's care: that since this bill was brought in, the company agreed to submit their present stock to a valuation of fifty per cent. viz. twenty per cent. for their dead stock (that is, their forts, factories, and lands) and thirty per cent. for their quick stock, which they were content even to warrant at that rate; and upon these terms the company likewise offered to raise subscriptions for two millions."

To all this the counsel for the new subscribers replied, "That the old company in reciting their charters had forgot to mention the provisos therein, That the respective kings of England who granted them, reserved a discretionary power to make them void on three years warning: that the king could not grant the trade, exclusive of all others, solely by his charter, as being directly contrary to positive laws; neither had his present majesty in fact granted any such exclusive right: that several recoveries had been made at law against the company for prosecuting such pretended right: that his majesty's message to the commons in 1692 plainly signified that the concurrence of parliament was requisite for making a complete and useful settlement of this trade [Here they expatiated on the indirect methods of bribery, &c. carried on by the company's managers to obtain their last new charter and regulations, as we have before related.] that it never was esteemed a breach of public faith, nor a derogation from the great seal, or from the honour of our kings, to have their patents annulled by parliament, when it appeared that such grants were either unprofitable, or contrary to the common rights of the subject; neither did any kings think themselves bound in honour or conscience to refuse passing an act of parliament for the annulling of such grants: that moreover kings having been often deceived in such grants, they have even been frequently annulled by the ordinary course of law."

It was on the other hand again farther replied and urged, in behalf of the old company, "That the properties of many families, widows, and orphans, were greatly affected by the bill now depending, which they said made no provision for a determined stock; insomuch that it may hereafter happen that the trade may be lost to the nation for want of a sufficient capital to carry it on; it appearing by thirty years experience, that it requires at least six hundred thousand pounds per annum to carry on this trade in its full extent: that by this bill the new subscribers are permitted to trade during the three years to Michaelmas 1701, as well as the company, which is directly contrary to the charter, and will create great confusion, and render the said three years allowed the old company of no benefit, because they are still bound to export to the value of one hundred thousand pounds annually in our own manufactures, although the new subscribers are under no such obligation. The old company are likewise obliged to pay taxes to keep up forts, factories, &c. while the new subscribers are to have an equal benefit of the trade, without either: that since the last subscription in the year 1693, the company have lost either by accidents, or by the calamities of war, twelve great ships, which with their cargoes would have sold for near a million and an half sterling; and yet, notwithstanding such losses, they have paid in customs since that period two hundred and ninety-five thousand pounds, besides eighty-five thousand in taxes: that moreover they had supplied his majesty in Holland, on a pressing occasion, with six thousand barrels of gun-powder; and had likewise, at a time of great extremity, subscribed eighty thousand pounds for circulating Exchequer-bills, at the instance of the treasury; and that, in fine, many hundred families have their whole fortunes depending in the stock of the present company, who must be utterly ruined if this bill take effect."

The foregoing pleadings contain so many articles relating to the history and conduct of the old East India company, and to the nature and legality of exclusive charters not supported by parliamentary authority, that I could not pass them over unnoticed. I shall now only subjoin what was on this occasion farther alleged against the old company, viz. "That the new subscribers to that company's stock in 1693 were deluded into it by a charter then obtained by indirect means, as by the hopes of an act of parliament to confirm it, by the old proprietors having valued their stock at seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds, whereby they shared three hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds of the new subscribers money amongst themselves; and as they had warning sufficient, by the transactions before the king and council, nobody was answerable for their loss but themselves."

These and such like reasons weighing with the lords, and some of the leaders of the old company being suspected of disaffection to the state, or perhaps principally because the new subscribers were the favourites of the ministry, the lords concurred with the commons in passing the bill, which afterwards received the royal assent; the substance whereof, as far as relates to this subject, is as follows:

"That every subscriber should have liberty to trade annually, to the amount of his respective subscription, or might transfer such liberty to any other person: that his majesty should be empowered to incorporate such of the subscribers as were desirous of trading in a body: that the powers and privileges of the East India company should be settled by parliament: that the subscribers should enjoy the eight pounds per cent. and the exclusive right of trading to the East Indies for the term of ten years, or till such time as it should be redeemed by parliament: that every person subscribing to the amount of five hundred pounds should have a vote; and that no person, let his subscription be ever so large, should have more than one: that all ships laden in the East Indies should be obliged to unload in England: that no person who should be a member of any corporation trading to the East Indies should engage in any other trade that

B. on the — day of — at the usual place of abode of the said C. D. have demanded payment of the bill, of which this is a copy, which the said C. D. did not pay: wherefore I the said A. B. do hereby protest the said bill, dated at — this day of —:" which protest shall, within fourteen days after, be sent, or otherwise due notice shall be given thereof to the party from whom the bill was received; and who, upon producing such protest, shall repay the said bill, together with interest and charges: and on default of such protest (for which only C. D. shall be paid) on due notice, the person so failing shall be liable to all costs, damages, and interest accruing thereby, provided that if any such bill be lost or miscarried within the time limited for payment, the drawer shall be obliged to give another bill, the person to whom it is sent giving security (if demanded) to the drawer, to indemnify him in case the lost bill shall be found again."

in all branches, sailed from Holland to Archangel in Russia, and thence were distributed into all the different places where their services were necessary. We must not forget that he found in England some mathematicians, which he in vain sought for amongst the Dutch. Fergufon, a Scotchman, an excellent geometrician, entered into his service, and was the first person who brought arithmetic into use in the public offices in Russia, where before that time they made use only of the Tartarian method of reckoning with balls strung upon a wire. Captain Perry, an expert engineer, was likewise retained by him; and although that gentleman was discontented at not being rewarded in a manner he thought due to his services, yet he acknowledges that Peter had an amazing genius, and was indefatigable in his application: he tells us that he soon made himself a proficient in astronomy; and as to the practical part of ship-building, he says, that from the casting of cannon to the spinning of ropes, there was not any one branch of trade belonging to the construction or fitting out of a ship that he did not minutely observe, and even put his hand to, whenever he came into the places where these trades were carried on*.

In fine, though that prince is esteemed by some a savage tyrant, yet if all allowances are made for his education, and the arbitrary construction of his government, he will be looked upon with veneration by posterity, having in a manner dispelled the darkness that covered that vast tract of land under his dominion, and given his subjects a taste at least of the improvements that had been made by the rest of mankind. - Not content with encouraging the mechanic arts only, he promoted the increase of other knowledge amongst his people, by laying the foundations of schools, colleges, and academies, and by building and furnishing of public libraries: in short, in the compass of a few years he brought the rude and uncivilized Russians to make a total alteration in their very habits and way of life; and, perhaps, without the arbitrary dominion he exercised, and the rough measures he took to bind and force a people who had the greatest aversion to every thing that was polite, he could never have effected that mighty change in the short time of his own single life; and if he had not, they would have returned to their original barbarism: but we see them, on the contrary, improving every day. Peter, after leaving England, proposed to make the tour of the other polite courts of Europe; but receiving advice from his dominions that his sister was stirring up intrigues against his government, he returned suddenly to Moscow (the then capital of his empire) and with great severity, though (we repeat it) perhaps not greater than the nature of his government made necessary, put a considerable number of the conspirators to the most cruel deaths. But to return from this digression, which I thought owing to the memory of so extraordinary a man as czar Peter.

On the third of February died Ernest-Augustus, duke elector of Hanover, and bishop of Osnabrug, at Herenhausen. He was born November 10, 1629, being the third son of George duke of Luxemburg and Anne-Leonora, daughter of the land-grave Lewis of Hesse d'Armstadt. He was married in 1659 to the princess palatine Sophia, daughter to James I. of England, by whom he had several children. He was succeeded by his son George-Lewis, afterwards king of Great Britain. The house of Hanover began now to be held in much consideration, as it appeared to be next in succession to the English throne after the present royal family, according to the act passed in the beginning of this reign, whereby no Roman catholic could inherit the crown of England.

In the beginning of this year the earl of Portland set out on his embassy to France, and made his public entry on the twenty-seventh of February with such extraordinary splendor as had never been seen in that court since the duke of Buckingham's embassy, when he came to demand the princess Henrietta of France for Charles I. It is agreed on all hands that few ambassadors ever behaved with greater prudence, honour, and magnificence, than lord Portland, or was ever so much caressed and respected, not only by the king, but all the princes of France. Some time after his public audience he went to Versailles, where he was lodged in the hotel de Bouillon. Here he had a long conversation with Lewis XIV. in which it has been thought that the project for a partition of the Spanish monarchy was opened by the French king.

After the conclusion of the late treaty of peace, wherein his concerns were wholly overlooked, king James seemed to be absolutely abandoned, and passed his time very indifferently at St. Germain. We are told that the earl of Portland being at a review of the household troops in the Plain of Arches, where the king and the princes of the blood were present, king James also came thither, and with him his son the titular prince of Wales. This last, by his father's direction, endeavoured to join conversation with lord Woodstock, Portland's son, who was ordered by his father to avoid him, as the earl himself did all those belonging to the court of St. Germain. At the same review James himself did all he could to engage the lord Cavendish, and the other English noblemen there present, to take notice of him, but in vain. This apparent slight could not but be a sensible mortification to James, who felt it still farther increased, by hearing that lord Portland insisted upon his being removed from the French king's presence, which however Lewis would by no means consent to, nor to grant any indulgence to the French protestants, now under a fresh persecution; and in whose behalf the English ambassador, at the express order of his court, warmly interceded: in short, it was observed that no ambassador was ever more honoured or less successful than the earl of Portland, who after a stay of four months returned home, without having effected one single point of his embassy, which cost the king near an hundred thousand pounds. Lord Portland had the additional mortification to find, that during his absence Mr. Keppel, now created earl of Albemarle, had entirely supplanted him in the king's favour, whereupon he resigned his employment in disgust; nor could the king ever after prevail on him to resume any office in the household. His majesty however still retained a great esteem for lord Portland, and employed him in the management of most foreign affairs, for which he was very capable. On the other hand, it is acknowledged that nobleman carried it so well towards the English, that many of the principal nobility held him in great esteem, even after king William's death.

This winter proved fatal to that ancient and commodious palace of Whitehall, which was burnt down by accident on the fourth of January in the evening, nothing of it remaining next morning but the Banqueting-house.

The lord viscount Villiers, lately made earl of Jersey, being appointed ambassador to the court of France, in the room of the earl of Portland, on the fourteenth of April, marshal Tallard, the French ambassador, soon after arrived here, and made his public entry into London on the sixteenth of May. On the eighteenth of June the earl of Marlborough was declared governor to the duke of Gloucester, and Dr. Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, preceptor to his highness, who was then entering into the tenth year of his age.

By this time a ferment had been raised in Scotland, by the opposition and discouragements their new East India company had sustained. In pursuance of the act of their own parliament for the setting up this company, they had begun to take in subscriptions; but as it was not easy to find money enough in Scotland for the carrying on so expensive a design, the company's agents endeavoured to procure subscriptions abroad, particularly at London, Amsterdam, and Hamburg, in which they certainly acted under the sanction both of the royal and legislative authority: but as the carrying this scheme into execution gave great umbrage both to the Dutch and English East India companies, they took, as was very natural for them to do, the best measures they could to hinder the success of such applications. This however had some untoward consequences, since these companies could effect nothing but by the interposition of their respective governments; and by this means king William's name, as king of England and stadtholder of Holland, was made use of to thwart those designs, which actually had his sanction as king of Scotland; and in the summer of the preceding year, while his majesty was in Holland, a sharp memorial, subscribed by Mr. Cresset the English envoy, and sir Paul Rycart, our resident in the city of Hamburg, was presented to that city against their engaging to furnish the Scots with the subscriptions they had applied for: to which the Hamburgers returned for answer, "That they thought it very strange that the king of Great Britain should offer to hinder them, who were a free people, to trade with whom they pleased; but were still more amazed that he should endeavour to prevent their joining with the Scots, who were his own subjects, and to whom he had given such large privileges by so solemn an act of parliament." This, as may easily be supposed, embarrassed king William prodigiously, and forced him to act in a manner little suitable to the dignity of his character: for the Scottish company having obtained a copy of the above memorial, presented a long address to the king upon it, who returned for answer, "That he would give orders to his envoy at the court of Lunenburgh, and his resident at Hamburg, not to make use of his majesty's name or authority for obstructing their company in the prosecution of their trade with the inhabitants of that city." This answer however served only to palliate things for that time, and instead of healing the breach, widened it.

For a parliament being assembled in Scotland the nineteenth of July this year by the earl of Marchmont, as king's commissioner, the company presented a remonstrance, containing a detail of their grievances. The parliament having taken their case into consideration, resolved to support them in their just rights, and resented the opposition made to their trade in so high a degree, as to vote, "That the honour and independency of the nation, as well as the credit and authority of parliament, was struck at through their sides." They even came to some threatening resolutions; whereupon the high commissioner adjourned them from time to time, which rendered the nation still more incensed. Nevertheless they proceeded under all these discouragements, and would have maintained it perhaps, if king William had not prohibited the island of Jamaica, and all other English settlements in America, to have any intercourse or correspondence with the Scots at Darien, or to furnish them with provisions of any kind: but I shall have occasion to treat further of this matter the following year*. We are to enter now into the consideration of an important concern, and such as has had since no small influence on the general affairs of Europe; I mean the negotiation of the first treaty of partition.

Count Tallard, afterwards famous for his defeat at Blenheim, and imprisonment in England, was the projector of this famous treaty, which laid the foundation of his future fortunes. After the peace of Ryfwick, the thoughts of Lewis XIV. were all turned upon securing the succession of the Spanish monarchy on the death of Charles II. which was daily expected; as those of king William were employed to prevent any such succession from taking place. William had no forces; but Lewis kept up the same number as in time of war, that he might seize what he claimed upon the first occasion. It was no wonder therefore that the British monarch was prevailed upon to listen to a proposal for dividing those dominions. His majesty having declared in council, on the sixteenth of July, that he intended to go over to Holland, and appointed lords justices to govern in his absence, embarked at Margate the twentieth of the same month, and arrived at the Hague two days after. Count Tallard, the French ambassador, had orders from his court to attend the king abroad, as if the French were jealous that William was about carrying on some negotiations contrary to their interest: but this, as it afterwards appeared, was only a blind; for after his majesty arrived in Holland, the earl of Portland by his orders wrote a letter to Mr. secretary Vernon, to be by him communicated to the lord Somers; wherein it was mentioned, "That count Tallard having declared to his majesty that an accommodation might be found out in relation to the Spanish succession, his majesty had thereupon founded the king of France concerning the terms on which such an agreement might be brought about, and that the conditions imparted to him were to the following effect: that the electoral prince of Bavaria should have the kingdom of Spain, the Indies, and Low Countries, and all that depended on the Spanish dominions, except Naples and Sicily, Sardinia, the province of Guipuscoa on this side the Pyrennees, Fontarabia, and St. Sebastian, Ferrol, and the places in Tuscany, of which Spain stood then possessed, in consideration of which France was absolutely to renounce the right it pretended to the succession, and Milan was to be given to the archduke Charles, second son to the emperor.

His majesty at the same time wrote a letter to lord Somers, signed with his own hand, desiring his advice with regard to the propositions touching the Spanish succession, and commanding his lordship to send over full powers under the great seal of England with blanks for the names of commissioners to be filled up occasionally, that he might immediately begin the treaty with count Tallard. At the same time his majesty was pleased to order that none but his lordship and Mr. secretary Vernon, and those to whom my lord Somers and the secretary should think proper to communicate the same, were to have any knowledge of the matter. Lord Somers immediately returned the earl of Portland's letter to Mr. Vernon, and desired him to communicate the contents of it to the earl of Oxford and Mr. Charles Montagu, two of the then lords justices, and also to such others as they and Mr. Vernon should think fit, who, in regard to the king's command to have the affair kept secret, imparted it to the duke of Shrewsbury only. Some time after Mr. Montagu and Mr. Vernon went down to Tunbridge, where lord Somers then resided for his health, to confer with his lordship concerning this important matter; and the chancellor wrote an answer to the king, as the issue of their joint deliberation: by which it appeared that his lordship was far from approving of the partition-treaty, though he was afterwards impeached in parliament for having advised it: but before this letter, which was dated the twenty-eighth of August, reached Holland, the first treaty of partition was signed by the earl of Portland and sir Joseph Williamson. By this treaty it was agreed,

I. That the peace of Ryswick should be confirmed.

II. That in consideration of the ill state of the king of Spain's health, and for preserving the public peace, in case the said prince should die without issue, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with the places then depending upon the Spanish monarchy, situated on the coast of Tuscany or the adjacent islands, comprehended under the name of Santo Stephano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Portolongo, Piombino, the marquisate of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, particularly the towns of Fontarabia and Sebastian, and especially the Port Passage; and likewise all places on the French side of the Pyrennees, or the other mountains of Navarre, Alava, or Biscay, on the other side of the province of Guipuscoa, with all the ships and galleys, and other appurtenances belonging to the galleys, should be given to the dauphin, in consideration of his right.

III. That the crown of Spain, and the other kingdoms and places both within and without Europe, should descend to the electoral prince of Bavaria, of whom his father the elector was to be a guardian and administrator till he came of age.

IV. That the duchy of Milan should be restored and allotted to the archduke Charles, the emperor's second son.

This treaty was to be communicated to the emperor and the elector of Bavaria by the king of England and the States-general; and if either should refuse to agree to this partition, his proportion should remain in sequestration till the dispute should be accommodated; and in case the electoral prince of Bavaria should die before his father, then the elector was to succeed him in those dominions, and his heirs after him; and if the archduke should reject the duchy of Milan, it should be sequestered and governed by the prince of Vaudemont, and after his death by his son prince Charles*.

The destiny of a part of Europe, and the one half of America, thus settled, Lewis promised by this treaty of partition to renounce the entire succession to the Spanish dominions: the dauphin signed the same promise. France thought to make an addition to her territories. England and Holland had in view to insure the peace of Europe, by preventing the great Spanish monarchy from devolving to the Bourbon family: but all these politics were vain. The dying king being informed in what manner his dominions had been torn in pieces during his life-time, was filled with indignation. It was generally expected that upon hearing this news he would declare either the emperor or one of his sons his successor, as a reward for the former not having intermeddled in this shameful partition, and that he would make such a will as the house of Austria should dictate to him. He did indeed make a will, but it was in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria, whom he destined sole heir to his dominions. The Spanish nation, who dreaded nothing so much as the dismembering its monarchy, applauded the disposition its king had made, which seemed calculated to secure a peace. This hope however proved as vain as the treaty of partition, the prince of Bavaria, who was but an infant, dying at Brussels in the beginning of the following year.

The partition-treaty did not so entirely ingross the attention of William as to make him unmindful of the interests of the rest of Europe; and he exerted his utmost endeavours to terminate the war of Hungary, which had raged between the emperor and other powers and the Turks for fifteen years without intermission. About the middle of August lord Paget and Mr. Colliers, ambassadors from England and Holland, arrived in the Turkish camp near Belgrade; and a congress being opened under their mediation, the peace of Carlowitz was signed, in which the Turks submitted to the laws imposed by the conquerors. The emperor had Transylvania; the Venetians had the Morea; the Muscovites, Asoph; and the Poles, Caminieck.

All Christendom was now happy and tranquil; the sound of war was no longer heard either in Asia or Africa; and the whole world was at peace during the two last years of the seventeenth century: a blessing, alas! of too short a duration; for the public calamities were soon awakened again. The peace of the North was disturbed in the year 1700 by two men, the most extraordinary the world ever produced, Peter emperor of Russia, and Charles XII. king of Sweden; and that of the South by the death of the king of Spain: but of these events in their place.

During his majesty's absence the elections for the new parliament were carried on in England with all the appearance of freedom, the ministry giving themselves very little trouble to influence the votes. Nevertheless, the returns were generally in favour of persons of Revolution-principles; but even this parliament, which the court thought they should find so much to their satisfaction, did not come entirely into their measures, as by their proceedings will appear. The parliament standing prorogued to the twenty-ninth day of November, a proclamation had been issued by the lords justices for its meeting on that day: but his majesty having been detained by contrary winds and tempestuous weather much longer than was expected, did not arrive in England till the third of December, and the parliament met on the ninth, when, going to the house, he opened the session with a speech, in which he recommended to them the keeping up such a force as might preserve that weight and influence they had at present on affairs abroad, and their making a further progress in discharging the debt the nation had contracted by the war; and concluded with recommending the three popular articles, the making provision for the poor, the advancement of trade, and the discouraging vice and prophaneness: but it is observable he made not the least mention to the two houses of the partition-treaty he had so lately concluded abroad, and which made so much noise afterwards. This was industriously concealed both from the privy-council and the parliament.

King William, in all probability, suspected the French king's sincerity in accepting so small a share of the Spanish monarchy for the dauphin, and therefore held it extremely proper to keep a body of troops in readiness, to compel the execution of the late treaty, in case of the king of Spain's death: but it seems the parliament, not being acquainted with this negotiation, did not apprehend there was any manner of reason to have so great an army on foot in time of peace: besides, the king had greatly offended them by a step he took just before his going over to Holland. He had left sealed orders with his ministry, directing that sixteen thousand men should be retained in the service, notwithstanding the vote of the commons, by which the standing army was limited to ten thousand. The new parliament was so irritated at this arbitrary act of the king's, that they resolved to thwart him in all his demands. Accordingly, without staying so much as to take his speech into consideration, they came to the following resolution: "That all the land-forces in English pay, exceeding seven thousand men (and all those consisting of his majesty's natural born subjects) be forthwith paid off and disbanded; and that all the forces in Ireland, exceeding twelve thousand men (and those his majesty's natural born subjects, to be kept and maintained in the said kingdom of Ireland) be likewise forthwith disbanded and paid off." They then ordered a bill to be brought in upon this resolution, which was eagerly pursued and carried through both houses; and by it the French protestant regiments, and even the king's favourite Dutch guards, were to be removed out of the British dominions*.

No words can paint the indignation of William at this conduct in his parliament; he was so sensibly affected with this instance of his subjects jealousy of him, that he actually formed a resolution of abandoning the government, and had even composed a speech, which he intended to have made on the occasion; he was, however, diverted from this rash scheme, and was at last persuaded, how much soever it might go against the grain, to give his assent to the bill for reducing the army: accordingly, on the first day of February, 1699, he came to the house of peers, and, instead of the before-mentioned speech, he delivered himself in the following terms: "I am come to pass the bill for disbanding the forces, as soon as I knew that it was ready for my assent. Though the reduction of the army to such an inconsiderable number may, in our present circumstances, be attended with the most fatal consequences; and though I might justly complain of the harsh treatment I have received, in being deprived of those guards who accompanied me into this kingdom, and have constantly attended me in all my fortunes; yet, as I am convinced that nothing can be more prejudicial to our common interest, than to suffer any jealousy or misunderstanding to arise between me and my people, I am firmly determined to comply with your request.

"Nevertheless, after having thus assigned my reasons for passing this bill, I must likewise, in discharge of the trust you have reposed in me, declare, that, in my opinion, the nation is left too naked and defenceless: it is your duty, therefore, to take this matter into your consideration, and immediately to provide such a strength as may be deemed necessary for the safety of the kingdom, and the preservation of that peace which we have so lately obtained."

The commons, thinking they had now sufficiently humbled the king, judged proper to give him some instance of duty and affection on their side; and on the fourth of February presented an address of thanks, testifying "how sensible they were of the difficulties and labours he had undergone and sustained, and the hazards he had run in rescuing their religion and liberties, and giving peace to Christendom: they thanked him for his good-will and affection to his people, and the undeniable

* Proceedings of the House of Commons, iii. 92. During the debates in the house of commons on this bill, lord Cutts speaking very contemptuously of the militia (which body some urged were, or at least might be made, a sufficient guard for the kingdom alone) among other things said, that he would undertake with ten thousand regular troops to drive all the militia in the kingdom before him. To which another member replied, If ten thousand regular troops would be too hard for all our militia, ten thousand would be sufficient to enslave us; and for that very reason he would give his vote but for seven thousand; in which both houses concurred. See Parliamentary Debates, vol. iii.

proof he had given of his readiness to comply with their desires in parliament; assuring him that he should never have reason to think the commons undutiful or unkind to him, but that they would always support his person and government." The lords also concurred in a like address, promising to assist and defend his majesty with their lives and fortunes against all his enemies, both at home and abroad. To both which addresses the king returned this answer: "that he took their address very kindly; that he was fully sensible of their duty and affection, and did not doubt but they would always act in the manner they had expressed on the occasion."

Hereupon his majesty gave orders for disbanding the army in England, and reducing them to seven thousand men, which were to be kept on foot under the name of guards and garrisons: however, not being able to bear with the thought of parting with his Dutch guards, who had constantly accompanied him in all his military enterprizes, he tried once more to mollify the hearts of the commons, and, on the eighteenth of March, sent the lord Ranelagh with the following message to the house, all written with his own hand:

"W. R.

"His majesty is pleased to let the house know, that the necessary preparations are made for transporting the guards who came with him into England, and that he intends to send them away immediately; unless, out of consideration to him, the house be disposed to find a way to continue them longer in his service, which his majesty would take very kindly."

The commons, however, were altogether inflexible; the king was fain to acquiesce, and the Dutch guards were transported to Holland. It must be confessed, that on this occasion the house of commons seems to have been guided by a prejudice against the person of the king and the foreigners in his service; and such an opposition in an affair of very little consequence (that of retaining the Dutch guards only I mean), favoured more of clownish obstinacy than of patriotism: the fact seems to be, that there were numbers who had been instrumental in bringing about the Revolution from the hopes of deriving great personal advantages therefrom, either by being admitted to a share in the ministry, or having their avarice gratified by lucrative posts; but finding themselves not rewarded equal to their sanguine expectations, they had commenced secret enemies to the king and his government. William easily discovered the true motives of their conduct, and took no pains to disguise his sentiments: "Had I as many places to bestow (said he one day to lord Sunderland) as there are members in the house of commons, I should not know what it was to have my will disputed."

Harmony being thus restored, at least to outward appearance, between the king and his parliament, the latter proceeded to pass many good acts; they voted fifteen thousand men, and a proportionable number of ships of war, for the security of the kingdom; and granted one million four hundred and eighty-four thousand and fifty-five pounds for the service of the year, to be raised by a tax of three shillings in the pound upon lands, personal estates, pensions and offices: and as some violent Whigs began to charge the parliament with being Jacobitically inclined, because they would not consent to the keeping up a greater standing army, the commons, to confute this calumny, addressed his majesty to issue his proclamation for removing all papists, and others who disowned his majesty's government, from the cities of London and Westminster, and to put the laws in execution against them.

A fleet was sent, the latter end of last year, under the command of vice-admiral Aylmer, into the Mediterranean, with orders to secure the galleons, in case the French should attempt to seize them, on the death of the king of Spain; but for this the admiral certainly came too late, it being the thirteenth of September before he sailed from Portsmouth; and though his conduct was liable to no imputation in this respect, yet there was great blame laid on the board of admiralty for not fitting this fleet out sooner; and this, among other things, made up part of a charge against the management of the navy, by the house of commons, in an address they presented to the king, on the twenty-seventh of March this year (1699), wherein they represented, "That it is inconsistent with the service of the navy, for the same person to be one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral, and treasurer of the navy:" at the same time pointing at Russel, earl of Orford. To which the king returned a soft answer, which yet was satisfactory enough to this charge: it ran in these words, "Gentlemen, I will consider of your address. It is my desire, that all sorts of mismanagements and irregularities should be prevented or redressed; you may be assured that I will take the best care I can in relation to the navy, the right management whereof is of great concern to the kingdom*."

The earl of Orford, who was at that time at the head of the navy, and who, as all our writers agree, governed pretty absolutely, on a supposition that bringing over to the court a body of men, who had been formerly looked upon as stubborn malecontents, would justify every measure that he should think necessary for so salutary a purpose, saw at what the commons were driving, and therefore very prudently resolved to abate the edge of their resentment, by laying down his employments, which he did accordingly: and thereupon a new commission of admiralty passed, in which the earl of Bridgewater, the lord Haversham, sir Robert Rich, sir George Rooke, and sir David Mitchel, were constituted lords commissioners.

On the fourth of May his majesty came to the house of peers, and gave the royal assent to the bill for paying the army, providing for the navy, and other occasions; as also to several other acts, the principal of which were, an act to encourage the trade to Newfoundland†: the act to prevent the exportation of wool out of the kingdoms of Ireland and England into foreign parts; and for the encouragement

* Parliamentary Debates, vol. iii. p. 102.

† Sundry regulations were made concerning the Newfoundland trade and fishery, such as, "Its being made perfectly free for all subjects alike to trade thither, and to fish on its banks. That the first ship arriving at any of the harbours or creeks of Newfoundland, shall be deemed admiral there for that season;

the second ship so arriving, shall be vice-admiral; and the third rear-admiral; which three admirals shall have power to decide controversies concerning places or stations in harbours, stages, cook-rooms, &c. there: moreover, every by-boat keeper shall carry two fresh men with him in every six, viz. one that hath made but one voyage, and one that never ment of the woollen manufactures of the kingdom of England†; an act for making Billingsgate a free market for sale of fish; an act to enable posthumous children to take estates, as if born in their fathers lifetime. His majesty then closed the session with a speech to both houses, wherein he tells them they had sat so many months, that the season of the year, as well as their own particular affairs, made it reasonable they should have a recess: he took it for granted they had finished all the bills they thought necessary, and he had given his assent to all they had presented him; if any thing else was wanting to their safety, the security of the public credit, discharge of the national debt, the advancement of trade, suppressing of vice, and employing the poor, which were all the things he proposed to them at their meeting, he did not doubt but effectual care would be taken of them next winter; and he wished no inconvenience might happen in the mean time: then the parliament was prorogued to the first of June, and afterwards by further prorogations to November following.

During this session of parliament, Henry d'Auverquerque, eldest son to Henry de Nassau d'Auverquerque, master of the horse to king William, was created earl of Grantham. On the twenty-eighth of March, 1699, Edward, earl of Warwick, was brought to his trial in Westminster-hall, before the house of peers, for the murder of Richard Coote, esq. and was found guilty of manslaughter; and on the twenty-ninth of the same month, lord Mohun was tried for the murder of the same gentleman, and acquitted. The peers seemed to be of opinion that lord Warwick was most in fault (the affair being a drunken quarrel), by finding him guilty of manslaughter; and when he claimed the privilege of his peerage (as a commoner does the benefit of his clergy) he was advised not to offend again, because he could have the privilege of peerage but once.

The duke of Shrewsbury, secretary of state, finding his health decline, resigned that post, in order to travel into Italy, and was succeeded, on the fourteenth of May, by the earl of Jersey; and on the eighteenth of the same month the king declared Thomas, earl of Pembroke, lord-president of the council, and John, lord viscount Lonsdale, lord privy-seal. On the twenty first his majesty nominated lords-justices for the management of public affairs in his absence, and embarking the day after, at Margate, he landed at Orange Polder, in Holland; on the third of June, from whence he went to his favourite palace at Loo. It does not appear that his majesty transacted any great business during his stay in Holland, unless the drawing up memorials, asserting his claim to the principality of Neuchâtel, in Switzerland, to which the prince of Conti, and some others, pretended a prior right.

The Scottish company, notwithstanding the many discouragements and repulses which they had suffered in their attempts towards settling their foreign trade, were still determined to carry their scheme into execution; and accordingly this year they sent out five stout ships, and twelve hundred men, with all kinds of implements for war and commerce, in order to effect a settlement on the isthmus of Darien, which is a very narrow tract of country, uniting the two great continents of North and South America, and consequently very advantageously situated for trade. As the inhabitants had never been conquered by the Spaniards, and as the new colony sent thither, was to purchase their lands from the native proprietors (the Indians), they apprehended that no dispute would be raised against their establishment, from whence they promised themselves an immense treasure: and it must be owned, that, supposing all Europe but themselves to be fast asleep, the very advantageous situation of their colony, by which they would be enabled to supply Peru and Mexico with whatever they wanted from Europe, and in return supply Europe with the riches and product of those two opulent empires, seemed to promise, sooner or later, the accomplishment of most of the great things they had in view.

Having arrived safe at their intended port of Golden Island, on the coast of Darien, after having treated, on board their ships, with the natives, their men, at the request and with the consent of these latter, landed on the fourth of November, 1698, and immediately set about erecting a fort, which they called Fort St. Andrew, on a point of land about a league from Golden Island, where they found a safe capacious harbour; they also began to build a new town there, to be named New Edinburgh, as they did the whole country of Darien New Caledonia.

Great were the rejoicings made in Scotland on account of this landing; never considering that it would be the evident interest of all the commercial nations of Europe to frustrate their promising plan; for, besides the then general interest of England, considered by all men to be in immediate danger from this scheme, king Charles II. of Spain was then our ally, and the marquis de Canales, his ambassador at London, presented a very sharp memorial to king William, on the third of May this year, against the Darien settlement, which he termed "an insult of the Scots, in attempting to settle themselves in the very heart of the Spanish dominions in America, and what his master looked upon as a breach of the alliance between the two crowns." The Dutch likewise were extremely uneasy and jealous of this Scottish settlement, as tending to spoil their contraband trade from Curaçoa, &c. to the Spanish and American coasts; and might in time also prove very detrimental to their East Inwas at sea before: [this was obviously designed for the increase of our sailors.] And every inhabitant shall employ two such fresh men for every boat kept by them. Also every master of a fishing ship shall carry with him one that never was at sea before for every five men he shall carry. And for the preservation of timber on the island of Newfoundland, no person shall rind any of the trees, nor shall set on fire any of the woods," &c.

† "I. No wool, nor manufactories of wool, were to be exported from Ireland to any part of the world, but to England, and this only to the following ports; viz. Biddeford, Barnstaple, Minchhead, Bridgewater, Bristol, Milford Haven, Chelster, and Liverpoole, from the Irish ports alone of Dublin, Waterford, Youghall, Kingsale, Corke, and Drogheda; under forfeiture of ships and cargoes, and also of five hundred pounds penalty.

"II. The like forfeitures are hereby inflicted on such as shall export in ships, or carry by horses, into any other place or colony out of the king's dominions, any wool or woollen manufactories of the English Plantations in America."

This is the first mention in our Statute Book of woollen manufactories in our American plantations.

dia company: lastly, the French were no less jealous of this company, on the score of their West India commerce, which at that time began to be considerable; and Lewis very modestly offered to supply the court of Madrid with a fleet to dislodge the interlopers, though at this very time the French themselves were just beginning to establish a colony in the bay of Mexico, at the mouth of the great river Mississippi, always esteemed a part of the Spanish Florida; and were likewise extending their late possession of the west end of Hispaniola, a part also of the Spanish territory.

Thus was king William teized and pressed on every side for the suppression of this new company, and was therefore necessitated to comply with the urgent desires of his own subjects of England, of the Dutch (whose stadtholder he was), and of his other allies, to send instructions to the governors of all our American colonies, forbidding them, under the severest penalties, to hold any correspondence with the Scottish planters, or assist them in any shape with arms, ammunition, or provision. This was a dreadful blow to the infant colony, who had hitherto received supplies both from Jamaica and New York, and had depended upon the continuance thereof, till their own from Scotland should arrive; of which now despairing, and the Spaniards advancing against them, they were glad to accept of a capitulation, and finally to abandon the enterprize, towards the end of this summer: it is generally asserted, that, out of so many stout men who went thither, scarce one hundred ever got back to Scotland. The condition also of the numerous subscribers to this scheme was truly wretched and deplorable; many of them had sustained an irrecoverable loss, and some of them were even reduced to absolute poverty. All these calamities greatly inflamed the Scottish parliament and people against their neighbours of England*.

Mean while king William enjoyed his favourite diversions of shooting and hunting at Loo, where he was visited by the old duke of Zell, with whom he had long maintained an intimate correspondence. During his residence in this place, the earl of Portland, the grand pensionary of Holland, and the French ambassador, count Tallard, had frequent conferences upon the subject of the Spanish succession; but the event shewed, that William, with all his politics, was made the dupe of the French court in this affair; Lewis having nothing more in view, than to amuse our king with a treaty, in which he should seem to act as umpire in the concerns of Europe, until he should be able to accomplish his purpose of securing that succession in his own family. With this view he ordered the marquis d'Harcourt, his ambassador at Madrid, to exert his utmost endeavours in gaining the consent of his Spanish majesty; or, in case he should fail in his attempt, he should endeavour to hinder the succession passing to any of the emperor's children, pursuant to the will of Philip IV. At the same time the French king caused sixty thousand of his best troops to advance towards Catalonia; whilst a great number of ships and gallies cruized along the coast, and entered the Spanish harbours.

The queen of Spain having discovered the designs of France, used her utmost endeavours to disappoint them, and secure the succession for the archduke Charles, second son of the reigning emperor Leopold, to whom she was nearly related. With this view, she, in concert with count Har-rach, the Imperial ambassador, new-modelled the council; bestowed the government of Milan on prince Vaudemont; appointed the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, viceroy of Catalonia; and conveyed the sick king to Toledo, on pretence that the air of Madrid was unwholesome; but in reality with a view of depriving the French minister of any opportunity of conversing with his majesty. Harcourt was too well versed in the arts of courts not to perceive the whole drift of this journey: he quickly followed to Toledo, under pretence of having a memorial to deliver into his catholic majesty's own hands; but the queen caused him to be acquainted, that the king had left the care of all foreign affairs to the cardinal of Corduba, at Madrid, to whom he might communicate his memorial; the king being being come to Toledo only to recover his health, and not to trouble himself about business.

Harcourt, thus baffled, set himself to form a party in the Spanish council: he represented that Philip IV. had exerted his power too far, in disposing of the crown; that the dauphin of France was next in blood†; and the duke of Anjou, his second son, who was young, and might be moulded as they pleased, would be the properest person to succeed; that, should they be averse to this proposal, the king his master would rather acknowledge the electoral prince of Bavaria, than consent to the Spanish crown's devolving to the house of Austria, already too powerful by its late conquest in Hungary. This able negotiator farther observed, that should Charles II. prefer the grandson of Lewis, this would not be an invalidation of the solemn renunciations to the crown of Spain, made by the mother and wife of the French monarch; because these had been made only to prevent the elder son of their descendants from uniting the two kingdoms together under one rule; and here it was not an elder son that was chosen: it was at the same time doing justice to the right of blood, and preserving the Spanish monarchy from a partition. By these and the like representations, added to his prodigious magnificence, his great dexterity at treating, and perfect knowledge in the art of pleasing, by which the marquis d'Harcourt had won all hearts, and changed into esteem and benevolence that antipathy which the Spanish nation had nourished against the French, he gained over to his side a great number of the Spanish ministers, and among others cardinal Portocarrero, archbishop of Toledo, and the count of Monterey, who had great influence in the councils of that nation‡.

All Europe being now at peace, king William found no business of state to detain him on the continent, and therefore returned to England this year, about the middle of October, in order to the dauphin and Joseph, king of the Romans, eldest son to the emperor, were doubly in the same degree; but the right of primogeniture was in the house of France, the king and the dauphin being sons of the elder daughters.

hold a parliament, and receive fresh supplies. The parliament meeting on the sixteenth of November, the king, in his speech to both houses, observed, "That his calling them together so early was owing to the absolute necessity of making some farther provision for the security of the kingdom by sea and land; and particularly recommended the repairing the royal navy, and fortifying our harbours: he put them in mind also of making good the deficiencies of the funds, discharging the national debt, and providing supplies for the following year: he hoped (he said) that the nation was already convinced of the good effects of the peace, by the manifest increase of their trade, which he should use his utmost endeavours to promote and encourage; nevertheless, he thought it might receive a farther advantage, by passing a bill for punishing the unlawful and clandestine running of goods; and by employing the poor, who were now become a burthen to the nation: he declared himself to be fully assured of the love and affection of his people, which he should endeavour to preserve, by maintaining their rights and liberties, supporting the established religion, dispensing justice with clemency and impartiality, by countenancing virtue and discouraging vice, and by declining no difficulties nor dangers to promote their welfare and prosperity." He then concluded in these words: "Since, therefore, our aims are only for the public good, let us act with confidence in one another, which will not fail, with God's blessing, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flourishing people."

The whole of this speech is truly worthy the mouth of a great and good prince; but so unaccountably peevish was the parliament, so bent upon mortifying their sovereign in every imaginable instance, that they shewed themselves dissatisfied with his speech, and affected to construe that advice of "acting with confidence in each other," into an implication of a distrust or want of confidence in them: instead, therefore, of an address of thanks, the commons, on the fourth of December, presented a sort of remonstrance, in which they tell his majesty, "That being highly sensible nothing was more necessary for the peace and welfare of the kingdom, the quieting the minds of the people, and the disappointing the designs of their enemies, than a mutual and entire confidence between his majesty and his parliament, they esteemed it their greatest misfortune, that, after having so amply provided for the security of his majesty and his government, any jealousy or distrust had been raised of their duty and affection: at the same time they begged leave to represent, that it would greatly conduce to the continuing and establishing an entire confidence between his majesty and his parliament, that he would be pleased to shew marks of his high displeasure towards such persons as should presume to misrepresent their proceedings to his majesty; and they should, on their part, discourage all false rumours and reports reflecting on his majesty and his government, whereby any misunderstanding might be created between him and his subjects §." To this the king replied, "that no persons had ever yet dared to misrepresent the proceedings of either house; and if they had, they would immediately have felt the highest marks of his displeasure: and he took very kindly the assurance they gave him of discouraging all false rumours and reports reflecting upon him and his government *."

A patriotic jealousy and timely opposition to the first encroachments of arbitrary power, exerted upon proper occasions, cannot be too much applauded: but the misfortune is, that it has sometimes been assumed and exercised without any real cause, and has often been employed by artful and designing men as a cloak to conceal their own selfish and interested purposes. The present case affords an instance of this kind, and it were to be wished that the English history were not too replete with such examples. As they had found means to put the most odious interpretation upon a very harmless expression of the king in his speech, so the commons shewed themselves not at all inclined to be appeased by the smooth explanation and kind promises he offered them in his answer to their address: they determined to distress him, by prosecuting his ministers; and an affair happened about this time which furnished them with an excellent pretext for effecting their purpose.

There had been for many years loud and very just complaints of piracies in the West Indies, which for the sake of the profit made by purchasing their ill-gotten goods, had met with too much encouragement from the inhabitants of several of our plantations. This induced king William, in the year 1695, to appoint the earl of Bellamont, an Irish nobleman, and a person of great worth and honour, governor of New-York and of New-England. The earl, previous to his setting out to take upon him this office, thought it necessary to enquire into the most proper methods for extinguishing these abuses, and represented the matter to one colonel Livingstone, a gentleman of considerable property in New-York, as what nearly concerned the honour of that plantation. This induced the colonel to mention to his lordship one captain William Kidd, who was lately arrived from New York in a sloop of his own, as a brave bold fellow, who knew most of the pirates haunts, and might therefore be employed against them with great probability of success. The earl readily approved the scheme; and knowing how much the king had at heart the suppressing these piracies, he mentioned it to his majesty, who applauded the design, and recommended it to the board of admiralty: but the public affairs being then in a perplexed situation, and great difficulties found in manning the fleet, the board, though they signified their approbation of the thing, thought fit to lay it aside for that time †.

Lord Bellamont, disappointed in this quarter, proposed that if his majesty would give his authority, a ship might be fitted out by private adventurers, which would sufficiently answer the intended purpose. The king relished this proposal so well, and thought it of so great consequence to the public good, that he himself became a subscriber, and granted his letters-patent to Kidd, and those who might join in fitting him out for the expedition, for the sharing of all profits, prizes, &c. after the reservation of a tenth part to the crown.

† Oldmixon. Burnet.

The scheme hereupon was immediately carried into execution: the lord chancellor, the duke of Shrewsbury, the earls of Romney, Orford, and Bellamont, sir Edward Harrison, and colonel Livingstone already mentioned, engaged in the project. Six thousand pounds were subscribed in a few days; and a ship of sufficient force being equipped, the command of her was given to captain Kidd, whose commission was drawn in the common form, viz. "To take and seize pirates, and bring them to justice," without any special clause or proviso whatsoever. And more clearly to demonstrate that there was nothing secret or mysterious in this expedition, as the discontented part of the parliament affected afterwards to believe, we need only observe, from the most authentic histories of this affair, and even from the trial of Kidd himself, that he had no instructions, either public or private, only the earl of Bellamont gave him sailing orders, in which he was directed to act according to the letter of his commission.

But it happened that this man, instead of apprehending the pirates, engaged himself in the like scandalous practice. After having cruized about for some time, he at last came to Boston in New-England, where the earl of Bellamont seized him and what goods he had left, and sent advice of what he had done to England, desiring that a ship might be sent to bring him home. The Rochester was accordingly dispatched for this purpose; but she being disabled by a severe gale of wind, was obliged to return. This gave the disaffected party a handle to charge the ministry with authorizing and encouraging a piratical expedition, which they wanted to screen from the knowledge of the public: and such was the interest and influence of parties at this time, that an undertaking which was not only innocent but meritorious, was traduced as a design of robbery and illicit plunder. Nay, so far was this prejudice carried, that on the sixth of December some hot-headed members in the opposition made a motion, "That the letters-patent granted to the earl of Bellamont, and others, of pirates goods, were dishonourable to the king, against the law of nations, contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, an invasion of property, and destructive to commerce *." This motion however, to the credit of the house of commons be it spoken, was rejected with indignation by a great majority.

The next attempt the Country Party (as they called themselves) made, was against doctor Burnet bishop of Salisbury, whom they now endeavoured to remove from his office of preceptor to the duke of Gloucester, for which they alleged he was utterly unqualified, as well on account of his being a Scotchman, as by his having written the Pastoral Letter which had been burned by order of the parliament; and in which he had asserted that king William and queen Mary had a right to the crown by conquest. A motion was accordingly made for that purpose, but it met with the fate of the former. The bishop about this time had published his noted work, called, An Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, of which he himself gives a most pompous account in the History of his own Times; and indeed the good bishop seems, in most instances that regard himself, to have possessed no common share of vanity and self-complacency.

In the mean time a supply was granted for the support of the fleet and army, when it was resolved to adopt the same scheme of reduction which had prevailed in the last session; and it was resolved on the twenty-first of December that seven thousand seamen were sufficient for the naval service of the ensuing year.

But the circumstance on which the anti-courtiers built their chief hope of distressing or disgracing the government, was the Irish forfeitures, which the king had distributed among his own dependants. This business had indeed been begun the preceding session, and the following persons had been appointed to take an account of the said forfeited estates, viz. the earl of Drogheda, Francis Annesley, esq. John Trenchard, esq. James Hamilton, esq. Henry Langford, esq. sir Richard Leving, and sir Francis Brewster.

Upon the report of those gentlemen, made to the house of commons on the fifteenth of December this year, it appeared, that the persons outlawed in Ireland since the thirteenth of February 1688, on account of the late rebellion there, amounted in number to three thousand nine hundred and twenty-one: that all the lands in the several counties in Ireland belonging to the forfeited persons, as far as they could reckon, made one million sixty thousand seven hundred and ninety-two acres, worth about two hundred and eleven thousand six hundred and twenty-three pounds per annum, which by computation of six years purchase for a life, and thirteen years for the inheritance, came to the full value of two millions six hundred eighty-five thousand one hundred and thirty pounds: that some of those lands had been restored to the old proprietors, by virtue of the articles of Limerick and Galway, and by his majesty's favour by reversal of outlawries and royal pardons, obtained chiefly by gratifications to such persons who had abused his majesty's royal bounty and pardon. Beside these restitutions, which they thought to be corruptly procured, they gave an account of seventy-six grants and custodiams under the great-seal of Ireland. As,

To the earl of Athlone (Ginckle) two grants, containing	26,480
To the earl of Galway (Ruvigny) the grant of	36,148
To Mrs. Elizabeth Villiers, afterwards countess of Orkney	100,000

Upon which the commissioners observed, that after all deductions and allowances, there remained no less than a million and an half of money to be raised by the sale of these forfeited estates. Several animadversions were made upon this report, and the commissioners were charged with very gross errors and impositions, as well in computing the number of acres, as in ascertaining the value of the estates. Indeed it appears that they did not agree among themselves; for three of them, viz. the earl of Drogheda, sir Richard Leving, and sir Francis Brewster, refused to concur with their colleagues in the report, and even sent a memorial to the parliament, explaining the reasons of their dissent; but no regard was paid to their representation: the report of the others was approved, and a bill brought into the house of commons "for applying all the forfeited estates and interests in Ireland, and all grants thereof, and of the rents and revenues belonging to the crown within that kingdom, since the thirteenth of February 1688, to the use of the public:" and on the eighteenth of January, 1700, it was resolved, "That the advising, procuring, and passing the aforesaid grants, was highly reflecting on the king's honour, and that the officers and instruments concerned in the procuring and passing these grants had highly failed in the performance of their trust and duty." Then it was voted that this resolution should be presented to the king, which was accordingly done on the twenty-first of February; to which the king, five days after, returned this answer:

"Gentlemen, I was not only led by inclination, but thought myself obliged in justice to reward those who had served well, and particularly in the reduction of Ireland, out of the estates forfeited to me by the rebellion there: the long war in which we were engaged did occasion great taxes, and has left the nation much in debt; and the taking just and effectual ways for lessening that debt, and supporting public credit, is what in my opinion will best contribute to the honour, interest, and safety of the kingdom."

The commons were so nettled with this answer, that they resolved, "That whoever had advised it had used his utmost endeavour to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the king and his people *." They also resolved, on the seventh of March, that the following commissioners, viz. the earl of Drogheda, Francis Annesley, esq. John Trenchard, James Hamilton, Henry Longford, esqrs. and James Hooper, esq. their secretary, should each of them receive one thousand pounds for their service; and sir Richard Leving and sir Francis Brewster, the other two commissioners, each of them 500 l. only, for their expences. Sir Richard Leving they had before voted to be sent to the Tower for having, in his protest against the report given by his colleagues, been the author

The commons being apprehensive that the bill of resumption, which passed their house on the second of April, 1700, would meet with a strong opposition in the house of peers; artfully tacked it to the land tax bill, so that the one could not be rejected without defeating the other. When the bill came up to the lords, they did not shew any disposition to pass it, on a double account; first, because they looked upon it as a reflection upon his majesty; and, secondly, because this method of tacking it to a money-bill, entirely deprived their lordships of considering the expediency of it. However, the king being in great want of money, is said to have sent to the lords, desiring them to pass it, which they did immediately after. We cannot forbear observing, in relation to this affair, that it was certainly a great blemish in king William's character, that he was immoderately partial and lavish to those whom he personally loved, of whom the countess of Orkney, and the earls of Portland and Albemarle, were the most distinguished instances. It is possible the commons might have noticed this partiality, and could not without resentment behold such prodigious tracts of land given to foreigners, while the duke of Ormond, the earl of Marlborough, general Douglas, general Talmash, Cutts, and other British officers, who were eminently instrumental in the reduction of Ireland, had not a foot of land granted to any one of them. It was this conduct that gave an handle to the enemies of his person and government, to represent him as confining his affections wholly to foreign favourites, and that he hated the company, and even the sight of Englishmen. Certain it is, the English were not behind-hand in their endeavours to mortify him, which they never so completely effected as by carrying this bill: but yet, as if not satisfied with their victory, the commons proceeded to absurd lengths in their career; for they came to a resolution to address his majesty, That no person who was not a native of his dominions, except his royal highness George prince of Denmark, should be admitted into his councils in England or Ireland. This resolution was levelled against the earls of Portland, Albemarle, and Galway: but before the address could be presented, the king came to the house of peers on the eleventh of April; and having passed such bills as were ready for his assent †, and

† The bills signed by the king this session were, An act for taking away the bounty for exporting corn, there having been a great scarcity of corn the preceding year. An act for granting an aid to his majesty by sale of the forfeited estates in Ireland, and by a land-tax in England (which was two shillings in the pound). An act for laying further duties on wrought silks, muslins, and other East India goods; and for purchasing other reverfionary annuities. An act for the more effectual employing the poor, by encouraging the manufactories of this kingdom. An act for ascertaining the measures for retailing ale and beer. An act to enable his majesty's natural-born subjects to inherit the estates of their ancestors, either lineal or collateral, notwithstanding their fathers or mothers were aliens. An act for preventing frivolous and vexatious suits in the principality of Wales and the counties palatine. An act for the further preventing the growth of popery. An act for the more effectual punishment of vagrants, and sending them whither by law they ought to be sent. An act to prevent any dispute that may arise by officers and members of corporations having neglected to sign the association, and taking the oaths in due time. An act to punish governors of plantations in this kingdom, for crimes committed by them in the plantations. An act for the more effectual suppression of piracy. An act to repeal an act made in the ninth year of his majesty's reign, entitled, "An act for rendering the laws more effectual for the preventing the importation of foreign bone-lace, loom-lace, needle-work, point and cut work, three months after the prohibition of the woollen manufactory in Flanders shall be taken off." An act for the better ascertaining the tithes of hemp and flax. An act to enable justices of the peace to build and repair gaols in their respective counties. An act for continuing several laws therein mentioned, and for explaining the act, entitled, "An act to prevent the exportation of wool out of the kingdoms of Ireland and England into foreign parts, and for the encouragement of the woollen manufactories of the kingdom of England." An act for the better explanation and execution of former acts touching water-men and wherry-men rowing on the river of Thames; and for the better ordering and governing the said water-men, wherry-men, and lighter-men, and prorogued the parliament to the twenty-third of May.

Among the acts of this session a very remarkable one passed against papists, a complaint being received against the growth of popery: the same was referred to a committee; and when Mr. How the chairman made his report, it was proposed to bring in a bill to oblige all persons educated in the Romish religion, or suspected to be of it, who should succeed to any estate before they were of the age of eighteen, to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the test as soon as they came of that age; and till they did it their estate was to devolve to the next of kin that was a protestant, but was to return back to them upon their taking the oaths. All popish priests were also banished by this bill, and were adjudged to perpetual imprisonment if they should again return into England; and the reward of one hundred pounds was offered to any person who should discover a popish priest, so as to convict him. This act obtained the royal assent; but as it wanted several necessary clauses, and was in other respects very indefinite, it was not followed nor executed in any sort*.

Some little time before the prorogation of the parliament, a motion had been made to address his majesty to remove John lord Somers, lord-chancellor, from his presence and councils; but upon putting it to the vote, it was carried in the negative. The Tories, however, finding that the king was highly chagrined by the violence of the Whigs during this session, had found means to worm themselves into William's confidence, who indeed seems to have been always veering from one party to another, and gave him the most positive assurances, that if he would dismiss a few of his Whig ministers, and admit some of their own party, they would serve him with greater zeal than ever the Whigs had done. William fell in with their proposals; and the first sacrifice he made them was the lord Somers, whom they considered as the principal leader of the Whig party. Accordingly, the king sent for that nobleman to court, and told him that it seemed necessary for his service that he should part with the seals, and wished that he would make the doing this appear an act of his own; but that nobleman positively refused to take any step of that kind, which the world would readily construe into a consciousness of guilt or misbehaviour in his office. The king however being determined, the earl of Jersey was sent to him on the seventeenth of April, with an order to deliver the seals, with which he instantly complied. Thus was the lord Somers dismissed from this great office, which he had filled with distinguished reputation for near seven years. The seals were committed to the custody of sir Nathan Wright, one of the king's serjeants at law, with the title of lord-keeper.

In the course of the late session a bill was introduced into the house of commons for continuing the old East India company till the expiration of their charter at Michaelmas 1701. A state of their case was at the same time published, in which the equity of their claim was attempted to be proved, and the injuries they had sustained were greatly exaggerated. A violent opposition was made to this bill by the members of the new company; but the influence of their great patron Mr. Montagu being upon the decline, the bill was actually carried through both houses, and at last received the royal assent; so that there were now two rival companies of merchants trading to the East Indies: and such was at this time the force of party, in a matter which one should imagine ought to be of no party, that these two companies divided almost the whole nation into the two opposite factions of the Old and New Companies; the former generally favoured by the Tories, and the latter by the Whigs, who vented their spleen against each other in the most bitter invectives.

Besides the affairs of England, the king found himself extremely perplexed by the remonstrances of the Scots in behalf of their India company. The house of peers had, during the session, addressed his majesty against the Scottish settlement at Darien in America, but the commons did not think fit to join with them in that address. The king answered the lords by proposing a union between the two kingdoms, as the only effectual way to prevent all disputes of this nature for the future; and the lords accordingly brought in a bill for authorizing commissioners of England to treat with commissioners of Scotland on that subject; but the commons refusing their concurrence, the bill was dropped. In the mean time, the Scots drew up an address to his majesty, which was sent about the Scottish kingdom, and signed by many thousands; after which it was presented to the king on the twenty-fifth of March this year by the lord Ross, and several of the principal Scottish nobility, who came up for that purpose. This address was conceived in a very high strain: it was filled with warm complaints of their having been sacrificed, and basely betrayed in that quarter where they were entitled to protection; concluding in this remarkable manner: "Wherefore we in all humble duty most earnestly intreat, and most assuredly expect, that your majesty will order your parliament of Scotland to meet as soon as possible, which we doubt not will tend to the honour of your majesty, and the general good and satisfaction of the nation." Upon the presenting of this address, the commissioners intimated to his majesty, that they hoped he would look upon it not only as a petition for allowing the parliament to sit, but likewise as a testimony of the nation's concern for the interest of the Indian and African company. His majesty returned for answer, That it would be best known in parliament, which could not sit before the fourteenth of May; but it should sit then. Accordingly, against that time he sent down the duke of Queensberry in the character of his high-commissioner, charging him with a letter to the Scottish parliament, wherein he tells them, That he had purposed to hold that session in person, but that the present circumstances of affairs abroad would not allow it. He expresses great sorrow for the men, upon the said river, between Gravesend and Windsor. An act for taking away the duties upon the woollen manufactures, corn, grain, bread, biscuits, and meal, exported. An act for the appointing commissioners to take, examine, and

losses their nation had suffered in its trade: and after recommending to them the furnishing proper supplies, the encouraging manufactures, and other the like matters, he concluded with assuring them that he would maintain their laws, liberties, and kirk (that is, presbyterian) government.

The Scots however looked upon this as only an evasive answer, and they continued still in violent agitation. An address was presented to the parliament of that kingdom by the shire of Haddington, in which the addressers enumerated, with great acrimony, the losses they had suffered in trade; and in particular complained of the grievous hardships the nation lay under, by having a numerous body of forces kept on foot, which occasioned them, in times of peace, heavy and unnecessary taxes, while their much wealthier neighbours (the English) were disbanding their troops. The Scottish parliament now adopted the East India and African company as a national concern: and upon the reading of this address, and several others of a like tendency sent in from different parts of the kingdom, it was moved to resolve, "That the colony of Caledonia in Darien was a legal and rightful settlement, and that the parliament would maintain and support the same;" which the high-commissioner observing was likely to be carried in the affirmative, adjourned the parliament for three days; and at their next meeting for twenty days longer: in short, they were not suffered to sit till the winter following: and their settlement at Darien being then surrendered to the Spaniards, they could only lament their misfortunes (owing in a great measure to their own precipitate conduct and over sanguine hopes) and shew their resentment by angry speeches and abusive pamphlets*.

By the death of the young electoral prince of Bavaria, which happened on the sixth of February last year, during the sitting of the parliament, new intrigues began to be revived again in regard to the Spanish succession. Lewis XIV. king William, and the States-General, disposed once more of that monarchy in idea, and assigned to the archduke Charles, the emperor's youngest son, that part which they had before given to the infant prince lately deceased. They gave Milan to the duke of Lorraine; and Lorraine, so often invaded and so often restored again by France, was to be annexed to that crown for ever. This second treaty of partition, which was concluded on the fifteenth of March, N. S. and which set the politics of all the princes of Europe at work to support or thwart it, proved as useless as the first. When this treaty of partition was offered to the emperor to sign, he refused, because he was in hopes of having the entire succession. This treaty was concealed from the English parliament and privy-council, as the former had been.

His majesty having now resolved to go abroad, was pleased on Midsummer-day to constitute Edward earl of Jersey, lord chamberlain; Henry earl of Romney, groom of the stole; and the earl of Carlisle was made one of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber: the order of the garter was also conferred on Keppel earl of Albemarle, the king's new favourite, and on the earl of Pembroke president of the council. On the twenty-seventh of June his majesty appointed a regency† to manage the government in his absence, and on the seventh day of July embarked for Holland, where he arrived five days after.

Soon after his majesty's departure the duke of Gloucester, the only surviving son of the prince of Denmark, was taken ill of a fever, occasioned by overheating himself on his birth-day, the twenty-fourth of July, when he entered into the eleventh year of his age. He died on the twenty-ninth of the same month, to the inexpressible grief of their royal highnesses, being the last of seventeen children that had proceeded from this marriage: but the loss sustained by the death of this young prince was looked upon as irreparable by all who had any concern for their native country, the duke being the last of our native princes. It was yet concealed in the mystic roll of fate, that Britain was to be indebted to the illustrious house of Brunswick for every blessing and every glory that could make her the envy, admiration, and dread of her sister nations: advantages which seem perpetuated to us by the prospect of a long line of those heroes and fathers of their people.

King William was at Loo when he received the melancholy news of the death of the duke of Gloucester; soon after which the bishop of Osnabrug, brother to the duke of Lorraine, the elector of Bavaria, the electoral prince of Brandenburg, the electress of Brandenburg, and the electress-dowager of Hanover, attended his majesty at the Hague, where it was supposed that the state of the royal family of England by the young duke's death, was taken into consideration, and the business of the succession to the crown of these realms so far concerted, as to have it laid before the two houses at the ensuing session of parliament.

In the mean time the peace of the North was greatly affected by a war which had arisen between the kings of Denmark and Sweden. It will be necessary to say something as to the grounds of this war, because the part we took in it was very much to the honour of the English nation, and may serve as a lasting lesson to our all ministers, that whenever there appears an absolute necessity to succour an ally, it should be done without delay, and prosecuted with vigour, which will not only effectually serve him, but save ourselves a very considerable expence. Towards the close of the last year (1699) several princes of Germany had entered into a private treaty with the king of Denmark for attacking Charles XII. king of Sweden, at that time a mere lad, and even for dismembering the Swedish monarchy. Pursuant to this scheme, the king of Denmark (Frederick IV.) was to invade Holstein; the elector of Brandenburg was to fall upon Swedish Pomerania; Augustus II. king of Poland, was to attack Livonia; and in case the dukes of Zell and Hanover moved to the assistance of the Swedes, the landgrave of Hesse and the duke of the duke of Devonshire, lord-steward; the earl of Bridgewater, first commissioner of the admiralty; the earl of Marlborough, governor of his highness the duke of Gloucester; and the earl of Tankerville, first commissioner of the Treasury.

Wolfenbottle were to cut out work for them. This was an alliance founded entirely upon interest, for the Swedes had done nothing to deserve this treatment. The duke of Holstein, who had married the king of Sweden's sister, had built some new forts in that duchy, which the king of Denmark complained of as contrary to the Condominium which he and the duke had in that territory; and this, it seems, was the only ground upon which he entered into the league against Holstein and Sweden. However that might be, young Charles no sooner found himself likely to be attacked, than he ordered his ministers at our court and at the Hague, to press king William before he went abroad, and also the States-general, to act in their capacities of guaranties of the treaties made for securing the tranquility of the North, by preserving there the proper balance of power. At first it was thought requisite only to interpose our good offices: but when the king of Denmark overran Holstein, and the king of Poland first attempted to surprize, and then besieged in form Riga in Livonia, it became necessary to take other measures, especially as czar Peter of Muscovy appeared inclinable to enter into the confederacy. Bishop Burnet tells us, that king William was for some time in debate with himself, whether or not he should take the proper steps agreeable to the treaties he was engaged in with the crown of Sweden, without consulting the house of commons; but weighing well the ill humour they were in, and the measures they had taken to thwart all his inclinations, he resolved, as the executive part of the government lay in him, to proceed according to his own judgment for the present, and acquaint the parliament with it at their next meeting.

Agreeable to this resolution, his majesty, soon after the end of the last session, sent over a strong squadron into Holland, under the command of sir George Rooke, who in the latter end of May was joined by a Dutch squadron; and taking upon him the command of the united fleet, he sailed for the Sound, where he arrived on the twentieth of June. Here they were joined by count Wuchtmeister, admiral-general of Sweden, with a squadron he had under his command; and the combined fleets soon afterwards bombarded Copenhagen, to the harbour of which the Danish fleet, consisting of twenty-eight line of battle ships, had retired. A body of Swedes then at Bremen crossed the Elbe, advanced to the assistance of the duke of Holstein, and compelled the Danes to relinquish the siege of Tonninghen, which they had formed. The young king of Sweden, much about the same time, made a descent upon Zealand, the largest and most fruitful island in the Baltic, belonging to Denmark, and situated at the entrance of that sea*; which enterprize was executed with equal spirit and success. Charles was the first man that landed; and he here displayed such marks of courage and intrepidity as filled his enemies with the utmost consternation. This was greatly increased, by the disposition he made for laying siege to Copenhagen, which struck the Danes with such a panic, that they were glad to avoid the impending danger by an immediate peace; for which a treaty was set on foot, under the mediation of king William, at Travendahl: and this being signified to sir George Rooke, he refused to let the combined fleets any longer cover the descent of the Swedes; and a peace was concluded on the eighteenth of August 1700, between Denmark, Sweden, and Holstein, which left Charles at liberty to act against the czar and the king of Poland, who had both invaded his dominions at this critical juncture †.

King William's conduct in this whole affair was greatly applauded, and indeed with justice; for he at once effectually protected the Swedes, and yet obliged them to accept of reasonable terms of peace, by which the balance of power was properly preserved; which, if Copenhagen had been taken, would have inclined too much the other way. Hostilities being now at an end, the combined fleets of England and Holland returned to their respective ports; and the States-general were so sensible of the prudent and spirited conduct of sir George Rooke, that they thanked his majesty for having entrusted him with the command ‡.

About this time the new partition-treaty was communicated by the ministers of the contracting parties to the other powers of Europe, from whom it generally met with a very unfavourable construction: the people of Spain in particular were exasperated to the highest degree at the insolence of the three foreign powers who pretended to parcel out their dominions. They had a settled hatred to the house of Austria: the young archduke Charles used never to mention the Spaniards but with some opprobrious appellation. He soon experienced how incumbent it is on princes, as well as private men, to weigh all their words. The bishop of Lerida, who was ambassador from the court of Madrid to that of Vienna, on some occasion of dislike against the Germans, collected those expressions, and transmitted them with considerable exaggerations to his court in his dispatches. They were made public; and the bishop of Lerida being soon after recalled, on his return to Madrid he doubly increased the aversion which his countrymen had to the Germans. The French had engaged in their interests the cardinal Portocarrero, the marquis of Monterey, and the marquis de las Balbases, with many other persons of family and distinction in Spain: these joined together to prevent the dismembering of the monarchy. Their hatred to the Austrian government added a double weight to reasons of state in their breast. They persuaded the Spanish monarch to prefer the grandson of Lewis XIV. (the duke of Anjou) to a prince who was at so great a distance from them, and incapable of defending them. The scrupulous king caused all his divines to be consulted on this head, who were unanimously of opinion with the council; and ill as he was, Charles wrote a letter with his own hand to pope Innocent XII. proposing the case to him. The pope, who thought the liberty of Italy depended upon weakening the house of Austria, wrote back for answer, "That the laws of Spain, and the good of Christendom, required of him to give the preference to the house of Bourbon." This letter of the pope was dated July 16, N. S. 1700. Here, observes M. de Voltaire, the pope treated a case of conscience proposed by a sovereign as an affair of state, while the king of Spain made a case of conscience of an important affair of state*.

The pope's opinion was strongly supported by the remonstrances of Portocarrero; and the weak prince complied with the proposal, and made a fresh will in the beginning of October, N. S. by which he bequeathed all his dominions to the duke of Anjou. It was generally thought in Europe that this will of Charles II. had been forged by the cardinal; but if it be observed how generally the Spaniards came into this project, and that they delivered up all the Spanish territories to the duke of Anjou voluntarily, without any compulsion, it may surely be inferred with some appearance of truth, that it was the act of the whole nation: but however that was, the king of France still seemed to act heartily as a principal in the treaty of partition. His ministers at foreign courts ceased not to solicit, in conjunction with those of the maritime powers, the accession of the other powers of Europe. When count Zinzendorf, the imperial minister at Paris, presented a memorial, desiring to know what part France would act, should the king of Spain voluntarily offer the throne to a grandson of Lewis; the marquis de Torcy answered in writing, That his most Christian majesty would never listen to such a proposal.

The partition-treaty was no sooner known in England, than it excited various and even opposite sentiments in the nation. Some approved of it as the only possible means of preventing the Spanish monarchy from becoming an accession to the crown of France; and it was on this principle that William engaged in the treaty. Others condemned it as a measure which would increase the power of France to a dangerous height, and maintained that it was our business to compel Lewis to adhere to the renunciation which he and his queen had formerly made. The Jacobites greedily laid hold of this circumstance to render the king odious to his subjects; and the general distraction that prevailed throughout the kingdom filled them with hopes of being able to establish the succession upon the person of the pretended prince of Wales; nay, so sanguine were their expectations on this head, that they are said to have dispatched Mr. Graham, a brother of lord Preston, to St. Germain with an overture for this purpose, and an assurance that the house of commons would not stand by king William in the execution of the partition-treaty.

In this violent crisis of affairs king William left Holland, and arrived in England on the eighteenth day of October, not a little chagrined at the perplexities in which he found himself involved; and in the beginning of the next month he received advice that the king of Spain was actually dead. This was an event he hourly expected, but it was attended with a circumstance he had little foreseen; I mean the last will of that monarch, by which he had declared the duke of Anjou (afterwards Philip V.) second son of the dauphin of France, sole heir of the Spanish monarchy. In case this prince should die without issue, or inherit the crown of France, he willed that Spain should devolve to the duke of Berry; in default of him and children, to the archduke Charles and his heirs; failing of whom, to the duke of Savoy and his posterity. He likewise recommended a match between the duke of Anjou and one of the archduchesses.

This will had been kept so secret, that the count de Harrache, the emperor's ambassador, still flattered himself that the archduke would be acknowledged Charles's successor. He waited a long time for the breaking up of the great council, which was held immediately upon the king's death. At length, seeing the duke of Abrantes coming towards him with open arms and a smiling countenance, he made sure that the archduke was king; when Abrantes, embracing him, accosted him thus; "Vengo ad expedir me de la casa de Austria: I am come to take my leave of the house of Austria †."

When this testament was first notified to the French court, Lewis seemed for some time undetermined whether he should still abide by the treaty of partition, which was very profitable for France; or whether he should accept the will, which was so advantageous to his family; and to carry the farce on with the same dexterity he had begun it, he caused an extraordinary council of state to be summoned; the result of which was, that Lewis accepted the will. The duke of Anjou was hereupon declared king of Spain in the court of France on the sixteenth of November, N. S. was proclaimed at Madrid, by the direction of Lewis, the twenty-fourth of the same month; and on the fourth of December the new king set out for Spain, in company with his two brothers, who attended him as far as the frontiers of France.

Some little time before the decease of the Spanish king, pope Innocent died; and was succeeded by cardinal Albani, who took the name of Clement XI. This pope was the youngest that had for many years been inaugurated, and sat longer than most had done in the list of Roman pontiffs; not dying till the year 1721. He was but little acquainted with public affairs, but was very learned; and in so critical a time, a pope of courage and spirit was thought the fittest person to fill the Roman see.

Lewis XIV. by accepting of the king of Spain's will in favour of his grandson, had acted so directly contrary to his engagements with England and Holland, that he found some difficulty in justifying his conduct to those two powers. However, he sent his minister the marquis de Torcy to wait on the earl of Manchester, the English ambassador at Paris, with orders to represent that his most Christian majesty had duly weighed the occasion and intent of the late treaty with England, &c. which was to prevent a war with Europe; but finding that the emperor had refused to accede

* Voltaire's Age of Lewis XIV.

† Ibid. This author also gives us the following character of Charles II. of Spain. "This prince was from his birth as weak in mind as body; and this weakness had spread itself through his dominions. It is the fate of monarchies to have their prosperity depend upon the disposition of a single man:

Charles II. had been brought up in such profound ignorance, that when the French were besieging Mons, he thought that place belonged to the king of England. He neither knew whereabouts Flanders lay, nor what places belonged to him there. This king left the duke of Anjou all his dominions, without knowing what he had given him.

thereto, and the duke of Savoy absolutely rejected the accepting of Naples and Sicily, and there having appeared discontentments both in England and Holland against the French being masters of those two kingdoms, in relation to the trade of the Levant; and moreover, none of the princes that the treaty had been communicated to having promised more than a bare neutrality, his most Christian majesty, upon consideration of the premises, could not but think there was a necessity for his accepting what the will of the king of Spain had declared in favour of the duke of Anjou, which should he have refused, he said the archduke would have had a double title, viz. from the will of Philip IV. and that of the deceased king: that the Spaniards were so unwilling to see their monarchy dismembered, that they would defend their whole kingdom to the last province, rather than suffer the partition-treaty to be executed: that the ships which were to be furnished by Great Britain and Holland would not be sufficient for effecting such a purpose: that it was certain the treaty was more advantageous to France than the will, which the most Christian king had accepted, merely from a desire of preserving the peace of Christendom; and that his majesty hoped that these reasons would so far prevail with the king of England, that there might still be the same good understanding as ever between the two crowns, which was so necessary for the good and tranquility of Europe.

The same topics were employed by monsieur Briord, the French ambassador at the Hague: but the States-general ordered Heemskerke, their envoy at Paris, to present a memorial, wherein they testified their great surprize at his most Christian majesty's having accepted the will of the late king of Spain, in direct contravention to the solemn engagements he had entered into with them and the court of England: adding, that as the time limited for the emperor to accede to the treaty was not yet expired, they could never have doubted but that his most Christian majesty would have adhered to his treaties in every article. Lewis in answer to this sent a letter to the States, in which he replied, that the principal design of the treaty being to prevent the union of the two kingdoms of France and Spain under one sovereign, this was effectually provided for by the will, the heirs of the duke of Anjou being rendered incapable of the crown of Spain if they succeeded to that of France; so that he had still adhered to the spirit and intent of the partition-treaty, though he might have departed from the letter*. A memorial to the same purpose was dispatched to all the courts of Europe. Soon after, Don Bernardo, the Spanish ambassador at the Hague, presented their High Mightinesses with a letter from his new master, notifying his accession. The States however declined giving any answer to this, or the French king's pressing remonstrances for them to acknowledge his grandson's title, on pretence that they could not declare themselves upon affairs of such consequence without consulting their respective provinces.

The emperor loudly complained against the French king for having accepted the will; but in his present circumstances he could do nothing more than complain. The Spaniards, however, fearful that his imperial majesty might prevail on the maritime powers to join with him in a league to set aside the succession of the duke of Anjou, and bring them under the hated dominion of the house of Austria; and well considering their own inability to defend their territories against such a confederacy, should it be formed, took the resolution of throwing themselves into the arms of France, and depending upon her for protection. In pursuance of this resolve, the duke of Bavaria, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, had orders to yield up all the towns and fortresses in that country to the French, and admit their troops into the garrisons: the same was done in the duchy of Milan. A French fleet was received into the harbour of Cadiz, and another dispatched to the Spanish settlements in the West Indies. Thus Lewis XIV. saw the kingdom of Spain, America, one half of Italy, and the Low-Countries, fall under his orders, without his having been at the trouble of striking a blow; while all Europe at first seemed lost in surprize, and unable to bestir itself, when it saw the Spanish monarchy become subject to France, whose rival it had been for three hundred years; and the prospect was the more alarming, because the duke of Burgundy had then no children, and by this means the king of Spain was in time likely to succeed to the crown of France. A great part of the Dutch army lay scattered up and down in the garrisons of the Spanish Netherlands, particularly in Luxembourg, Namur, and Mons; and upon the cession of these to the French, and the refusal of the Dutch troops to acknowledge the new king of Spain, they were made prisoners of war. This stroke filled the States with terror and dismay: they were in a defenceless condition, and without an army to oppose the progress of the French and Spanish troops, should they attempt to invade their territories. These considerations determined their High Mightinesses to avert the impending danger, by acknowledging the duke of Anjou as king of Spain; and they accordingly wrote a letter to the French king for that purpose; which was no sooner received than orders were dispatched for sending back their battalions†.

France seemed now advancing with haughty strides towards an universal monarchy; and to add to the calamity of Europe, England, who was the only power capable of protecting and defending the rest, was at this period weakened and enervated by intestine factions and home-bred broils. William burned with indignation at finding himself thus outwitted by the French king; and in all probability, had he been able to engage in a new war, he would have revenged himself on that perfidious monarch: but, conscious of his own inability to take a suitable revenge, he wisely dissembled his chagrin until he should have founded the opinion of the other powers of Europe. In the mean time, being heartily wearied with the factious and turbulent spirit of the Whigs, he threw himself into the arms of the Tories. He now gave his confidence to the earl of Rochester, who was the head of that party, and had undertaken for their submission and compliance with the king's will. This nobleman was now appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; the privy-seal was delivered to the earl of Tankerville, who succeeded lord Londale; sir Charles Hedges was made secretary, in the room of the earl of Jersey; and the lord Godolphin was appointed first commissioner of the treasury, in the room of Mr. Charles Montagu, who was created earl of Halifax; the management of the commons was entrusted to Mr. Robert Harley, who, tho' of a presbyterian family, and educated in Whiggish principles, had hitherto opposed the court with great warmth and ability, on a disgust he had taken at not being considered at the Revolution in the manner he thought he deserved.

This new ministry, however, upon comparing notes, soon found that they had not sufficient weight of interest to carry their points in the present parliament, which had been summoned to sit on the twenty-first of November, and afterwards prorogued to the fifteenth of January: they therefore persuaded his majesty to dissolve this parliament by proclamation, and to issue writs for convoking a new one, which was appointed to meet on the sixth of February following.

Before the meeting of the English parliament, that of Scotland, which, agreeable to the king's promise, had been convened this winter, notwithstanding the heats they were in about the miscarriage of their settlement at Darien, and some other matters, at length came to this salutary resolve, "That in memory of the great and never to be forgotten deliverance, which it had pleased God to give that kingdom by his majesty; and for that their safety and happiness depended, under God, upon the preservation of his person, and the security of his government, they would stand by and support his majesty and his government to the utmost of their power, and maintain such forces as should be necessary for these ends." Accordingly, an act passed for keeping on foot three thousand men till the first of December, 1702, and another for a land-tax to maintain these troops: which done, the commissioner produced the king's letter, wherein his majesty desired that he might have one thousand one hundred men on his own account to the first of June following, which the parliament readily complied with, and then were prorogued to the sixth of May. The duke of Queensberry and the earl of Argyle had exerted themselves with so much success in calming the minds of the Scottish assembly, and rendering them more amicable to the desires of the government, that king William thought himself under a necessity of rewarding their services: accordingly, Queensberry had a garter, and Argyle was made a duke*.

We cannot take our leave of this year without making mention of a glorious victory obtained by the young king of Sweden, Charles XII. over Peter czar of Muscovy, who had advanced towards Narva with an army of one hundred thousand men, in order to crush the young monarch. At the same time the king of Poland invested Riga, the capital of Livonia. The old count d'Alberg defended this place with incredible valour, insomuch that Augustus was glad of an honourable pretext for raising the siege. Riga was full of merchandize belonging to the Dutch: the States general ordered their ambassador at the court of Augustus to represent the matter to his majesty. The king of Poland did not long resist their importunities, and agreed to raise the siege, rather than occasion the loss of so many valuable commodities to his allies: the latter, however, were at no loss for the real cause of this stretch of complaisance. The only thing that Charles of Sweden had now to do, was to march against the czar; with whose conduct he was the more exasperated, as at that very time there was an ambassador from him residing at Stockholm, who had lately sworn to the renewal of an inviolable peace. The emperor of Muscovy had indeed published a manifesto, which it would have been more to his honour to have suppressed. He there alleged, as the reason of the war, some disrespect which had been shewn him when he was upon his travels incognito, and the extravagant prices his ambassadors had been obliged to pay for provisions. Such were the mighty injuries for which he was about to ravage a whole kingdom with eighty thousand men! at the head of which he appeared before Narva † on the first of October (1700) and immediately laid siege to it. Narva was very weakly fortified. The baron de Hoorn, who commanded there, had not above one thousand regular troops, and yet this immense army could not reduce it in ten weeks: indeed the Muscovites were at that time little better than a body of undisciplined savages forced from their forests, and ignorant of all the manœuvres of war.

Charles XII. having crossed the Baltic Sea with his army, about twenty thousand strong, advanced with hasty marches to the relief of the besieged. The czar, who was far from despising his enemy, employed every art in order to crush him: with this view he resolved to shut up Charles between two armies. Nor was this all; a detachment of thirty thousand men from the camp before Narva were posted at a league's distance from that city, directly in the king of Sweden's road; another body of twenty thousand was placed at a greater distance upon the same road; and five thousand others composed an advanced guard; through all which troops Charles must necessarily force his way before he could reach the camp, which was itself strongly fortified. The king of Sweden had landed at Pernau, in the gulph of Riga, from whence he made a flying march to Revel ‡, followed by only four thousand horse, and the same number of foot. He always marched in the van of his army, without waiting for the rear. He soon found himself, with his eight thousand men only, before the advanced posts of the enemy. He resolved without hesitation to attack them, the one after the other, before they could possibly learn with what a small number they had to encounter. The Muscovites seeing the Swedes advance with such an appearance of confidence, imagined that the whole army was coming upon them. The advanced guard of five thousand men fled at their first approach. The twenty thousand that lay behind them, perceiving the flight of their fellow-soldiers, took the alarm, and carried their terror and confusion with them into the camp. Charles quickly carried all the posts, and at length appeared with his eight thousand men, exhausted by their fatigues, before the camp of the Muscovites, consisting of eighty thousand men, and defended by one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon; and scarce allowing himself any time to rest, he instantly gave orders for the attack, which began about noon, on the thirtieth of November, 1700. The Russians stood the shock for some time without flinching; but after an engagement of three hours, the entrenchments were forced on all sides. Charles pursued the right of the enemy as far as the river Neva, near forty thousand of the Russians flying like sheep before four hundred Swedes only, detached in pursuit. The bridge broke under the fugitives, and the river was filled with dead carcasses. The rest returned to their camp, without knowing whither they went: there they defended themselves for a while; but at last their generals surrendered to the king, and laid their arms at his feet*.

The left wing of the enemy was not yet entirely routed; but general Waad, who commanded that wing, having heard of the gracious reception the king had given to the other generals, and of his having dismissed with their liberty all the subaltern officers and soldiers, sent a message to him, requesting the same favour for the corps under his command. The conqueror granted him his request; and the general, with his Muscovites, to the number of thirty thousand, marched uncovered through less than seven thousand Swedes. The soldiers as they passed the king, threw their arms upon the ground, and the officers presented him with their ensigns and colours. Charles caused the whole of this multitude to be conducted over the river. Had he detained them, the number of prisoners would have been at least five times greater than that of the conquerors. After this, he entered the city of Narva in triumph. The czar was not present at this battle: it seems he had given orders for the march of about thirty thousand men, who were advancing from Pleskow. Peter, impatient for their arrival, left his camp to go in quest of this reinforcement; which having joined, he was advancing by long marches, in full hopes of surrounding his enemy on all sides: but before he had proceeded half way, he received intelligence of the battle of Narva, and of the dispersion of his whole army. Peter was too prudent to think of attacking, with his thirty thousand raw and undisciplined troops, a conqueror who had so lately defeated eighty thousand men in their entrenchments. He returned home with a determined resolution to discipline his troops: in which he succeeded so well, that at last, by long exercise, they grew even superior to the enemy†. I flatter myself the reader will not be displeased at this digressive account of so glorious an action, part of a campaign hardly to be paralleled in history, in which a king of eighteen years of age only, marched in person with a handful of troops against three powerful monarchs who had invaded his dominions with formidable armies, and totally defeated all their cruel and perfidious designs. But to return to the affairs of England.

The new parliament meeting on the sixth, was prorogued to the tenth of February, 1701, when Mr. Harley was chosen speaker; and the next day king William made a speech to both houses, wherein he took notice of the great misfortune the nation had sustained in losing the duke of Gloucester, which, he observed, had made it absolutely necessary that there should be a farther provision for the succession of the crown in the protestant line; and therefore earnestly recommended it to their early and serious consideration. The death of the king of Spain, he said, with the declaration he had made with regard to his successor, had also made so great an alteration in affairs abroad, that it required their particular attention; and he did not doubt but their resolutions thereupon would be such as should most conduce to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the protestant religion, and the peace of Europe. He desired supplies for the current year, and put them in mind of the deficiencies and public debts which were yet unprovided for; at the same time recommending to them the putting the royal navy in a good condition, and of fortifying the sea-ports for its security. He also recommended the improvement of trade, and making provision for the poor; and concluded with exhorting them to proceed in their resolutions with such vigour and unanimity, as should convince the world that they were united among themselves, than which, in his opinion, nothing could contribute more to preserve tranquillity at home, and render the nation respected abroad.

The elections had gone generally in favour of the Tories, so that their party had now a great majority in the house: and in order to secure their superiority, they took care to expel a great number of Whig members, who had been guilty of corruption in procuring their elections; a practice from which they themselves, it may be presumed, were not totally clear. However, the power being in their own hands, their friends were not so strictly examined.

The commons having taken the king's speech into consideration, attended his majesty with an address, signifying their resolution to stand by and support him and his government, and to take such effectual measures as might best conduce to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the protestant religion, and the peace of Europe‡.

His majesty having communicated to the house a memorial he had received from the States-general, wherein, after having set forth their apprehension of being attacked by the arms of France and Spain, and the urgent necessity they should have in so great a danger of the assistance of England, they requested his majesty to get the succours stipulated by treaty in readiness, that they might rely on them, if occasion required§. The commons desired that the treaty between England and the States, in the year 1677, might be laid before them; which being done, and they having gone through the same, addressed his majesty to enter into such negotiations with the States-general and other potentates, as might most effectually conduce to their mutual security, and the preservation of the peace of Europe, assuring him they would enable him to perform the treaty of 1677 with the States*.

On the seventeenth of February Mr. secretary Vernon produced a letter in the house of commons, that had been intercepted, from the earl of Melfort to his brother the earl of Perth, then governor to the pretended prince of Wales, which suggested that there were men and arms provided by the papists and Jacobites to assist the French king, if he would make a descent in favour of king James. The commons took but little notice of this letter, as no particular persons were mentioned as concerned in such a conspiracy: but the lords, to whom the letter was also imparted, ordered it to be printed, and then waited on his majesty with an address, thanking him for his care of the protestant religion; desiring all the treaties made since the last war might be laid before them; requesting him to engage in such alliances as he should think most proper for preserving the balance of power in Europe; assuring him of their concurrence; expressing their acknowledgement for his having communicated to them Melfort's letter; desiring he would give orders for seizing the arms of disaffected persons, for removing papists from London, and for searching after those arms and provisions of war mentioned in the letter: finally, they requested him to equip speedily a sufficient fleet for the defence of himself and his kingdom†.

The credit of Exchequer-bills was so lowered by the change of the ministry, and the lapse of the time allotted for their circulation, that they fell near twenty per cent. to the prejudice of the revenue, and the discredit of the government in foreign countries. The commons having taken this affair into consideration, voted that provision should be made from time to time for making good the principal and interest due on the parliamentary funds; and afterwards passed a bill for renewing the bills of credit, commonly called Exchequer-bills.

We have already observed that this was a Tory parliament. The king had, in his speech of the eleventh of February, earnestly pressed the house to provide for the succession of the crown, after the demise of himself and the princess of Denmark. Nevertheless, no notice was taken of this affair, though of so great importance, till the third of March. At last Mr. Harley proposed, that before they should proceed to the nomination of any person to succeed to the crown, certain conditions should be settled as preliminaries, in order to secure the privileges of the people. A committee was accordingly appointed to deliberate on this matter; and on the twelfth of March Mr. Conyers reported the resolution of the committee, when the house did then resolve and agree to the following preliminaries, as heads of the bill of succession‡.

I. That whoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown, shall join in communion with the church of England, as by law established.

II. That in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without the consent of parliament.

III. That no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of the crown, shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of parliament.

IV. That from and after the time that the further limitation by this act shall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well governing of this kingdom, which are properly cognizable in the privy-council by the laws and customs of this realm, shall be transacted there; and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the privy-council as shall advise and consent to the same.

V. That after the limitation shall take effect, no person born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, altho' he be naturalized or made a denizen (except such as are born of English parents) shall be capable to be of the privy-council, or a member of either house of parliament; or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military; or to have any grants of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, from the crown to himself, or to any others in trust for him.

VI. That no person that has any office or place of profit under the king, or receives a pension from the crown, shall be capable of serving as a member of the house of commons.

VII. That after the limitation shall take effect, judges commissions be made, quamdiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both houses of parliament, it may be lawful to remove them.

VIII. That no pardon under the great-seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the commons in parliament.

Having settled these preliminaries, the nomination of a person as next in succession to the crown was naturally to follow. The commons on this occasion gave a striking proof of the little liking they had to this affair; for they employed sir John Bowles, who was then disordered in his senses, and soon after became a downright lunatic, to name the electress-dowager of Hanover as next in succession to the crown. Upon this a committee was appointed to consider of the bill, and sir John was of course put into the chair: the matter was treated with great coldness and indifference for several weeks; but at length the committee reported their resolutions, which were, "That the princess Sophia, duchess-dowager of Hanover, be declared next in succession to the crown of England in the protestant line, after his majesty and the princess of Denmark, and the heirs of their bodies respectively:" and, "That the further limitation of the crown be to the said princess Sophia and the heirs of her body, being protestants." A bill was formed upon these resolutions, which was sent up to the house of lords, where it was expected to meet with great opposition. Some objections were indeed made by the marquis of Normanby, and a protest was entered against it by the earls of Huntingdon and Plymouth, and the lords Guildford and Jefferies. It however passed by a great majority, and on the twelfth day of June received the royal assent; and soon after the earl of Macclesfield was sent to notify the transaction to the electress Sophia, who likewise received from his hands the order of the garter.

The popish branches of the royal family, who were more nearly allied to the crown than the house of Hanover, looked upon this settlement as a very great hardship on them; particularly the duchess of Savoy, daughter to the late duke of Orleans, and grand-daughter of Charles I. by the mother's side, who was nearest in blood to the crown after the princess of Denmark and king William. She ordered count Maffei ambassador of Savoy, therefore, to make the following protest in her behalf:

"That Anne of Orleans, duchess of Savoy, &c. princess of the blood-royal of England by the royal princess of Great Britain Henrietta her mother, put so high a value upon that prerogative, that she gladly made use of the opportunity that then offered to set it forth before the eyes of the whole English nation, as an evidence she drew from thence of having a right to that august throne: that therefore, being informed that it had been resolved in the parliament then sitting, having the order of succession under consideration, she represented to the king and to the said parliament, that being the only daughter of the late princess-royal Henrietta her mother, she was the next in succession after his majesty William the Third, and the princess Anne of Denmark, according to the laws and customs of England, which always preferred the nearest to the remotest line: that her title being thus notoriously known and indisputable, stood in need of no farther proof: however, that she thought fit to protest against all resolutions and decisions contrary thereunto, in the best and most effectual manner that might be practised in such a case; wherein she complied rather with custom than necessity; because she had so great an idea of the wisdom and justice of the king and parliament, that she had no cause to fear they would do any thing prejudicial to her and her children *."

No regard, however, was paid to this declaration, which was looked upon at St. Germain as an affront to king James, his queen, and the pretended prince of Wales, as no notice was taken of their right; but the duchess was substituted immediately after the princess of Denmark; a pretension which tended greatly to confirm the suspicion of the pretender's illegitimacy.

His majesty coming to the house on the thirteenth of March, gave the royal assent to some few acts; and on the sixteenth, secretary Hedges delivered a message signed by the king to the commons, whereby they were informed, "That his majesty having directed Mr. Stanhope, his envoy-extraordinary and plenipotentiary at the Hague, to enter into negotiations in concert with the States-General of the United Provinces, and other potentates, for the mutual security of England and Holland, and the preservation of the peace of Europe, according to an address of their house; and that the said Mr. Stanhope having transmitted his majesty copies of the demands made by himself and the deputies of the States upon that subject to the French ambassador there; his majesty had thought fit to communicate the same to them, it being his intentions to acquaint them from time to time with the state and progress of those negotiations into which he had entered, pursuant to their addresses before-mentioned †."

The proposals insisted on by Stanhope and the States-general with France were in substance as follow: "That the French king should immediately withdraw his troops from the Spanish Netherlands: that for the security of England, the cities of Ostend and Nieuport should be delivered into the hands of his Britannic majesty: that no kingdoms, provinces, cities, lands, or places appertaining to the crown of Spain, should ever be yielded or transferred to the crown of France, on any pretence whatever; that the English should retain the same rights, privileges, and immunities, with regard to navigation and commerce in the dominions of Spain, which they enjoyed at the death of his late Catholic majesty; as also all such immunities, rights, and franchises, as the subjects of France, or any other power, either possess for the present, or may enjoy for the future: that all treaties of peace and commerce between England and Spain should be renewed, and that a treaty formed on these demands should be guaranteed by such powers as one or other of the contracting parties should solicit and persuade to undertake that office."

The States-general joined in the above proposals, with this difference, that they demanded as cautionary towns, Venlo, Ruremond, Stevenswaert, Luxembourg, Namur, Charleroi, Mons, Dendermonde, Damme, and St. Donas, with all their fortifications and appurtenances.

The French, however, having now gotten possession of the Spanish Netherlands, haughtily rejected these proposals, equitable and reasonable as they certainly were: and Mr. d'Avaux, the French ambassador at the Hague, where these negotiations were carried on, returned for answer, That the king his master had no other reply to return to the demand of the States-general of the United Provinces, than that he was ready to renew the treaty of Ryswick, which was all the security the States were to expect. He added, that he had no orders to give any answer to his Britannic majesty's envoy; but if that king had any thing to demand, it might be done by his ambassador at Paris, or the French minister; and that he had no commission to treat with any but the States.

This being communicated to the commons, they, instead of resenting the treachery and injustice of the French monarch, seemed to think of nothing but thwarting and perplexing their own; and with this view they began to wreak their vengeance on all those who had any hand in concluding the treaty of partition, which they now took under consideration*. Accordingly, upon receiving his majesty's message, they drew up an address, which was presented to the king on the twenty-first of March; wherein they thanked him for his gracious messages, and at the same time begged leave to lay before his majesty the ill consequences of the treaty of partition (passed under the great-seal of England during the sitting of parliament, and without the advice of the same) to this kingdom and the peace of Europe, whereby such large territories of the Spanish monarch were to be delivered to the French king.

This address greatly chagrined the king: however, he thought proper to dissemble his resentment; and without taking notice of that part of it which related to the partition-treaty, he returned for answer, that he was glad the commons were pleased with his communicating to them the state of the negotiations, which he should continue to inform them of, and always be ready to receive their advice thereupon, being persuaded nothing could contribute more to the happiness of the kingdom and the peace of Europe, than the concurrence of the parliament in all his negotiations, and a good understanding between him and his people.

The topic of the partition-treaty had, it seems, been taken up by the lords some few days before the commons had assumed the consideration of that affair: the debate was begun by Sheffield marquis of Normanby, and some others of the Tory party; and after canvassing the subject for two or three days, they on the twentieth of March presented an address to his majesty, which, as it conveys a full idea of the sense of one part of the nation concerning this famous treaty, we shall insert it here, though it is somewhat long.

Their lordships therein represent to his majesty, that after having read and considered the said partition-treaty of the third of March, 1700, N. S. made with the French king, together with the separate and secret articles which he had been pleased to communicate to them, they had to their great sorrow found the matters thereof would be of very ill consequence to the peace and safety of Europe; for that besides the occasion it might have given to the late king of Spain to have made his will in favour of the duke of Anjou, if that treaty had taken effect, the prejudice to his majesty and his subjects, and indeed to all Europe, by the addition of Sicily, Naples, several ports of the Mediterranean, the province of Guipuscoa, and the duchy of Lorraine to France, had been not only very great, but contrary to the pretence of the treaty itself, which was to prevent any umbrage that might have been taken by uniting so many states and dominions under one head: that by all the informations they had had of the fatal treaty, they could not find that the verbal orders or instructions (if any were given to his majesty's plenipotentiaries) were ever considered in any of his majesty's councils, or that the draught of that treaty had ever been laid before his majesty at any meeting of his council; much less that it was advised or approved of by any council or committee of council: wherefore they thought themselves bound in duty to his majesty, and justice to their country, most humbly to beseech him, that for the future he would be pleased to require, and admit in all matters of importance, the advice of his natural-born subjects, whose known probity and fortunes might make him and his people entertain a just assurance of their fidelity to his service; and that in order thereunto he would be pleased to constitute a council of such persons, to whom his majesty might be pleased to impart all affairs both at home and abroad, which might any way concern him and his dominions: for as interest and natural affection to their country would incline them to wish the welfare and prosperity of it, much more than others who had no such ties upon them; and as their experience and knowledge of their country would also render them more capable than strangers of advising his majesty in the true interest of it; so they were confident, that after such large and repeated demonstrations of his subjects duty and affection, his majesty could not doubt of their zeal in his service, nor want the knowledge of persons fit to be employed in all his most secret and arduous affairs; and that since it appeared the French king's accepting of the king of Spain's will was a manifest violation of that treaty, they humbly advised his majesty in future treaties with that prince to proceed with such caution as might carry a real security †.

The king being at Hampton-court when this address was voted, the lord-keeper waited on him with it in the name of the upper house, when his majesty was pleased to return an answer, conceived in the following general terms: "That their address contained matters of very great moment, and he would always take care, that all treaties he made should be for the honour and safety of England."

It will however be but fair to present the reader with some of the arguments on the other side of the question, that he may be enabled to form a suitable judgment on this important controversy. The advocates for the partition-treaty alleged, that considering the weakness of Spain, which had been so fully proved in the affair of Barcelona, that crown could not be supposed capable of making any resistance against the arms of France, when freed from a war; since, at the time that kingdom was pressed on all sides, it had been able with a small army to take that place. If then France, with so small a force, could make such a conquest, what could be expected from Spain, should he send his whole strength against them? A fleet before Cadiz, and two small armies marching through Navarre and Catalonia, might without much difficulty make the conquest of Spain. The emperor had, by abandoning all other considerations to his project of subduing the Turks, both exhausted his own strength, and disgusted his allies during the war; and at the conclusion of the peace of Rylwick, he had shewn so little regard to the honour and interests of a prince to whom he was so much indebted

* The debates in the commons on this subject were carried on with a degree of warmth which seemed to have banished all regard to decency or common good breeding. Sir Edward Seymour compared the division which had been made of the Spanish territories, to a robbery on the highway; and Mr. Howe had even the insolence to call it a felonious treaty: an expression which incensed the king to such a degree, that he is reported to have said, he would have demanded personal satisfaction with his sword, had he not been restrained by the disparity of condition between himself and the person who had offered such an outrageous insult to his honour. Burnet. Tindal. † Proceedings of the House of Lords, ii. 25. Tindal.

as he was to king William, that very few of the English seemed willing to engage in a new war for him and his family. We were become so weary of taxes, and so jealous of a standing army, that we had very considerably reduced both our land and sea-forces; and the dangers of the progress the French might make, had the Spanish king died some months before, were too obvious and alarming to require exaggeration. Things being in this state, might it not be fairly inferred that king William, in concluding the partition-treaty, had solely in view the preservation of the peace of Europe? It was asserted, that how bad soever the partition-treaty might be, it seemed still more desirable to yield up some parts of the Spanish monarchy than to let France conquer it, or rather take all. It was observed, that Spain itself, the West Indies, and Flanders, being the branches of that monarchy in which we were chiefly concerned, while these were kept entire in the same hands, our interests could not be supposed in any great danger. As to the dominions in Italy, though very valuable, it was said that the naval power yet belonging to them were not now so considerable as they had been some years before: nor was it certain that, notwithstanding the partition-treaty, they would have become a sure acquisition to the crown of France, which perhaps would have found as much opposition to it as she was like to receive now to her taking possession of the whole. The Spaniards had never before this time been guilty of betraying their country; and their coming so tamely under the French yoke was so little looked for, that till all saw it, none could believe it. In fine, the friends of this treaty and of the court strenuously insisted, that it was the only means to prevent the impending destruction of Europe; and that in the making it the interest of the house of Austria was sincerely espoused, and a solicitous care used that the balance of Europe should not be entirely broken; and at the same time England and Holland did not neglect themselves, but made such a distribution as might be least prejudicial to their interest*.

On the last day of March the king imparted to the commons the French king's declaration that he would grant no other security than a renewal of the peace of Ryswick; so that the negotiation seemed to be at an end. He likewise communicated two resolutions of the States-general, with a memorial from their envoy in England, relating to the ships they had equipped with a view to join the English fleet, and the succour stipulated in the treaty concluded in the year 1677, which they desired might be sent over with all convenient expedition. The house having taken this message into consideration, on the second of April unanimously resolved to desire his majesty would carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-general, and take such measures therein as might most conduce to their safety, assuring him they would effectually enable him to support the treaty of 1677.

Though William was by no means pleased with that part of this address, which, by confining him to the treaty, implied their disapprobation of a new confederacy, he received it with his usual unconcern: he thanked them for the assurances they had given him, and said he did not doubt but the readiness they had shewn on this occasion would very much contribute to the procuring such a security as they desired.

On the nineteenth day of April, N. S. the marquis de Torcy delivered to the earl of Manchester, at Paris, a letter written in Latin, from the king of Spain to king William, notifying his accession to that throne, and expressing a desire of cultivating a mutual friendship between the two crowns. This letter was by the king's orders read in the cabinet-council, where there was a short debate about it; but it was never brought to any farther deliberation there; for king William observing, that although the nation were very ready to assist both the Dutch and the emperor to obtain a sufficient barrier against France, yet they did not at all incline to enter into a war for recovering the kingdom of Spain from the duke of Anjou; therefore his majesty thought proper, after he had thoroughly weighed all circumstances, to acknowledge the duke's title to the crown, and congratulate him on his accession, which he accordingly did in a very complaisant answer to his Catholic majesty's letter, dated from Kensington, April 17, 1701, O. S.

The emperor was not a little alarmed at this incident: he loudly exclaimed at being thus abandoned by his allies: nevertheless he was determined to assert his right by force of arms, and had proposed to send prince Eugene with an army into Italy, to take possession of the duchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire. The new pope Clement XI. was attached to the French interest, while the Venetians favoured the emperor; but they refused to declare themselves at this juncture.

In the mean time, the French king laboured hard, by his ambassador count d'Avaux, to persuade the States-general what a cordial kindness he bore them; and several memorials passed between the one and the other: but the Dutch had too dearly experienced the French monarch's pretended love to their republic, to give a ready credence to his professions; and therefore they exerted themselves in providing for their own security, by reinforcing their garrisons, and soliciting succours from foreign potentates. They also wrote a letter to king William, in which they expressed the most sincere zeal for the interest of England, and earnestly pressed that the stipulated number of troops should be immediately sent to their assistance†. Hereupon the three Scottish regiments which

* See Two Letters to a Friend, concerning the Partition-Treaty, republished in the third volume of State Tracts, page 184. Bishop Burnet was supposed to have had a hand in them.

† In this letter we meet with the following lively description of the double dealings and treacherous proceedings of Lewis, at the very time he was professing the most cordial amity for the States: "We will tell you, sir, in what condition France puts itself, and your majesty will judge by that if our fear, which re-animates our demands, be ill founded: France, not contented with having taken possession of all the places in the Netherlands that remained to Spain, has thrown into them, and causes actually every day formidable forces to march thither: they draw a line from the Scheld, near Antwerp, to the Maese: they are going to begin to draw such a line, according to our advices, from Antwerp to Ostend: they send a numerous artillery into the places that are nearest our frontiers: they make, with great diligence, many magazines in Flanders, in Brabant, in Guelderland, and at Namur, which they fill up with all sorts of ammunition for war and subsistence; besides the great stores of forage which they gather from all parts: they

which the king had retained in his own pay, were transported from Scotland, and the king communicated the letter of the States-general to the house of commons, who having taken the same into consideration, came to the following resolution, "That they will effectually assist his majesty to support his allies in maintaining the liberty of Europe; and will immediately provide succours for the States-general, according to the treaty of 1677.

The house of peers, to whom the letter was also communicated, addressed his majesty thereupon in a very warm and affectionate manner, requesting that his majesty would not only perform the articles of any former treaty with the States-general, but that he would enter into a league offensive and defensive with them for their common preservation, and invite into it all the princes and states that were concerned in the visible danger arising from the union of France and Spain. They furthermore exhorted him to enter into such alliances with the emperor as his majesty should think fit, pursuant to the spirit of the treaty of 1689, assuring him of their resolution to assist him in the most effectual manner. They concluded, however, with this stinging reflection (proceeding from that spirit of party which now took possession of every breast) that it was with great grief they humbly represented to his majesty, that the danger to which his kingdom and allies had been exposed, were chiefly owing to the fatal counsels which had prevented his majesty's sooner meeting his people in parliament. His majesty was so well pleased with this disposition in both houses to concur with his views, that he expressed his satisfaction in an answer to each apart.

The commons, in the mean time, resumed the consideration of the partition-treaty, determined to prosecute in the severest manner the advisers of it. They had appointed a committee to examine the Journals of the House of Lords, and to report their proceedings in relation to the treaty of partition. Sir Edward Seymour, a violent Tory, was appointed chairman of this committee; and on his report the house came to a resolution, "That William earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the treaty of partition, which was destructive to the trade of this nation, and dangerous to the peace of Europe, was guilty, and should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours:" and sir John Levison Gower was sent up to impeach the earl at the bar of the house of lords and at the same time to acquaint that house, that the commons would in due time exhibit articles against him. Immediately after which the commons had a conference with the lords, when they desired their lordships to communicate to them what informations they had received of any transactions relating to the negotiations or treaties of partition of the Spanish monarchy: whereupon their lordships delivered to them the two Latin commissions of powers granted to the earls of Portland and Jersey, for negotiating the said treaties, the one dated the first of July, 1699, the other the second of January, 1700; as also a private paper of lord Portland's, in which secretary Vernon advises him to negotiate the first treaty. The house afterwards ordered that Mr. secretary Vernon should lay before them all the letters which had passed between the earl of Portland and him, in relation to those treaties. Vernon at first declined complying with this order, alleging, that this affair containing matters of private import transacted by his majesty, he did not dare reveal the secrets of his royal master without his permission. The commons growing warm upon this, king William thought proper to order Vernon to comply with their demand, and the papers in question were accordingly laid before them.

It must be acknowledged that the conduct of the commons on this occasion is chargeable with the most barefaced partiality. They resolved to screen the earl of Jersey, Sir Joseph Williamson, and Mr. Vernon, who had been as deeply concerned as any others in this transaction, and pointed all their vengeance against the earls of Portland and Orford, and the lords Somers and Halifax (Charles Montagu, late chancellor of the Exchequer): nay, some of the members had even the mean wickedness to tamper with Kidd, who was then a prisoner in Newgate for his piratical practices, in order to persuade him, through the hopes of pardon, to accuse lord Somers as having been concerned with him in his enterprize. Kidd, however, as weak and as bad a man as he was, could never be prevailed upon to charge any of the noble persons who were his owners, with having any thing to do with his proceedings. The other party, therefore, finding him unfit for their purpose, left him to the course of the law, and he with some of his crew were hanged.

In the mean time, the lord Somers understanding that the commons were in debate about impeaching him for having advised the treaty of partition, his lordship desired to be heard before that house, previous to their coming to any resolution in regard to him. The commons thought proper to grant his request, and on the fourteenth of April his lordship was admitted and heard in his defence, when he delivered the copies of two letters to the house; the first of which he received from the king while in Holland (in 1698) desiring his advice in the first treaty of partition; and the other was his lordship's answer to it, in which he objected to several particulars in that treaty, and proposed other articles, which he thought were for the interest of his country. He then observed, in his own vindication, that when the treaty was concluded, he conceived himself bound to put the great-seal to it, by his majesty's command, in which he had, as chancellor, executed his office according to his duty; and by his letter he had, as a privy-counsellor, offered such advice as to him appeared best. His lordship then withdrawing, the house fell into a long and warm debate upon the justification he had offered: at length, however, the Tory party prevailed, and a resolution passed, "That John lord Somers, by advising his majesty to conclude the treaty of partition, whereby large they build forts under the cannon of our place. Besides, they have worked, and work still, continually to draw the princes that are our friends from our interest, to make them enter into their alliance, or to engage them to a neutrality at least. In territories of the Spanish monarchy were to be delivered up to France, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour *. The house next ordered sir Simon Harcourt to go up to the lords and impeach him. Immediately after, they passed votes to the like effect against Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax, and the general impeachment was brought up next day (April 15) against all three to the house of lords.

Not content with these proofs of their hatred and dislike to these lords, and perhaps apprehensive that they should not be able to make out the charge against them, the commons resolved to go a speedier way to work; and by a proceeding altogether unprecedented, they, some few days after the impeachment, drew up an address to his majesty, which was presented on the twenty-third of April; wherein, after representing the great satisfaction they had to observe, in their enquiry concerning the treaty of partition, the great care his majesty had taken in not entering into that negotiation without the advice of his English counsellors; and finding that John lord Somers, on whose judgment his majesty chiefly relied in that important affair, did, in concert with Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax, advise his majesty to enter into that treaty of such dangerous consequence, without the advice of his council: "That they might no longer be able to deceive his majesty, and abuse his people, they requested he would be pleased to remove the said John lord Somers, Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax, from his council and presence for ever; as also William earl of Portland, who transacted those treaties: and concluded with repeating their assurances to stand and support his majesty to the utmost of their power †."

An address of this nature, after an impeachment formally preferred, was not only against all precedents in parliamentary proceedings, but even contrary to the common laws of society, inasmuch as it was punishing before trial. His majesty seems to have seen it in its proper light; for he returned the following soft and evasive answer; "That he would employ none in his service, but such as should be thought most likely to improve the mutual trust between him and his parliament, which was so necessary in that conjuncture, both for their own security, and the defence and preservation of their allies."

The lords were greatly incensed at this step of the commons, which they considered as an insult upon their tribunal, and a violation of common justice: and although they had themselves said very harsh things of the treaty of partition, and the manner of transacting it, in their address; yet they now thought it necessary to present a counter-address to that of the commons, wherein they beseech his majesty not to pass any censure on those lords, until they were tried upon the impeachment the commons had preferred against them.

In fine, that I may not weary my readers with a minute detail of this affair, which lasted for near three months, and the particulars of which may be seen in the State Tracts, the Debates of Parliament, and other publications of those times, I shall content myself with observing, that the commons, fearing that they might fall into disgrace with the nation, for having preferred impeachments which they could not properly support, used every art to delay the trials of the four lords. With this view, they endeavoured to excite a quarrel between the two houses, by laying claim to a number of unusual privileges, which they were certain the upper house would not allow, and by affecting to cavil at an expression of lord Haversham at one of their conferences: this circumstance they laid hold of as a pretext for absenting from the trial, when a day was at last appointed; so that the four lords having no prosecutors to appear against them, were acquitted, and the impeachments dismissed on the twenty-fourth day of June; and at the same time the lords discharged an impeachment which had been lodged against the duke of Leeds some years before by the commons, which they had not prosecuted.

While these matters were upon the carpet, the Whig party omitted no endeavours to vilify and depreciate their adversaries in the minds of the people: they openly charged them with being pensioners to the French king, whose interest they espoused on all occasions: they represented them as implacable enemies to the present government; and that all their views and actions tended ultimately to the restoration of the abdicated king and his family. They even went so far as to try to procure petitions from the city of London, and several of the principal counties in England, to express their dissatisfaction at the proceedings of the house of commons and the present ministry; by which they hoped to have procured a revolution in behalf of their own party. Their endeavours in this respect, however, failed in general: the county of Kent alone could be prevailed on to send up an address, or petition, as it was styled, which being a very extraordinary one in its kind, I shall here insert a copy.

"We the gentlemen, justices of the peace, grand jury, and other freeholders, at the general quarter-sessions of peace at Maidstone in Kent, deeply concerned at the dangerous estate of this kingdom, and of all Europe; and considering that the fate of us and our posterity depends upon the wisdom of our representatives in parliament, think ourselves bound in duty humbly to lay before this honourable house the consequences in this conjuncture, of your speedy resolution and most sincere endeavour to answer the great trust reposed in you by your country.

"And in regard that from the experience of all ages, it is manifest that no nation can be great or happy without union, we hope that no pretence whatever shall be able to create a misunderstanding among ourselves, or the least distrust of his most sacred majesty, whose great actions for this nation are writ in the hearts of his subjects, and can never, without the blackest ingratitude, be forgot.

"We most humbly implore this honourable house to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and safety may be effectually provided for; that your loyal addresses may be turned into bills of supply; and that his most sacred majesty (whose propitious and unblemished reign over us we pray God long to continue) may be enabled powerfully to assist his allies before it is too late."

This petition, which it must be confessed was a most indecent reflection upon the house of commons, was signed by the deputy-lieutenants of the county, several justices of the peace, all the grand-jury, and other freeholders, and was boldly delivered to the house of commons on the eighth of May, by David Polhill, William Colepepper, Thomas Colepepper, Justinian Champney, and William Hamilton, esquires. Upon being called in, and questioned at the bar of the house, they owned the petition, and their hands to it: after which they were ordered to withdraw; and the house taking the petition into consideration, voted it to be a scandalous, insolent, and seditious libel, tending to destroy the constitution of parliaments, and to subvert the established government of these realms; and ordered the five persons who had presented it to be taken into custody, as promoters of the said petition*.

Loud were the outcries raised by the Whigs at this tyrannical exertion of power, as they called it, in the commons; and the imprisoned gentlemen were visited in their confinement by all the leading men of that party, who affected to treat them as martyrs to the liberties and privileges of the people; though, as Dr. Drake very justly observes, in his History of this Parliament, the commons would have been wanting in their duty to the people, whose representatives they are, if they had tamely put up with such an insult upon their authority, without shewing their resentment, and thereby deterring others from following an example of so dangerous consequence.

The confinement of the presenters, however, added fuel to the flame which had been blown up among the people; and soon after a paper came out, supposed to have been drawn up by one Daniel de Foe, a scurrilous party-writer of those times, entitled, A Memorial from the Gentlemen, Freeholders, and Inhabitants of the Counties of — in Behalf of themselves, and many thousands of the good People of England. It was signed, Legion; and sent with a letter to the speaker, commanding him, in the name of two hundred thousand Englishmen, to deliver it to the house of commons. The letter and the memorial are both of them too extraordinary for us to withhold from the reader: the former was conceived in the following terms:

Mr. Speaker,

"The inclosed memorial you are charged with, in behalf of many thousands of the good people of England.

"There is neither popish, Jacobite, seditious, court or party interest in it, but honesty and truth.

"You are commanded by two hundred thousand Englishmen to deliver it to the h— of c—; and to inform them it is no banter, but serious truth, and a serious regard to it is expected: nothing but justice and their duty is required; and it is required by them who have both a right to require, and power to compel, viz. the people of England.

"We could have come to the house strong enough to oblige them to hear us, but we have avoided any tumult, not desiring to embroil, but to save our native country.

"If you refuse to communicate it to them, you will find cause in a short time to repent it."

To R—t H—y, esq; f—r to the h— of c—s.

The memorial was in substance as follows. It began with this maxim, "That whatever power is above law, is burthensome and tyrannical, and may be reduced by extrajudicial methods." It charged the commons with breach of faith, in not paying the public debts contracted on the security of their acts: with imprisoning gentlemen who were none of their members, and who, at the command of the people (whose servants the commons were) came to put them in mind of their duty, declaring that it was the undoubted right of the people of England, in case their representatives in parliament did not proceed according to their duty and the people's interest, to inform them of their dislike, disown their actions, and direct them as they thought fit: it particularly censured the commons for voting the partition-treaty fatal to Europe because it gave too great a part of the Spanish dominions to the French; and yet taking no steps to prevent their possessing the whole, &c. &c. It likewise contained a new clause of rights, digested under seven heads; and the commons were admonished to act according to their duty, as specified in this memorial, on pain of incurring the resentment of an injured nation. This strange expostulation concluded thus; "For Englishmen are no more to be slaves to parliaments than to kings: our name is LEGION, and we are many†."

On the twelfth day of June his majesty came to the house, and gave the royal assent to the act of succession, intitled, An act for the farther Limitation of the Crown, and better securing the Rights and Liberties of the Subject; and to some other acts‡. On this occasion his majesty made a speech, wherein he expressed his warm acknowledgements to both houses, for the care they had taken to establish the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and for their repeated assurances of supporting him in such alliances as should be for the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and the security of England and Holland; and putting them in mind that the season of the year required his presence abroad, recommended dispatch in the business before them.

The commons, though exceedingly provoked by the remonstrance lately presented them, thought it beneath their dignity to take notice of it in the house; but in order to guard against consequences, they drew up an address to his majesty, representing, That several disaffected and evil-minded persons having gone about to raise tumults in several parts of the kingdom to disturb the public tranquillity, they therefore humbly besought his majesty to provide for the public peace and security. They appear however to have been not a little intimidated by the spirit of this remonstrance; for they almost instantly altered their measures. In their former address they had restricted the king to the alliance concluded with the States general in 1677, which would have been of very little use in the present emergency; but now they presented an address in answer to his speech, wherein they thanked him for having approved of their proceedings; declared they would support him to the utmost; and desired him to engage in such new alliances with the emperor and other states as he should deem necessary for bridling the exorbitant power of France, and maintaining the independency of Europe. They likewise proceeded in earnest upon the business of supplies; they granted the sum of a million and a half for the public expences, to be raised by a land tax, certain duties upon merchandize, and a weekly deduction from the excise, so as to bring down the civil list to six hundred thousand pounds, as the duke of Gloucester was dead, and James's queen had refused her allowance. They voted thirty thousand seamen, and resolved that ten thousand troops should be sent to the assistance of the States-general. They likewise passed a bill for taking away all privilege of parliament in legal prosecutions during the intermediate prorogations; and they introduced another for appointing commissioners to examine and state the public accounts*.

By this time, however, the misunderstanding between the two houses was become so great, on occasion of the impeachment of the four lords, and the liberty the peers took of making amendments to some public bills, by which the commons had thrown the management of the greatest part of the national affairs into the hands of the Tories, that the king, fearing some fatal consequences from their disputes, in which however he had never interfered, resolved to put an end to the session. For this purpose he came to the house on the twenty-fourth of June, the very day the lords had ordered the impeachments abovementioned to be dismissed; and having sent for the commons, they attended accordingly, when their speaker, on presenting the money-bills, made the following speech:

"Sir, It is with great joy and satisfaction that I attend your majesty at this time, since your commons have complied with all your majesty was pleased to desire at their meeting: they have passed the bill of succession, which has settled the crown in a protestant line, and continued the liberty of England, which your majesty hath settled and preserved: they have passed a bill for taking away those privileges which might have proved burthenome and oppressive to your subjects: they have given your majesty those supplies, which are more than ever were given in a time of peace, to enable your majesty, when you are abroad, to support your allies, procure either a lasting peace, or to preserve the liberties of Europe by a necessary war."

Then his majesty gave the royal assent to the several acts to be found in the notes†; and afterwards made a speech, wherein he returned both houses his hearty thanks for the great zeal they had expressed for the public service, and their ready compliance with what he recommended to them at the opening of the parliament; and particularly thanked the commons for the supplies, and for the encouragement they had given him to enter into alliances for the preservation of Europe‡.

The king now seemed to have wholly abandoned the Whigs, and given himself up to the Tory party; at least so much may be gathered, from the promotions he made soon after the breaking up of the parliament: for he bestowed the command of the ten thousand auxiliaries voted by the commons for the service of the States-general, on the earl of Marlborough, universally esteemed the chief of the Tory party, with the title of commander in chief of his majesty's forces in Holland. A new commission of admiralty was made out, at the head of which was placed the earl of Pembroke. The command of the fleet was bestowed upon sir George Rooke; and his majesty having declared his design of going to Holland, he was pleased to appoint the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-keeper (sir Nathan Wright) the earl of Pembroke, the dukes of Devonshire and Somerset, the earl of Jersey, and lord Godolphin, lords justices during his absence: and at the same time the earl of Marlborough was appointed (over and above his post of commander in chief) his majesty's ambassador-extraordinary and plenipotentiary for the negotiations at the Hague: Edward Southwell, Christopher Musgrave, and James Vernon, esqrs. were constituted commissioners of the privy-seal, vacant by the death of Ford Grey, earl of Tankerville; sir Thomas Trevor, attorney-general, was made lord chief-justice of the Common-pleas, in the room of sir George Treby, deceased; and Edward Northy, esq. was made attorney-general. All or most of these gentlemen were Tories.

King William having settled the regency, and other matters relating to domestic government, embarked for Holland, July 1st. On his arrival at the Hague he assisted at an assembly of the States-general, whom he addressed in a very affectionate speech, wherein he said, "He always came into that country with joy, but especially in this dangerous conjuncture, because he foresaw his presence would be necessary for the service of the state. He hoped to have passed the rest of his days in repose and peace, and to have left that state in a flourishing condition; but there had happened such great alterations in the affairs of Europe, that he knew not what might be the consequences. However, he could assure their High Mightinesses, that whether things were accommodated amicably, or whether they should be obliged to have recourse to arms, he persisted in the same zeal he ever had for their service and prosperity. He could assure them the whole English nation were ready to assist the States, and strongly to contribute towards their defence, and to whatever might tend to the common security *."

The States in their answer, which was equally affectionate, told his majesty, "That they could not omit to thank him for his assurances, not only in his own, but in the name of the English nation, in favour of themselves and the common cause, well knowing how much they might rely upon a people, whose courage had gained so much reputation in the world, and were always of opinion that their interests were inseparable from those of England †."

After this the king, as his health would permit him, which indeed seemed to decline apace, spent a good part of his time in reviewing the frontier garrisons of the States, and gave such orders as he judged necessary for the better defence and security of the country. On his return to the Hague, he found that the count d'Avaux, the French ambassador, had delivered a letter from the French king to the States, accompanied with a memorial of his own, to notify his being called home by his master. In the memorial there were several strokes, very much reflecting upon king William, and that shewed the malignity of Lewis' heart, who no doubt was well apprized of the contents of his minister's paper: particularly, the ambassador said, "That he should abuse his master, should he write to him that any success was to be expected from the conferences: that his master had too discerning a judgment, after the king of Great Britain had, by his envoy, openly declared that he would never depart from the interest of the emperor: that he would not listen to any proposals of accommodation till satisfaction were given to that prince. His excellency then observed, that the ties between their High Mightinesses and the king of England were too strict, and they had too well made known their blind submission to the sentiments of that monarch; and no doubt but that they had already taken a resolution to make the same declaration to the most Christian king's ambassador ‡."

To this memorial the States-general returned a very spirited answer on the first of August; in one part of which they express themselves to this effect: "They could not comprehend, they said, why the effect of the union between them and the king of Great Britain should be rather war than peace, since his Britannic majesty on all occasions had given sufficient proofs of his inclination to peace: that they did not blindly follow the king of Great Britain's sentiments, but had great deference for his advice; although they acknowledged themselves to be strictly united to him by alliances many years ago, for their mutual security: that he was one of the chief parties in the treaty of partition; and that they had declared, previous to their having entered upon these negotiations, that they thought his consent necessary, as well for those reasons as for his private relation to the republic §."

Thus all the pretensions of the French to give the States a reasonable security went off with the count d'Avaux, and every thing seemed to tend towards a new war between France and Holland; the latter exerted their utmost endeavours in making preparations for their own defence: they repaired their fortifications, augmented their army, and hired auxiliaries from various quarters. An alliance had been already formed || between king William and the king of Denmark; which latter engaged to furnish three thousand horse, one thousand dragoons, and eight thousand foot, in consideration of receiving a subsidy of three hundred thousand crowns a-year during the war. Great endeavours were also used to bring about a peace between Sweden and Poland, but without effect. Lewis XIV. had also interposed his mediation between these powers, with a view of securing the young king of Sweden in his interests; and the court of Vienna had solicited the assistance of the king of Poland, but the dyet of that kingdom being suspended, and king Augustus consequently delivered from its intrigues, he resolved to persist in the prosecution of the war.

We have already observed that the emperor, as being the person more immediately affected by the accession of the duke of Anjou to the crown of Spain, had resolved to do himself justice by force of arms: with that view he assembled an army, the command of which he bestowed on prince Eugene. As this general will make so distinguished a figure in the subsequent part of this history, the following account of him, as given us by M. de Voltaire in his Age of Lewis XIV. cannot fail to be acceptable.

"The first general who put a check to the superiority of the French arms was a Frenchman; for so we should call prince Eugene, though he was the grandson of Charles Emanuel duke of Savoy: his father the count de Soissons had settled in France, where he was lieutenant-general of the king's armies, and governor of Champagne: he married Olympia Mancini, one of the nieces of cardinal Mazarine. From this match, unfortunate in other respects, was born this prince, who afterwards proved so dangerous an enemy to Lewis XIV. though hardly known to that monarch in his youth. He was known in France by the name of the Chevalier de Carignan; but afterwards taking the Petit Collet, he was called the abbot of Savoy. It is said that he asked Lewis for a regiment, which was refused him, on account of his being too much connected with the princes of Conti, who were then

* It is somewhat difficult to reconcile this declaration of king William, with regard to the disposition of the English, with the representation Dr. Burnet gives of the English ministry and parliament at this time, in his second volume; wherein he peremptorily charges them with being Jacobites, and pensioners to France: but indeed that prelate is so contradictory to him-in disgrace for having written some indecent letters, reflecting upon the king and madame de Maintenon. Disappointed in this application, he went to serve the emperor against the Turks in Hungary in 1684, together with the princes of Conti. The campaign being ended, Lewis sent an order to these princes, and all who had accompanied them in this expedition, to return home. The abbot of Savoy was the only one who refused to comply with this mandate, openly declaring he renounced France for ever. When Lewis XIV. was told of this, he said to his courtiers with an air of contempt, "Don't you think I have had a great loss?" This prince, however, who was held in so much contempt at the court of France, was born with all the qualifications which form the hero in war, and the great man in peace: he had a just and lofty turn of thinking, and a becoming presence of mind both in the field and in the cabinet: he was guilty of faults, as all generals have been; but these were lost in the number of his great actions. He shook the power of Lewis XIV. and the Ottoman Porte: he governed the empire; and in the course of his victories and ministry, shewed himself equally superior to vain-glory and avarice. He cherished, and even protected learning, as much as could be done at the court of Vienna."

At this time he was about thirty-seven years of age, and had the experience of his own victories over the Turks, and the faults which he had seen committed by the Imperialists in the late wars, in which he served against France. He entered Italy at the head of the imperial army, consisting of thirty thousand men, in the month of July, by the way of Vicenza, in the territories of Venice, the entrance towards Verona being blocked up by the French army under marshal Catinat, having made a feint of passing the Po near Ferrara: and having thus amused the French, he passed the Adige near Carpi, where he surprized and cut in pieces a body of five thousand French, commanded by M. St. Fremont. After this success the Imperialists having the command of all the country between the Adige and the Adda, penetrated into the territory of Bresciano, while Catinat and the duke of Savoy retreated behind the Oglio. This retreat was approved of by many good officers: but Catinat's enemies represented it so much to his disadvantage at the court of France, that marshal Villeroy was sent over about the latter end of August, to supersede Catinat in his command, and with orders to attack the Imperialists at all events. The duke of Savoy still preserved the title of generalissimo; but Villeroy was in fact commander in chief. He accordingly gave immediate orders for attacking prince Eugene in the post of Chiari, near the Oglio. The duke of Savoy and most of the general officers were of opinion, that it was against all the rules of war to attack this post, for these very essential reasons; first, That it would answer no valuable end; secondly, That the entrenchments were inaccessible; and lastly, If they failed, the reputation of the whole campaign would be lost. Villeroy however told the duke of Savoy that he must march, and sent an aid de camp to order marshal Catinat in his name to begin the attack: upon which that general marched directly up to the entrenchments.

Prince Eugene however gave the French such a reception, that they were obliged to retire with the loss of five thousand men. Towards the end of the campaign, the prince took possession of all the Mantuan territories, except Mantua itself and Goits, which he blocked up. He reduced all the places on the Oglio, and continued in the field during the whole winter of 1701, where he gave daily proofs of the most intrepid courage, indefatigable vigilance, and consummate prudence.

In the month of January following he formed a design of surprizing Cremona; an attempt which, had it succeeded, would have been a decisive blow in favour of the Imperialists. He found means, by the assistance of a priest called Bozzoli, provost of St. Mary le Nova, to introduce four hundred men through the common sewer of the town into this priest's house. They immediately killed the guard at the two gates, which were flung open, and prince Eugene entered the city with four thousand men. All this was done before the governor, who was a Spaniard, had the least suspicion: the whole affair was conducted with the greatest secrecy, order, and diligence. The Spanish governor, on the first alarm, appeared in the street with a few soldiers, but was presently shot dead; and all the general officers were either killed or made prisoners. Marshal Villeroy, who was at that time in Cremona, was awakened with the noise of the firing, and ran out into the streets, when he was immediately made prisoner, and led out of the town without knowing any thing that had passed, and unable to conceive the cause of so extraordinary an event: in short, the place must have been infallibly reduced, had prince Eugene been supported by another body of troops which he had ordered to advance from the Parmesan to secure the bridge: but these not arriving in time, an Irish regiment in the French service took possession of the bridge, and the prince was obliged to retire with his prisoners, including marshal Villeroy, and several other persons of distinction. This enterprize, tho' unsuccessful, added great lustre to the military fame of prince Eugene*.

Lewis XIV. alarmed at the progress of the Imperialists, sent the duke of Vendôme to command his forces in Italy. He likewise pressed the duke of Savoy to assist him with a body of auxiliary troops; but that prince having obtained all he could from France, became very indifferent to her interests: it is said that he was greatly disgusted with that court for having sent over Villeroy to take the command, who had behaved with insupportable arrogance towards the duke. Philip V. the new king of Spain, had lately been married to the duke's daughter, whom he went to meet at Barcelona, where he found himself involved in a very troublesome dispute with the states of Catalonia, who refused to pay a tax he had imposed, until he should confirm their privileges; a concession which he was obliged to make, after a long and violent contest.

A misunderstanding arising about this time between the estates of Cologne and prince Clement of Bavaria, their elector, the French king laid hold of this opportunity to strengthen his interest on the Rhine, and for that purpose laboured hard to engage that prince in his cause; and he so far prevailed by his artful negotiations, and heightening some apprehensions the elector had, that the Estates might be too powerful for him, that when king William sent the earl of Galway to endeavour to bring him over to the interest of England, Holland, and the empire, he appeared wholly engaged to France; which afterwards was more apparent, by his admitting French troops into several places, and committing some violences upon the constitution of his electorate. Lewis also found means to form such a strong party in the Portuguese councils, that his most Faithful majesty, though personally attached to the Austrian family, was obliged to agree to a treaty of alliance with the French monarch.

Every thing now tending to a war, our fleet became his majesty's chief care, which he resolved should be much superior to that of the enemy, being very sensible of the ill consequences that followed the want of this salutary precaution at the beginning of the last war. By the latter end of July we had a fleet of forty-eight ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, and small vessels, ready for sea at Spithead, under the command of sir George Rooke, who sailing from thence overawed the French coast during the remainder of the season. About the latter end of August vice-admiral Benbow was detached with a strong squadron to the West Indies: the French expected that this fleet would have proceeded to the Mediterranean; and in order to confirm them in this belief, and cover its true destination, king William made a formal demand of the court of Spain of the free use of their harbours, which however was civilly evaded, though the French ships had free admittance. After the sending of the fleet to sea, his majesty thought proper to revoke his letters-patent to the commissioners of the admiralty, and to appoint the earl of Pembroke, a nobleman universally beloved and esteemed, lord high-admiral of England. The design of this promotion was to be rid of the disadvantages attending a board, and this end it answered perfectly well; for his lordship immediately sent away captain Edward Loades to Cadiz, to bring home the sea-stores and the merchants effects before the war broke out; which piece of service was successfully performed.

The Whig party made a violent outcry, because our grand fleet did not perform any thing of consequence this summer; and severe censures were passed upon sir George Rooke, as if he had purposely continued idle: but the ill-nature and falsity of these censures will sufficiently appear, when we consider that this was a fleet of amusement only, the war not being declared; and therefore the longer sir George could keep the French and their allies in suspense, the greater service he did; but how often do we find parties making use of any thing that will serve a turn, without considering or caring whether it is founded either on justice or truth!

King William being well apprized of all the proceedings of Lewis, exerted himself with uncommon diligence, in order to render his schemes abortive. With this view he projected the grand alliance between the emperor Leopold, England, and Holland, against France, for recovering the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria, and for the security of England and Holland in point of their commerce and navigation, and of the Hanover succession to the crown of Great Britain, as well as for a safe barrier to the Dutch. This treaty, which was concluded at the Hague, September 7, O. S. was framed in the nature of proposals, upon which France might come in; and accordingly the same was communicated to the Spanish ambassador; and on their being rejected, it was determined to have recourse to arms. For the particular articles of this treaty, the reader is referred to the notes*.

Thus were the French and the confederates upon the point of entering into the war, which seemed only to be deferred till each side could prepare for action; and possibly it might not have been declared till the next summer, if an accident had not happened which brought things to a crisis somewhat sooner: this was the death of that weak and unfortunate prince James II. who being seized with a vomiting of blood, departed this life at St. Germain's on the sixteenth of September, N. S. 1701, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and of his exile the thirteenth. His character has already been touched upon at the end of his unhappy reign. Since the miscarriage of his last attempt for recovering his throne, he had laid aside all

* 1. There shall be a perpetual and inviolable friendship between the emperor, the king of Great Britain, and the States-general.

2. The allies think nothing more effectual for establishing the general peace, than the procuring satisfaction to the emperor in the Spanish succession, and sufficient security for the dominions and commerce of the allies.

3. The allies shall employ two months time, from the day of exchanging the ratifications, to obtain by amicable means the said satisfaction and security.

4. But if that cannot be obtained within the time limited, they engage to assist one the other with all their forces, according to the specification to be agreed on in a particular convention.

5. The other confederates shall, among the other things, endeavour to recover the Spanish Netherlands, to be a barrier between Holland and France; as likewise the duchy of Milan, &c. for the emperor's security; and also the kingdoms of Naples, and the lands and islands upon the coast of Tuscany, belonging to the Spanish dominions.

6. The king of Great-Britain and the States may seize what lands and cities they can belonging to the Spaniards in the Indies, and keep them.

7. In a war, the confederates shall faithfully communicate their designs to one another.

8. No parties shall treat of peace, truce, &c. but jointly with the rest; they shall prevent the union of France and Spain under the same government, or the French possessing the Spanish Indies. The subjects of the king of Great Britain and the States shall enjoy all the privileges of trade which they had before the death of the late king of Spain.

9. At the making of peace, the confederates shall provide for the maintaining the trade of the English and the Dutch to the dominions taken from the Spaniards, and likewise secure the States by a barrier.

10. They shall at the same time agree about the exercise of religion in the places acquired.

11. They shall assist one another with all their forces, if the French king or any one else shall invade any one on account of this alliance.

12. After a peace there shall remain a defensive alliance between these allies for maintaining the said peace.

13. All kings, princes, and states, that please, may enter into this alliance; but the empire shall be particularly invited, and the confederates may jointly or separately invite whom they please.

thoughts of worldly affairs, and devoted his whole attention to the concerns of his soul. The jesuit Le Bretonneau, who attended him in his last moments, relates, that he did not only forgive all his enemies, but said, "He thought himself more obliged to the prince of Orange than to all the world; because by taking from him three crowns, that prince had put him in a way to purchase one infinitely more precious than all." His corpse was carried to Paris, and reposed in the church of the Benedictines, in the suburbs of St. James, where it now lies, not interred, but in a hearse; together with the body of his daughter, who died before him; in the fond hopes, perhaps, that some convenient time may offer for the transporting it to England, in order to its being interred in Westminster-abbey among his royal ancestors and relations: an event which, to the unspeakable happiness of this country, appears very unlikely to happen.

Immediately after his death, a question was started in the French council, what steps should be taken with regard to his son? Lewis was inclined to give him the titles his father had borne; but the ministry advised their master to remain passive, and allow him to assume what title he pleased. They enforced their advice with such arguments of sound policy, that Lewis resolved not to acknowledge the son of James II. as king. The same day, however, Mary of Modena, widow to the deceased James, went to Madam de Maintenon's apartments to speak to the French king. She found him there; and with a flood of tears conjured him not to treat her son, herself, and the memory of a king he had protected, with so much indignity as to refuse a title, the only remains of their former greatness. She observed, that as her son had always received the honours of prince of Wales, he ought to be treated as king after the death of his father; and that even William himself could not complain of this, provided he was left to enjoy the throne of which he had deprived him. To these arguments she added others which concerned the interest and glory of Lewis: she represented to him, that whether he acknowledged the son of James II. or not, the English would nevertheless declare war against France, and that he would only feel the regret of having sacrificed the most noble sentiments to a fruitless precaution. The representations and tears of the royal widow were powerfully seconded by Madam de Maintenon. The king resumed his former sentiments. In a word, the pretended prince of Wales was proclaimed king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the name of James III. the very day it had been determined in council not to acknowledge him. M. de Voltaire, from whom we have taken this remarkable anecdote*, says, That the marquis de Torcy frequently owned it, though he has not inserted it in his Memoirs, because he thought it was not to the honour of his master to be prevailed on by two women to alter a resolution which he had taken in his council. The pretender's title was likewise recognized by the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the pope.

William was no sooner informed of this transaction, than he dispatched a courier to the king of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Ryswick, to complain of this manifest violation of that treaty. At the same time, he recalled his ambassador, the earl of Manchester, from Paris, with orders to return without taking leave; and monsieur Pouffin, the French resident in England, was ordered to depart the kingdom. This action of Lewis, in acknowledging as their king a person whom they had banished, appeared a violent insult offered to the nation, and an attempt towards exercising an absolute authority over Europe. The spirit of freedom which then prevailed among us, and which was not a little increased by the hatred the people bore to Lewis, on account of his ambition and power, produced every effect that king William could desire: the city of London, and most of the counties of England, transmitted addresses to his majesty in Holland, declaring their sense of the indignity offered him, and promising to support his government against the Pretender and all his enemies. Lewis endeavoured to vindicate his own conduct in a long manifesto, which he dispersed throughout Europe; in which he pretended to assert, that there was nothing in what he had done contrary to the treaty of Ryswick, which he explained by saying, he did not intend to assist the pretender (king James III. as he styled him) in recovering his crown during the life-time of his present majesty king William. Lewis also prevailed on the pope to press the emperor, and other Roman catholic princes, to acknowledge the pretended king, but without effect.

Our king having concluded alliances with several foreign princes against France, particularly that with the emperor and Holland, usually styled the Grand Alliance, of which we have already given an account, began to prepare for his return to England; but being detained in Holland, partly by his ill state of health, and partly in concerting measures with the States to attack the French frontiers the next campaign, he did not arrive in his British dominions till the fifth of November, when the first thing that engaged the attention of his majesty and his council was, whether the present parliament should be continued or dissolved, and a new one called? It was, after some debate, carried for the latter measure; and on the eleventh the king issued a proclamation for dissolving the parliament, and calling another to meet on the thirtieth of December. The reason alleged for the dissolution of this parliament was, that his majesty might have the sense of the nation in this extraordinary conjuncture: but it is more than probable that the chief inducement to this step was to prevent a revival of the heats and animosities between the two houses, whereby the supplies necessary for the approaching war might have been delayed.

Never did the two parties proceed with such zeal and activity in influencing the elections: the Whigs, however, on this occasion gained an incontestable majority. The city of London, and some other places, gave their representatives instructions for their conduct in the ensuing session; in which they pressed them to assist his majesty vigorously in maintaining his title to the crown, to make good his alliances, and reduce the power of France, recommending above all things a union between the two houses.

Notwithstanding the returns being generally made in favour of the Whig interest, when the parliament met on the thirtieth of December, the choice of speaker fell upon Harley, who was deemed the principal leader of the former opposition, and who was set up against sir Thomas Lyttleton, recommended by the court.

On the last day of the year 1701, king William made a speech to his new parliament; in the framing of which he was supposed to have been assisted by the lord Somers, and which was so acceptable to the well-wishers of the Revolution, and their friends abroad, that it was printed with decorations in English, Dutch, and French, and hung up in frames in almost every house in England and Holland. As this was the last speech king William ever made in parliament, and might have passed for a model of future speeches, I shall, after the example of almost every other historian of those times, insert it at full length.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I promise myself you are met together, full of that just sense of the common danger of Europe, and the resentment of the late proceedings of the French king, which has been so fully and universally expressed in the loyal and seasonable addresses of my people.

"The owning and setting up the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, is not only the highest indignity offered to me and the nation, but does so nearly concern every man who has a regard for the protestant religion, or the present and future quiet and happiness of his country, that I need not press you to lay it seriously to heart, and to consider what further effectual means may be used for securing the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and extinguishing the hopes of all pretenders, and their open and secret abettors.

"By the French king's placing his grandson on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppress the rest of Europe, unless speedy and effectual measures be taken. Under this pretence he is become the real master of the whole Spanish monarchy: he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and disposes of it as his own dominions; and by that means he has surrounded his neighbours in such a manner, that though the name of peace may be said to continue, yet they are put to the expence and inconveniencies of war.

"This must affect England in the nearest and most sensible manner, in respect to our trade, which will soon become precarious in all the variable branches of it; in respect to our peace and safety at home, which we cannot hope should long continue; and in respect to that part which England ought to take in the preservation of Europe.

"In order to obviate the general calamity with which the rest of Christendom is threatened by this exorbitant power of France, I have concluded several alliances, according to the encouragement given me by both houses of parliament, which I will direct shall be laid before you, and which I doubt not you will enable me to make good.

"There are some other treaties still depending, that shall be likewise communicated to you as soon as they are perfected.

"It is fit I should tell you the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament: all matters are at a stand till your resolutions are known, and therefore no time ought to be lost.

"You have yet an opportunity, by God's blessing, to secure to you and your posterity the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourselves, but will exert the ancient vigour of the English nation: but I tell you plainly, my opinion is, if you don't lay hold on this occasion, you have no reason to hope for another.

"In order to do your part, it will be necessary to have a great navy, and to provide for the security of our ships in harbour; and also that there be such a force at land as is expected in proportion to the forces of our allies.

Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I do recommend these matters to you with that concern and earnestness which their importance requires: at the same time, I cannot but press you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preserved but by keeping sacred that maxim, that they shall never be losers that trust to a parliamentary security.

"It is always with regret when I do ask aids of my people; but you will observe, that I desire nothing which relates to any personal expence of mine: I am only pressing you to do all you can for your own safety and honour, at so critical and dangerous a time; and am willing, that what is given should be wholly appropriated to the purposes for which it is intended.

And since I am speaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind, that during the late war I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before you, and also gave my assent to several bills for stating and examining the public accounts, that the subjects might have the satisfaction to know how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matter may be put in any other way or examination, that it may appear whether any misapplications and mismanagements, or whether the debt that remains upon us has really arisen from the shortness of supplies, or the deficiency of the funds.

"I have already told you how necessary dispatch will be for carrying on that great public business whereon our safety, and all that is valuable to us, depends. I hope what time can be spared will be employed about those other very desirable things which I have recommended from the throne; I mean the forming some good bills for employing the poor, for encouraging trade, and the suppression of vice.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of disputes and differences, and resolved to act with a general and hearty consent for promoting the common cause, which alone can make this a happy session.

"I should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if I could observe you as much inclined to lay aside those unhappy fatal animosities which divide and weaken you, as I am disposed to make make all my subjects safe and easy as to any, even the highest offences committed against me.

"Let me conjure you to disappoint the only hopes of your enemies, by your unanimity. I have shewn, and will always shew, how desirous I am to be the common father of all my people: do you in like manner lay aside parties and divisions: let there be no other distinction heard amongst us for the future, but of those who are for the protestant religion and the present establishment, and of those who wish for a popish prince and a French government.

"I will only add this, if you do in good earnest desire to see England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the protestant interest, it will appear by your right improving the present opportunity."

In answer to this excellent and patriotic speech, the two houses presented separate addresses to his majesty, but agreed in returning him thanks for his speech, and in their resolutions to maintain and support his title and the protestant succession, and to enable him to make good all his alliances for the preservation of the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France*: which addresses were graciously received by the king, with assurances of the great satisfaction he conceived of their duty and affection. In a word, every thing was carried on to the high satisfaction of the nation in general. Care was taken to expedite forces by sea and land, forty thousand men being appointed for the naval service, and as many to make up the complement, already in good forwardness, by land; and the commons, in order to raise his majesty a present sum of money for those purposes, resolved, that whoever should advance or lend the sum of 600,000 pounds for the service of the fleet, and fifty thousand pounds for the present subsistence of the land-forces, should be repaid with interest at six per cent. out of the first aids.

His majesty was pleased, on the fourth of January 1702, to constitute the earl of Manchester principal secretary of state; and on the eighteenth the duke of Somerset was made president of the council, in the room of the earl of Pembroke, now lord high-admiral of England.

Both houses now seemed to vie with each other in their zeal for the government. It was unanimously resolved to address his majesty, that he would insert an article in all his treaties of alliance, importing, that no peace should be made with France, until his majesty and the nation have reparation for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. A bill was also brought into the house of commons for attainting the pretended prince of Wales; which being carried up to the other house, passed, with the additional clause of attainder against the late king James's queen, who now assumed the character of queen-regent during her son's minority. This however was not carried without great opposition in the house of lords; and when the bill was sent back to the commons, they excepted to the amendment as irregular, and proposed that the queen should be attainted in a separate bill; to which the lords assented: however, this was afterwards neglected in the lower house.

But the longest and warmest debates of this session were produced by a bill which was brought into the house of lords for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, and swearing to king William, by the title of Rightful and Lawful, and his heirs, according to the act of settlement. It was proposed that this oath should be voluntary, and should only be tendered to all persons, and their subscription or refusal recorded, without any other penalty†. Though the Whigs possessed an evident majority in both houses, yet there was in each a considerable number of Tories, who used their endeavours to traverse the measures of their rivals; and being headed by the earl of Nottingham in the house of peers, made strong efforts to throw out this bill, on pretence that the government was first settled with another oath, which was like an original contract, and that it was neither just nor honourable to add a new obligation. Oaths, they said, relating to mens opinions, had ever been considered as severe impositions; and that a voluntary oath was in its own nature unlawful, since no man could swear lawfully, unless required to it by a superior authority.

During these disputes another bill of abjuration was brought into the house of commons by sir Charles Hedges, which was to be obligatory on all persons who enjoyed employments in church or state: it likewise included an obligation to maintain the government in the king, lords, and commons, and to maintain the church of England; together with the toleration for dissenters. A long debate ensued upon the question, "Whether the oath should be imposed, or voluntary?" and at length it was carried for imposition, by the majority of one voice. They agreed to an additional clause, declaring it equally penal to compass or imagine the death of her royal highness the princess Anne of Denmark, as to compass or imagine the death of the king's eldest son and heir.

This bill was strenuously opposed in the house of peers: the Whigs rejected with indignation the clause to maintain the government in the king, lords, and commons, insisting that the lords and commons were no part of the government or the executive power, but only of the constitution or legislative authority: besides, they said, that as the extinguishing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales was the only object of the present bill, it was improper to crowd it with any foreign matters. The clause in favour of the church and the toleration was likewise laid aside, and for the same reason; and when, after long debates, the bill passed, ten lords entered a protest against it as an unnecessary and severe imposition‡.

The king came to the house on the tenth of February, and gave the royal assent to a bill for reviving and continuing the act for stating and examining the public accounts: after which the commons took into consideration the conduct of the Kentish petitioners who insulted the last parliament§; and there happening to be a controverted election for the borough of Maidstone in Kent, between Thomas Blisse and Thomas Colepepper, esquires (the latter one of the Kentish petitioners). The house, on examining into the same, resolved, That the said Thomas Colepepper had been guilty of corrupt, scandalous, and indecent practices, in endeavouring to procure himself elected burgeses for that town; and that he had promoted that scandalous and seditious petition in the house of commons, commonly called the Kentish Petition, containing groundless reflections on the house of commons, by aspersing the members with receiving French money, and being in the interest of France; for which offence he should be committed to Newgate, and the attorney-general should prosecute him for the said crimes. And on the twenty-sixth of February they came to these further resolutions, That to assert that the house of commons were not the only representative of the commons of England, tended to the subversion of the rights and privileges of the house of commons, and the fundamental constitution of the government of this kingdom: That to assert that the house of commons have no power of commitment but of their own members, tends to the subversion of the constitution of the house of commons: that to print or publish any books or libels reflecting on the proceedings of the house of commons, or any member thereof, for or relating to his service therein, is a high violation of the rights and privileges of the house of commons. It was determined, however, to take due care of the rights and privileges of the subject, while the house was maintaining its own dignity; and accordingly it was resolved by a considerable majority, That it was the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or address the king for the calling, sitting, or dissolving of parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances; and that every subject under an accusation, either by impeachment or otherwise, had a right to be brought to a speedy trial.

These matters, however interesting, did not prevent the commons from attending to others of a more public and important nature: they addressed the king to engage his allies to increase their quotas of land-forces, to put on board the fleet, in proportion to the numbers which his majesty should embark. At the same time they settled the sums appropriated to the several uses of the war. The supplies were raised by an imposition of four shillings in the pound upon land, annuities, pensions, and stipends, and on the profits arising from the different professions; by a tax of two and a half per cent. on all stock in trade, and money at interest; of five shillings in the pound on all salaries, fees, and perquisites; a capitation-tax of four shillings; an imposition of one pound per cent. on all shares in the capital stock of any corporation or company which should be bought, sold, or bargained for; a duty of six pence per bushel on malt; and a further duty on mum, cyder, and perry.

The party humours were by this time become very fierce between the two East India companies: both strove to gain the court, as well as the new members of the house of commons. The spirit of this time may in some measure be seen by many warm pamphlets then published; and at the two coffee-houses near the Royal Exchange, which still retain the names of Garraway's and Jonathan's, these matters were made so important, as to be said then to prepare and direct the greatest business of the nation. Both companies were at this time reckoned to have no fewer than sixty ships at sea; and great was the emulation at their public sales. These considerations made the government see the absolute necessity of composing their fierce contentions by a coalition, which was at length complied with, though not formally concluded, before king William died.

The same fate attended a most excellent and patriotic scheme, projected by that monarch, and which failed solely through the unhappy dissensions which prevailed in the northern parts of the island. This was an union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The king had this affair so much at heart, that even when he was disabled from going to the parliament in person, he sent a letter to the commons, expressing an earnest desire that a treaty for this purpose might be set on foot: but as the ferment in Scotland, in relation to the Darien affair, was not yet thoroughly subsided, it was thought dangerous to risk the calling a new parliament there; and therefore this project was postponed to a more favourable opportunity.

The whole nation now seemed to join in the cry for a war with France; and his majesty issued out a proclamation for the better encouragement of seamen and able-bodied landmen, in which he offered a considerable gratuity by way of bounty-money, to such as should enter themselves on board the fleet by a fixed time: and after that, another proclamation was issued, to give farther time for such who were at any great distance, to come and partake of the like bounty. Accordingly, a great number very cheerfully entered themselves, as directed by these proclamations. His majesty had, before his return from Holland, engaged in a negotiation with the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, who assured him, that if he would lay siege to and take Cadiz, the admiral of Castile, and divers other grandees of Spain, who were most heartily disgusted with the insolence and foppery of their new masters the French, would declare for the house of Austria. The emperor and the Dutch had also determined upon the siege of Keyserwaert, which the elector of Cologne had delivered into the hands of the French. The elector of Hanover had resolved to disarm the prince of Wolfenbuttle and Saxe-Gotha; the king of the Romans and prince Lewis of Baden undertook to invest Landau; and the emperor promised to send a powerful reinforcement to prince Eugene in Savoy. The great elector of Brandenburg and duke of Prussia (Frederic-William) who for his services and attachment to the common interests of the German empire, was, by the interest of our king, who was his relation, invested with the regal dignity, and recognized by most of the princes and states of Europe as king of Prussia, in the preceding year had agreed to furnish a certain number of troops on having a fixed subsidy paid him: in a word, every thing appeared in the greatest forwardness by sea and land to humble the enemies of these kingdoms, when, in the midst of our flattering prospects, a cloud of sorrow overspread the land, upon the news of the king's indisposition.

His majesty, who had for some time been visibly declining in his health, had retired to Hampton-court, where he amused himself with his favourite diversions of riding and hunting. On the twenty-first of February, as he was taking the air in the park of Hampton-court, he had the misfortune to fall from his horse, and broke his right collar-bone. He was immediately carried into the palace, where the bone was set, and the same evening he returned to Kensington. He seemed to be in a fair way of recovery till the first of March, when a defluxion fell upon his knee, with such symptoms as gave his physicians and surgeons very alarming apprehensions. Finding himself unable to go in person to the parliament-house as he intended, and yet being very solicitous about the great national affairs then depending, he was pleased to grant a commission under the great-seal to several peers, for passing the bills then lying ready for the royal assent; which were, a bill for the attainder of the pretended prince of Wales; and an act, that the solemn affirmation and declaration of the people called Quakers shall be accepted instead of an oath, in the usual form.

On the fourth day of March his majesty was so well recovered, that he took several turns in the gallery at Kensington; but at length, being somewhat fatigued, he sat down on a couch and fell asleep: soon after which he was seized with a shivering fit, which was succeeded by a fever and a violent looseness. Sir Thomas Millington, sir Richard Blackmore, Dr. Brown, Dr. Hutton, and several other physicians, were immediately sent for, who administered such remedies as they thought most like to give him relief: but he continued very ill till Friday the sixth of March, when, being so weak that he could not write his name, he, in the presence of the lord-keeper and the clerks of parliament, applied a stamp, prepared for the purpose, to three bills; one of which was, the act of abjuration and settlement, to which we owe the security of a protestant succession in the august family now reigning. On Saturday morning his majesty found himself somewhat easier, though still extremely weak, and continued so all the morning: towards the evening he was again more faint, and in the night was attacked by three violent fits; during the intervals of which he sent for several noblemen, and spoke to them about private affairs. On Sunday morning early, being the eighth of March, his majesty received the holy sacrament from the hands of Tennison, archbishop of Canterbury, who, with Dr. Burnet bishop of Salisbury, prayed by him, he himself assisting with great devotion. The lords of the council and many of the nobility attended all the while in an outer room. About eight o'clock in the morning the agonies of death overtook him; and just as he was expiring, he faintly asked for his great favourite the earl of Portland, who was immediately introduced to the bed-side; but the king being by that time speechless, he grasped his hand, and laid it to his heart with marks of the most tender affection. He had before delivered to lord Albemarle the keys of his closet and scrutore, telling him he knew what to do with them. He was sensible to the last moment, and died in the arms of Mr. Sewel, one of the pages of the Back-stairs, sitting up in bed in his night-gown, being kept alive five or six hours merely by the help of cordials. Thus departed William III. in the fifty-first year, fourth month, and fourth day of his age, after having reigned thirteen years and one month, wanting five days.

The remains of king William were deposited in Westminster-abbey on Sunday night the twelfth of April, with all the magnificence a private funeral would admit of. Soon after his will was opened in Holland: in this he had declared his cousin John-William-Henry Friso, prince of Nassau-Dietz, and hereditary stadtholder of Friesland, his sole and universal heir, appointing the States-general his executors. By a codicil annexed, he bequeathed the lordship of Breevert, and a legacy of two hundred thousand guilders, to the earl of Albemarle.

William III. according to bishop Burnet's description of him, was in his person of the middle stature, a thin body, and delicate constitution; subject to an asthma and continual cough from his infancy. He had an aquiline nose, sparkling eyes, a large forehead, and a grave and solemn aspect, but very little majesty in it. He spoke very little; and when he did, his conversation was dry, and his manner disgusting.

The character of William III. has shared the same fate which commonly attend the characters of those who act in exalted stations. By his friends he has been represented as adorned with every virtue; by his enemies, as deformed by every vice; but neither the one nor the other seem to have drawn their portraits from truth: the greatest eulogium upon this prince's memory, is the frantic joy which his enemies shewed at his death. Tho' we might count his disgraces by the number of battles he fought against the French, and by the sieges which they compelled him to raise, yet can we not in justice refuse him the title of a great general and a great king: though repeatedly beaten, he could never be said to be defeated, the victors being generally as great losers as the vanquished. William had inspired his troops with a confidence and courage that, like his own, was superior to all danger and ill success. Fortune indeed seems to have taken a delight in traversing all his military projects, if we except his campaign in Ireland, and the taking of Namur; but she could never get the better of his courage, fortitude, and equanimity, in which he rivalled the most eminent warriors of antiquity.

In the government of his dominions he discovered an exquisite discernment, and consummate prudence. Almost all the powers of Europe considered him as a friend; one in whom they could repose an unlimited confidence; a distinction never before possessed by any king of England, and which William maintained by the most inviolable attachment to the interests of his allies, and an unwearied application to business. He checked the alarming progress of the French arms in Flanders and Germany: he was the prop of Europe, when ready to crouch beneath the power of Lewis XIV. To him the English are indebted for the knowledge of their own strength as a maritime and commercial nation. Though he was himself seldom cordially treated by his parliaments, who much embarrassed and obstructed him in his undertakings, yet he suffered not this treatment to get the better of his solicitude for the glory and welfare of these kingdoms. In a word, now that party prejudices have given way to reasons of justice and equity, William III. is deservedly considered as one of the greatest kings that ever filled the English throne.

QUEEN ANN.

It must be acknowledged, however, that with all his virtues, this prince was not free from vices, or more properly speaking, from imperfections; the chief of which was ambition. This was the distinguishing part of his character, as may appear in most part of the steps he took at the time of the Revolution, but particularly in his refusing to accept the sovereign power in conjunction with his queen, whose priority of title could never be disputed. Other causes have indeed been assigned for this refusal of a conjunct reign, but they do not seem satisfactory; in particular, when they would ascribe this step rather to prudence than ambition, to preserve queen Mary from the odium of swaying the sceptre of her living father. William stands justly blameable for that impolitic, and indeed ungrateful bias, which he on all occasions discovered towards his foreign favourites. This occasioned the distrust between him and his people, and is an example that all princes would do well to consider, when they are called to the government of a strange people.

It is not to be wondered at, that a prince bred up from his cradle amidst the noise of battle and a camp, should not have possessed any great taste for the arts and sciences; nor have shewn himself the patron or encourager of learning and learned men. Generosity indeed was on few occasions one of his most shining virtues: military merit, which he beyond all other things admired, experienced several instances of it. However, upon a candid review of this prince's conduct and character, we may with justice say, that his virtues and accomplishments were greater, and his failings less numerous, and much more excusable, than most of his predecessors, whose lives and actions we have recorded in the course of this work; nor can Englishmen think of him but with gratitude, as an illustrious instrument in the hand of Providence for rescuing these nations from popery and slavery.

King William was the posthumous son of William of Nassau prince of Orange, by the princess Mary, eldest daughter of king Charles I. On the fourth of November, 1677, he married his first cousin the princess Mary, eldest daughter of James duke of York (afterwards king James II.) by whom he had no issue; nor did he ever marry again after her death, which happened on the twenty-eighth of December, 1694.

A N N E, the last Sovereign of ENGLAND of the Name of STUART. A. D. 1702.

UPON the death of king William, the crown, pursuant to the act of succession, devolved to the princess Anne of Denmark. This princess was second daughter of James duke of York, afterwards king James II. by Mrs. Anne Hyde, eldest daughter of sir Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon. The duke was privately married to this lady during his first exile in the year 1659; and upon that great turn of affairs at the Restoration, there did not want those who would have had him deny the marriage, suggesting the advantages he might make by another choice; but he could never be brought to listen to their advice; and in the year 1660 she was, by an order of council, declared duchess of York, and to have the precedence of the princess of Orange and the queen of Bohemia. The duchess was a lady of a very fair character, and a constant member of the church of England till her last long indisposition, when she was prevailed upon to embrace the faith of the church of Rome, in which she died, to the unspeakable grief of her father, who expostulated with the duke as well as herself on that subject. The duchess of York died in the palace of St. James, on the thirty-first of March, in the year 1671. She had issue by the duke four sons and four daughters, viz. Charles, James, Charles, and Edgar; Mary, Anne, Henrietta, and Catherine. Charles, James, Charles, and Henrietta, died in her life-time, and Edgar and Catherine did not survive her a year; but her two daughters Mary and Anne lived to be queens of England.

The latter of these princesses, whose reign I am now entering upon, was born at St. James's, on the sixth of February 1665. As the lady Anne grew up, she was found not to be so healthy as could have been wished; wherefore she was, by the advice of the physicians, sent over to France when about five years of age. This gave occasion to many people to suspect that she was sent thither to be bred a catholic: but these fears were quieted by her return to England some months afterwards, having received considerable benefit in her constitution from the change of air. When her sister the princess Mary was married to the prince of Orange, the duke of York was very pressing with his brother (Charles II.) to leave him the disposal of his other daughter the princess Anne; but the king judged it most prudent to fall in with the views and remonstrances of his parliament, and give her hand to a protestant prince. When the princess was in the twentieth year of her age, the prince of Hanover (afterwards king George I. of England) arriving here, it was the general talk that a treaty of marriage was on foot between him and the lady Anne, and that he came over purposely to see her. However this might be, he returned without making any proposals of the kind. Two years after prince George of Denmark, second son of Frederick III. a younger brother of Christian V. king of Denmark, came into England on purpose to pay his addresses to the young princess, and on the twenty-eighth of July 1683, they were solemnly married by Dr. Henry Compton, Compton, bishop of London (who had the charge of her highness's education) in the chapel-royal of St. James, in the presence of the king and queen, their royal highnesses the duke and duchess of York, and all the principal nobility of the land.

Upon the death of king Charles II. the princess Anne became a degree nearer to the crown. However, during all the time of her father's reign, she kept her court as private as she could, consistent with her station. A very good correspondence had all along subsisted between her royal highness and her sister the princess of Orange; but the birth of the pretended prince of Wales tending to remove them at a greater distance (and perhaps for ever exclude them and their issue) from the crown, together with the report of his being a prince imposed upon the nation gaining ground every day, a greater intimacy grew between the two sisters, who carried on a secret correspondence for some time. When at length the prince of Orange landed in England, and was preparing to march to the capital, in order to bring the infatuated James to a proper sense of his past ill conduct, and that numbers of the nobility and gentry crowded to enlist under his banners, the banners of liberty; Prince George of Denmark, her highness's consort, quitted king James, his father-in-law, whom he had accompanied as far as Salisbury, and went off to the prince of Orange at Torbay. He left behind him a letter for the king; wherein, among other things, he excused himself in the following expressions: "My just concern for that religion wherein I have been so happily educated, which my judgment truly convinces me to be the best, and for the support whereof I am highly interested in my native country; and is not England now become so by the most endearing tie!" by which he meant her royal highness, who, upon the news of her husband's having left the king, and that the latter was upon his return to London, was thrown into great agonies and perplexities; and so apprehensive was she of her father's displeasure, that she told the lady Churchill (afterwards duchess of Marlborough) then her lady of the bed-chamber and chief confidant, that rather than see the king, she would jump out at the window, not knowing but she might be sent away into France, or put under such restraint as might endanger her life. Accordingly, by the help of lady Churchill and lady Berkeley, she left the court in the dead of the night before the day of her father's arrival; and attended by these two ladies, went to the bishop of London's house in the city, and there taking coach with all imaginable secrecy, the bishop and the earl of Dorset conducted her royal highness safely to Nottingham, where the earl of Devonshire was in arms, who furnished her with some money, gave her two hundred men for a guard, and she from thence went to Oxford, where she soon after met with her husband with a detachment of the prince of Orange's forces *.

The success of the prince of Orange's expedition has already been fully related: I shall therefore only observe, that her royal highness finding the parliament inclined to settle the crown on king William for life, she readily gave her consent to it; and during the whole of that king's reign, she took care that no disturbance should be raised by her friends, who had pressed her earnestly to form an opposition. The return she met with for this behaviour has been already enlarged upon in the history of the last reign; it was indeed such as few princesses of her expectations could have brooked so patiently and submissively as herself. However, king William's death put an end to her disagreeable situation, and placed her on the throne in the thirty-third year of her age.

The late king dying on Sunday the eighth of March, about eight in the morning, the privy-council that was then assembled waited upon her majesty, and recognized her right and title to the throne: upon which occasion she made them a short speech, which was delivered with a majesty and sweetness peculiar to this princess in all her public orations: therein she expressed her deep sense of the loss which the nation had sustained by the death of his late majesty, and of the great weight and burden which it brought upon herself in particular: but the sincere regard she had to the religion and liberties of her country, she said, would influence her to leave nothing undone on her part to preserve them inviolable, to maintain the succession in the protestant line, and the government in church and state as by law established. She also declared her firm resolution to carry on the preparations for opposing the exorbitant power of France, and that she would lose no time in giving her allies all assurances that she would pursue the true interest of England, together with that of the confederates, for the support of the common cause.

As by an act passed in the late reign, the parliament continued sitting even after the king's death, both houses met immediately; and the lords having desired a conference with the commons, acquainted them with the death of king William, declaring, that on the demise of his late majesty,

* Her royal highness thought it prudent, before she left the court, to write a letter of excuse to the queen for her so sudden retreat, which was in these words:

"Madam, I beg your pardon if I am so deeply affected with the surprising news of the prince being gone, as not to be able to see you, but to leave this paper to express my duty to the king and yourself, and to let you know that I am going to absent myself, to avoid the king's displeasure, which I am not able to bear either against the prince or myself; and I shall stay at so great a distance as not to return before I hear the happy news of a reconciliation: and as I am confident the prince did not leave the king with any other design than to use all possible means for his preservation, I hope you will do me the justice to believe that I am not capable of following him for any other end. Never was any one in such an unhappy condition; so divided between duty and affection, between a father and a husband; and therefore I know not what to do but to follow one to preserve the other. I see the general defection of the nobility and gentry, who avow to have no other end than to prevail with the king to secure their religion, which they saw so much in danger by the violent counsels of the priests, who to promote their own religion did not care to what danger they exposed the king. I am fully persuaded that the prince of Orange designs the king's safety and preservation, and hope all things may be compassed without more bloodshed, by the calling of a parliament. God grant a happy end to these troubles, that the king's reign may be prosperous, and that I may shortly see you in perfect peace and safety: till when, let me beg your majesty to continue the same favourable opinion you have hitherto had of, &c."

the princess Anne was the only rightful queen of these realms, and that orders had been given for proclaiming her majesty. The commons readily joined with their lordships in recognizing her majesty's title, and unanimously voted an address of condolance and congratulation. In the afternoon the queen was proclaimed with the usual ceremony, amidst the loud acclamations of the people; and indeed the joy expressed by the whole nation on the accession of queen Anne was observed to be greater and more general than had appeared on any other occasion since the Restoration of the church and monarchy under king Charles II. The same day her majesty was pleased to issue a proclamation, by which all magistrates and officers civil and military, were continued in the exercise of their respective functions till further orders.

The queen also summoned all the late king's ministers of the kingdom of Scotland who were then in London, to attend her, before whom she took the coronation-oath appointed to be taken by the laws of Scotland, on the accession of a new sovereign. After which she sent a commission to the earl of Marchmont, lord-chancellor of that kingdom, to be her commissioner in the general assembly of the kirk that was then sitting; and likewise dispatched a letter to the privy-council there, authorizing them to act as her council, and to issue proclamations, requiring all officers, civil and military, to continue the exercise of their several offices, declaring her resolution to protect them in their religion, laws, and liberties; and the like orders were sent to Ireland, where the joy of the people appeared no less sincere on her majesty's ascending the throne than in England.

The next day, being the ninth of March, each house of parliament attended her majesty separately, with an address of condolance and congratulation. The peers, who first presented theirs, assured her majesty of their firm resolution to support her undoubted right and title, and the succession in the protestant line, against all her enemies whatsoever, being fully sensible, they said, that the great loss they had sustained was no otherwise to be repaired but by a vigorous adherence to her majesty and her allies, in the prosecution of the measures already entered into to reduce the exorbitant power of France: that they would exert themselves to the utmost to maintain the balance of Europe, and desired no time might be lost in communicating to the allies her majesty's resolution of adhering to the alliances already made, which they would exert their utmost endeavours to enable her to maintain.

Her majesty returned the lords her thanks for the assurances they gave her, and told them her endeavours should always be very sincere to promote the true interest of England, and support the common cause.

The same day in the evening, the commons in a body attended her majesty with their address, in which they condoled with her for the loss of the late king; but, they said, her majesty's zeal for their religion and establishment gave them a certain prospect of future happiness, and moderated their grief, and engaged them unanimously to assure her, that they would assist and maintain her majesty on the throne where God had placed her against all her enemies; and also that they were firmly resolved to maintain her majesty's alliances, and the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and effectually provide for and make good the public credit of the nation*.

Her majesty thanked the commons for their assurances, and told them they could not be more agreeably confirmed than by giving dispatch to their preparations for the public service and for the support of the allies. The lord archbishop of Canterbury and the other bishops also attended her majesty with an address of condolance and congratulation, as did the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and afterwards all the counties and corporations of England.

On the eleventh of March the queen went to the house of peers with the usual solemnity, where she delivered this her first speech to the parliament:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot too much lament my own unhappiness in succeeding so immediately after the loss of a king, who was the great support not only of these kingdoms, but of all Europe; and I am extremely sensible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.

"But the true concern I have for our religion; for the laws and liberties of England; for the maintaining the succession to the crown in the protestant line, and the government in church and state, as by law established, encourages me in this great undertaking, which I promise myself will be successful, by the blessing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection of which you have given me so full assurance.

"The present conjuncture of affairs requires the greatest application and dispatch; and I am very glad to find in your several addresses so unanimous a concurrence in the same opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our allies to reduce the exorbitant power of France.

"I cannot but think it very necessary upon this occasion to desire you to consider of proper methods towards obtaining an union between England and Scotland, which has been so lately recommended to you as a matter that very nearly concerns the peace and security of both kingdoms.

Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I need not put you in mind that the revenue for defraying the expences of the civil government is expired.

"I rely entirely upon your affections, for the supplying it in such manner as shall be most suitable for the honour and dignity of the crown.

My lords and gentlemen,

"It shall be my constant endeavour to make you the best return for that duty and affection you have expressed to me, by a careful and diligent administration for the good of all my subjects; and as I know my own heart to be entirely English, I can very sincerely assure you there is not any thing you can expect or desire from me which I shall not be ready to do for the happiness and prosperity of England; and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word."

This speech was extremely agreeable to the parliament, and the two houses unanimously joined in a warm address of thanks to her majesty for the same; and on the fourteenth of March voted, That the same revenue which had been settled on king William should be settled on her majesty for life*. The same day the duke of Bedford and the earl of Marlborough were elected knights companions of the most noble order of the garter, and on the 15th the earl was declared captain-general of all her majesty's forces in England, and of those which were employed abroad in conjunction with her allies. Her majesty wrote a letter to the States-general to notify the death of king William, and to assure them of her resolution to concur with them in all the measures that should be found necessary to preserve the common liberty of Europe, and to reduce the power of France within due bounds. This letter Mr. Stanhope, the English envoy in Holland, delivered to the States, who immediately published it, to refute those reports that had been raised that the queen would not prosecute the measures concerted by king William and the confederates. This letter greatly revived the drooping spirits of the States, who had been seized with the most dreadful consternation on the first news of king William's death: but animated by her majesty's assurances, they now resolved to prosecute vigorous measures; and their resolutions were still more inspirited by the arrival of the earl of Marlborough on the twenty-eighth of March, in the quality of her majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to their High Mightinesses.

After several conferences with the pensionary Fagel, and the other ministers, he was on the thirty-first of March, conducted to his public audience of the States General, with great solemnity, to whom he made a speech, wherein, after having condoled their mutual loss, and assured them of her majesty's sincere desire to entertain the same union, friendship, and correspondence, as had subsisted between the two nations in the preceding reign, he also told their High Mightinesses, that he was farther ordered to assure them, that the queen his mistress would not only faithfully observe the treaties and alliances already made with them, but was ready to renew and confirm them, and to concur in all the measures taken by the late king, in pursuance of the said alliances; that she was also willing to assist the allies with all her forces, by sea and land, for the preservation of the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France; and had ordered him to concur with them in the necessary operations for effecting these ends†. This speech was answered by Dyckvelt, president of the week, who, in the name of the States, expressed their hearty thanks to her majesty, and their resolution of concurring with her in a vigorous prosecution of the common interest: to which the president added, "that his excellency's person would be highly acceptable to them, not only for the queen's choice of him, and for the sake of king William, who had first invested him with that character, but also for his own merit."

The French king, on the news of William's death, which had filled the court of Versailles with a joy they could hardly restrain within the bounds of common decorum, dispatched credentials to the sieur de Barré, whom the count d'Avaux had left at the Hague to manage the affairs of France, together with instructions to renew the negotiations with the States, in hope of detaching them from the alliance. De Barré accordingly presented a memorial to the States, offering them his master's friendship, which he said he did not doubt they would be ready to cultivate, "now they were no longer under the influence of the deceased king:" but gave them to understand, at the same time, that his master's forces were ready to enter upon action, and they must now determine whether they would chuse quiet and liberty, or war and ruin, and the ruin of their trade, sacrificed to foreign interests‡.

The States, in their answer to this memorial (both which they made public), said, "That they had always a high esteem for his most Christian majesty's friendship, and had never done any thing to incur his displeasure; but that the preparations for war upon their frontiers, laid them under the necessity of putting themselves in a posture of defence, and of asking assistance from their allies: that the resident was mistaken, if he thought their High Mightinesses had not as much liberty during the life-time of his Britannic majesty, to debate and take such resolutions as they judged necessary for their preservation, as they had at present: that they could not indeed enough deplore their misfortune, in being deprived of his wise conduct and counsels, whose deserts the republic could never forget; and they were resolved to follow the same principles, and continue the same alliances they had entered into in his life-time; and make use of such other means as God had put into their hands for maintaining their liberties and religion." Upon this answer, the sieur de Barré dispatched an express to France; and the earl of Marlborough, having concerted measures for beginning the military operations, returned to England.

In the mean time the English parliament having gone through several bills, her majesty came to the house on the thirtieth of March, and gave the royal assent to the act for the better support of her majesty's household, and the honour and dignity of the crown; to an act for stating the public accounts; and to some other acts, which may be seen in the notes||. After which her majesty made a speech to both houses, wherein she told them, it was with great pleasure that she gave her assent to the act for stating the public accounts, as she thought it highly reasonable that her subjects should be satisfied how the large sums they had granted her had been expended, especially when their common safety still required the continuance of great taxes: at the same time she returned the commons thanks for having continued to her, during her life, the same revenue they had granted to the late king; telling them, that although it would, in all probability, fall short of what it had formerly produced, she would nevertheless give directions that one hundred thousand pounds thereof should be applied this year to the public service; being willing, she said, to straiten herself in her own expences, rather than not contribute all she could to the ease and relief of her people, with a just regard to the honour and dignity of the crown.

|| An act for explaining a clause in an act made in the parliament begun and holden at Westminster the twenty-second of November, in the seventh year of the reign of our sovereign lord William III. intitled, "An act for the better security of his majesty's royal person and government."

An act for reviving an act, entitled, "An act for exempting apothecaries from serving the offices of constable, scavenger, and other parish and ward-offices, and from serving upon juries."

An act for continuing the act made in the eighth year of his late majesty's reign, for the better preventing the counterfeiting the current coin of this kingdom.

This popular and generous declaration so won upon the parliament, that both houses presented her majesty addresses of thanks, in which they took notice of her unparalleled grace and goodness, in contributing out of her own revenue to the ease and relief of her subjects.

The queen being settled in the throne, began to think of forming her ministry, wherein she gave evident proofs of her partiality for the Tories: she had, indeed, from her infancy, imbibed strong prejudices against the Whigs, whom she considered as filled with a republican spirit, and by no means friends to the church of England, to which she was most zealously devoted. The treatment she had met with from her sister and king William, had not a little confirmed her in her dislike to the Whigs, to whom she imputed that treatment; and her consort prince George, who had found himself equally slighted during the preceding reign, encouraged her in her resentments against that party: besides, the Tories had engaged very warmly in her interests in the affair of her revenue, which, though it might have been done principally out of opposition to king William, was charged to the account of their affection to her. These circumstances considered, the reader will not be surprized to find that the Tories were chiefly considered.

On the fourteenth of April, the duke of Devonshire was constituted lord-steward of the household; the earl of Jersey, lord chamberlain; the earl of Bedford, treasurer; sir Edward Seymour, comptroller; and Peregrine Bertie, esq. vice-chamberlain: two days after, her majesty, in council, declared his royal highness the prince of Denmark generalissimo of all her forces by sea and land. It had been debated, on her majesty's accession to the throne, whether her princely consort should have any higher title than he had before: some alleged, he should have the name, if not the authority, of King; and instanced the examples of Philip of Spain, who married our queen Mary I. and of Henry, lord Darnley, who espoused Mary queen of Scots. As to the first, the emperor Charles V. had, before his son's marriage, conferred on him the title of king of Naples, Jerusalem, &c. and not long after resigned to him all his hereditary dominions; but for the other, he never had any sovereignty, and so was more parallel to the present case; perhaps the main reason that induced the Scots to proclaim him king, was his near relation to the crown of Great Britain. It might also have been observed, that Francis, dauphin of France, the queen of Scots first husband, had the title of king of Scotland, though in France he was styled only Roy Dauphin (King Dauphin †.) However, the prince of Denmark contented himself with the same titles and character as before, and was the first who did homage to her majesty at her coronation, which was solemnized on the twenty-third of April, as duke of Cumberland. The duke of Ormond was now made commander in chief of all her majesty's land forces on board the fleet; and the lord Somers, and some others of the Whig party, being dismissed from the council-board, the marquis of Normanby, the earl of Abingdon, sir John Leveson Gower, sir Edward Seymour, and John How, esq. (the same who had expressed himself in so indecent terms about the partition-treaty in the last reign), were sworn of the privy council. The privy seal was delivered to the marquis of Normanby, and sir John Leveson Gower was appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; the earl of Rochester was continued lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and enjoyed a great share of her majesty's confidence; and Dr. John Sharpe, archbishop of York became her ghostly director and counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs. Soon after the earl of Nottingham and sir Charles Hedges were appointed secretaries of state.

There were however several of the Whig party at this time in the ministry: these had been admitted in order to gain them over; but the Tories were the preponderating party. When it came to be debated in council, whether England should enter into the war as principals, or only as auxiliaries, the Tories, with the earl of Rochester at their head, were for the latter, alleging, that in the late war the emperor and some other allies had been very remiss in furnishing their quotas, and bringing their troops early into the field, whereby many advantages had been lost, and the burthen of the war in a manner thrown upon the English; that their deficiencies were constantly supplied by England; and when they were put in mind of what they had stipulated and engaged for, their inability to perform their parts was accepted as an excuse; while the English, from a nice notion of honour, anticipated their revenues, and mortgaged their country in the quarrel: whereas, had they acted only as auxiliaries, they would have had no more to do but to pay the troops sent to their assistance, and the stress and burden of the war must have been borne, as it ought to be, by those who were most nearly concerned in the event.

The Whigs, however, the chief of whom were the dukes of Devonshire and Somerset, insisted upon the expediency of our acting as principals: in this opinion they were joined by the earl of Marlborough, between whom and the earl of Rochester there was at this time a rivalry for the queen's favour: the interest of the latter however prevailed; Marlborough was not only the better courtier, but by the canal of his countess actually directed the queen in all her resolutions. He observed on this occasion, that the honour of the nation was concerned to fulfil the king's engagements, and affirmed that France could never be reduced within due bounds unless the English would enter as principals in the quarrel. This allegation was strongly supported by the two dukes above-mentioned and the earl of Pembroke, who at length drew over the majority of the council to their side, and a declaration was ordered to be prepared against France and Spain. Her majesty, however, thought proper to lay the matter before the house of commons, and accordingly Mr. Comptroller, by her command, communicated to them the convention between her majesty, the emperor, and the States-general; whereupon the commons addressed her majesty with thanks for having condescended to advise with them before she declared war, and assured her that they would to the utmost assist and support her majesty in carrying on the said war. The queen having the concurrence of the commons, caused the following declaration of war against France and Spain to be solemnly proclaimed on the fourth day of May.

A N N E R.

“Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God to call us to the government of these realms, at a time when our late dear brother William III. of glorious memory, had, in pursuance of the repeated advice of the parliament of this kingdom, entered into solemn treaties of alliance with the emperor of Germany, the States-general of the United Provinces, and other princes and potentates, for preserving the liberty and balance of Europe, and for reducing the exorbitant power of France; which treaties are grounded upon the unjust usurpations and encroachments of the French king, who had taken, and still keeps possession of a great part of the Spanish dominions, exercising an absolute authority over all that monarchy, having seized Milan and the Spanish Low-countries by his armies, and made himself master of Cadiz, of the entrance into the Mediterranean, and of the ports in the Spanish West Indies by his fleets, everywhere designing to invade the liberties of Europe, and to obstruct the freedom of navigation and commerce: and it being provided by the third and fourth articles of the fore-mentioned alliance, That if in the space of two months, which are some time since expired, injuries complained of were not remedied, the parties concerned should mutually assist each other with their whole strength: and whereas, instead of giving the satisfaction that ought justly to be expected, the French king has not only proceeded to farther violences, but has added thereunto a great affront and indignity to us and our kingdoms, in taking upon him to declare the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and has also influenced Spain to concur in the same affront and indignity, as well as in his other oppressions: we find ourselves obliged, for maintaining the public faith, for vindicating the honour of our crown, and for preventing the mischiefs which all Europe is threatened with, to declare, and we do hereby accordingly declare war against France and Spain; and placing our entire confidence in the help of Almighty God in so just and necessary an undertaking, we will, in conjunction with our allies, vigorously prosecute the same by sea and land, being assured of the ready concurrence and assistance of our subjects in a cause they have so openly and so heartily espoused; and we do hereby will and require our lord high-admiral of England, our general of our forces, our lieutenants of our several counties, governors of our forts and garrisons, and all other officers and soldiers under them by sea and land, to do and execute all acts of hostility in the prosecution of this war against France and Spain, their vassals and subjects, and to oppose their attempts, willing and requiring all our subjects to take notice of the same, whom we henceforth strictly forbid to hold any correspondence or communication with France, Spain, or their subjects: but because there are remaining in our kingdoms many of the subjects of France and Spain, we do declare our royal intention to be, that all the subjects of France and Spain who shall demean themselves dutifully towards us shall be safe in their persons and estates.”

Given at our court at St. James's, the fourth day of May, 1702, in the first year of our reign.

Two days after the issuing of this declaration lord Godolphin was constituted lord high-treasurer. This office his lordship had for some time refused, until he was over-ruled by the persuasions of the earl of Marlborough, to whose eldest daughter his son was married. This nobleman refused to command the forces abroad unless the treasury was put into the hands of Godolphin, on whose punctuality in point of remittances he knew he could depend. The same day her majesty was pleased to appoint George prince of Denmark lord high-admiral, though to do this it was requisite to remove the earl of Pembroke, then lord high-admiral, who was actually preparing to go to sea. It is true a large pension was offered him; but his lordship answered with a generosity and spirit not often to be met with, That however convenient it might be for his private interest, yet the accepting such a pension was inconsistent with his principles; and since he could not have the honour of serving his country in person, he would endeavour to do it by his example*. The new lord high-admiral had a council appointed him by his commission, viz. sir George Rooke, sir David Mitchel, George Churchill, esq. and Richard Hill, esq. who were to assist him with their advice, and also in the execution of his office.

The two houses now joined in an address to her majesty, that she would prevail with the emperor, the States-general, and the rest of her allies, to prohibit all trade and correspondence with France, and enter into measures with the Dutch for protecting the foreign trade of both nations. The Lords also addressed her majesty to encourage privateers and adventurers who should endeavour to possess themselves of the Spanish dominions in America, this being the only part of the world where the nation could gain any advantage by the war on the terms of the grand alliance; but unfortunately this advice was neglected. Her ma-jeſty having been pleaſed, by order of council, to require that the princeſs Sophia, electreſs-dowager of Hanover (by act of parliament appointed next in ſucceſſion to her majeſty, in caſe ſhe ſhould leave no iſſue behind her) ſhould be prayed for in churches, &c. both lords and commons voted her thanks for her great zeal for the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, expreſſed in her ſaid order.

And now the violent Tories in the lower houſe, who were moſt of them Jacobites, perceiving that every thing was conducted with vigour and diſpatch, reſolved to ſtart ſome ſubject which might, if not defeat, at leaſt retard the proſecution of the war. With this view they moved for an addreſs, "That no perſon who was not a native of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or at leaſt of Engliſh parents, unleſs they were formerly in half pay, ſhould be an officer in her majeſty's new-raiſed forces." This motion was ſuppoſed to be meant as a reflection on the memory of the late king, who was accuſed of an immoderate attachment to foreigners: the motion however was ſilenced, and the enemies of the government for this time put to confuſion. This however was but a ſmall part of the inſults aimed at the character of the late king; for about this time a report was induſtriouſly ſpread, that he had formed a deſign to exclude the princeſs Anne from the crown, and to get the elector of Hanover declared his immediate ſucceſſor; a report which gained ſo much credit, that the city of Norwich, in their addreſs to the queen, printed in the Gazette of the thirtieth of April, congratulated her majeſty's happy acceſſion to the throne, "notwithſtanding the malicious deſigns and contrivances uſed to defeat her majeſty of her undoubted right."

Hereupon ſeveral peers, friends to the Revolution and the memory of the late king, inſiſted that a proper ſcrutiny ſhould be made into the matter; and after a ſtrict and ſcrupulous ſearch among the papers his majeſty had left behind him, nothing appeared on which ſuch a ſtory could with truth be founded. The houſe of lords therefore voted the ſaid report to be a villainous attempt to diſhonour the late king's memory, and humbly beſought her majeſty to cauſe the authors or publiſhers of ſuch a report to be proſecuted by the attorney-general; and Dr. Drake being charged with having ſuggeſted ſomething of this kind in a pamphlet he publiſhed, entitled, The Hiſtory of the laſt Parliament, he was brought before the houſe, when he ſeemed to be under a ſtrange ſurprize and abſence of thought at his examination: for being aſked, if he had heard any perſons ſay that they could charge any perſons whatever with ſuch ſpeeches? he answered, he did not know of any ſuch perſon: and on being aſked farther, if in any of the pamphlets he had cited as obnoxious, there was any thing ſaid about ſetting aſide her preſent majeſty? the doctor answered, he did not remember there was: and yet it appears, that about the ſame time there was a pamphlet cited by the doctor under their lordſhips conſideration, entitled, "Reasons for addreſſing his majeſty to invite into England their highneſſes the electreſs-dowager and the electoral prince of Hanover;" written by Toland: wherein it was expreſſly ſaid, that it appears from hiſtory, "That all free people have ſet aſide the children of tyrants, for reaſons of eternal and univerſal force, as inheriting the principles and deſigns of their parents, bearing an affection to their friends, and owing revenge to their enemies." And their lordſhips were ſo well ſatiſfied of the drift of this claufe, and others of the like nature, that they paſſed their cenſures on theſe pamphlets, and ordered the authors to be proſecuted for the ſame: and indeed thoſe gentlemen and their zealous brethren were much leſs forward in giving credit to ſuch a report, when they had ſeen his majeſty make the earl of Rocheſter, uncle to the princeſs Anne, his prime miniſter, and the earl of Marlborough, who was her principal confidant, general of his armies, and ambaffador and plenipotentiary to his allies *. But to proceed:

As the queen in her ſpeech had recommended an union between England and Scotland, a bill was introduced into parliament to empower her majeſty to name commiſſioners to treat with the Scots on that ſubject. The Tories endeavoured all in their power to defeat this bill; but the meaſure was ſo plainly conducive to the intereſt of England, and the ſupport of the preſent government, that notwithstanding all their efforts it paſſed through both houſes, and at laſt received the royal aſſent. The buſineſs of the ſeſſion being finiſhed, on the twenty-fifth of May the queen went to the houſe of peers; and after giving her aſſent to ſeveral public and private bills, prorogued the parliament to the ſeventh day of July †, after having in a ſhort ſpeech thanked them for their zeal, recommended unanimity, and declared ſhe would carefully preſerve and maintain the act of toleration.

In the beginning of June her majeſty was pleaſed to appoint Simon Harcourt, eſq. to be ſollicitor-general, and to confer the honour of knight-hood both upon him and Mr. Northey, attorney-general. In the ſame month great alterations were made of general officers, viz. the earl of Rivers and Charles Churchill, eſq. were made lieutenants-general; ſir Charles O'Hara, William Selwyn, and Richard Ingoldsby, eſq. majors-general; and the earl of Arran, the lord Windſor, Cornelius Wood, Hatton Compton, William Lloyd, Guſtavus Hamilton, and William Seymour, brigadiers-general; and William Matthews, eſq. brigadier general of her majeſty's guards. The prince of Denmark was conſtituted conſtable of Dover-caſtle, and lord-warden of the Cinque-ports. The honourable John Granville was appointed lord-warden of the ſtannaries; and the earl of Carberry, governor of Milford-haven. His royal highneſs was pleaſed to appoint Charles earl of Wincheſea lieutenant of proper and convenient. An act for continuing the imprisonment of Counter, and other conſpirators againſt king William. An act for the relief of the proteſtant purchaſers of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland. An act for enlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration. By this act it was declared treaſonable for any one to attempt the hindering any perſon who was or ſhould be next in ſucceſſion, according to the act of ſettlement for ſucceeding to the crown on the death of her majeſty.

† In this ſhort ſeſſion the queen gave her aſſent to the following acts, viz. an act obliging the Jews to maintain and provide for their proteſtant children. By this act, if any Jewiſh parent, with a view to compel his proteſtant child to change his religion, ſhould reſuſe ſuch a child maintenance ſuitable to the ability of the parent, and the age and education of the child, the lord-chancellor was empowered to make ſuch an order for the maintenance of the child as to him ſhould ſeem moſt

Dover-castle and the Cinque-ports; and the lord viscount Weymouth, the lord Dartmouth, sir John Trevor master of the Rolls, sir Thomas Trevor lord chief-justice of the Common-pleas, and the honourable John Granville, esq. were sworn of her majesty's privy-council; the earl of Marlborough was also made master of the ordnance.

In the mean time William Fuller, an infamous impostor, who had repeatedly abused the patience both of the lords and commons, on pretence of making some important discoveries concerning the birth of the pretended prince of Wales, was brought to his trial at the bar of the Queen's Bench, upon an information for contriving and publishing several scandalous libels, particularly one, entitled, "Original Letters from the late King James," &c. It appeared at this trial, that Fuller had been censured by the house of commons in the year 1691, for crimes of the like nature, for which he was prosecuted at common law, and punished; notwithstanding which he still persisted in his villainous practices. It appeared also, that he had applied himself to some of the ministry, pretending to make discoveries, as above-mentioned; and though the stories were so very foolishly laid together, that they could never obtain any credit with reasonable people, yet the commonalty gave great credit to them. Fuller would have trifled with the court of Queen's Bench, as he had formerly done with the two houses of parliament, pretending, that if they would allow him time, he would produce witnesses to the truth of what he had affirmed; but the imposture was so notorious, that the jury found him guilty without withdrawing, and the lord chief justice Holt sentenced him to stand thrice in the pillory; to be sent to the house of correction, there to be whipped, and kept to hard labour for five months; to pay a fine of one thousand marks, and to remain in prison till it was paid.

It is now time to shift the scene, and take a view of the affairs of Scotland, where a warm contest had arisen between the Revolutionists and those in the opposition, concerning the existence of the present parliament. I have already taken notice that the queen, on her accession, sent a letter to the privy-council of that kingdom, to continue to act till farther orders. Her majesty, not long after, thought fit to send them another letter, in answer to one the late king had received, concerning their trade to Africa and the Indies, and the union with England, wherein her majesty tells them, she would maintain the sovereignty and independency of that her antient kingdom, and be as tender of their rights as of her kingdom of England; that she would govern each kingdom according to their respective laws, and endeavour to avoid all misunderstandings and differences between them; to that end she would endeavour to establish an union between them. That the parliament of England having shewn such an inclination towards an union, she hoped the parliament of Scotland would not obstruct the design. That the late king had ordered, that none of the subjects of Scotland should be impressed for the English sea-service, and she would continue to protect them in this matter. She regretted their losses and disappointments in their trade to Africa and the Indies; and in settling a colony in America, which was now a misfortune to the whole kingdom: she would concur in any proposals for their reparation and assistance; and she would encourage not only the trade of that company, but of the whole kingdom, and to the utmost of her power promote the welfare of her people*.

Notwithstanding these assurances, and that her majesty had taken the coronation oath of that kingdom, in the presence of twelve Scottish counsellors, then in London, those who wanted to embroil affairs, affirmed that this was an irregular way of proceeding, and that the oath ought to have been tendered by persons deputed for that purpose, either by the parliament, or the privy-council of the kingdom: they also clamoured loudly for the calling a new parliament; while the present ministry, consisting of the duke of Queensberry, the earls of Marchmont, Melvil, Seafield, Selkirk, and Hyndford, who were staunch Revolutionists, were desirous that the present parliament should continue, in pursuance of a late act for continuing the parliament that should be then in being, six months after the death of the late king, and that it should assemble in twenty days after that event; but the queen having, by several adjournments, deferred the meeting almost three months after the king's decease, the Antirevolutionists therefore affirmed it was dissolved; and the duke of Hamilton, who was at the head of this party, together with the marquis of Tweeddale, the earls Marischal and Rothes, and many other gentlemen, repaired to London, in order to make the queen acquainted with their objections to the continuance of the present parliament. The duke of Queensberry, however, having warmly represented to the queen and her English ministry, that the calling another parliament at this juncture might occasion tumults in Scotland; and, moreover, that it could not be convened time enough for her majesty's service, which required immediate supplies of men and money for the war; he carried his point, and orders were sent from England for the parliament of Scotland to meet, according to their last adjournment, on the ninth day of June, Queensberry himself being appointed high-commissioner for holding the same.

Duke Hamilton finding himself baffled in his designs hastened back to Scotland, and, on the day of the parliament's meeting, desired to be heard before the queen's high-commission was read, which being granted, his grace, in behalf of himself and the other members who adhered to him, objected, in a long speech, against the legality of their meeting; after which he read a paper, containing these words:

"Forasmuch as by the fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom, all parliaments do dissolve by the death of the king or queen, except in so far as is innovated by the seventeenth act of the sixth session of king William's parliament, empowering the parliament last in being at his majesty's death to meet and act what should be needful for the defence of the true protestant religion, as now by law established, and maintaining the succession to the crown as settled by the claim of rights, and for preserving and securing the peace and safety of the kingdom; and now seeing that the said ends are fully satisfied by her majesty's succession to the throne, whereby the religion and peace of the kingdom are secured, we conceive ourselves not warranted by this law to meet, sit, or act; therefore do dissent from all that shall be done, and thereupon take instrument*."

The duke having accordingly taken instruments, he went out of the house, but without giving in his paper; thereupon the clerk register and seventy-nine of the members declared that they adhered to duke Hamilton's paper, and likewise took instruments and withdrew. But nevertheless the duke of Queensberry, having a greater number remaining with him in the house, his commission to be her majesty's high-commissioner was read, and afterwards a letter from her majesty to the parliament, wherein she told them, that it would have been a great satisfaction to her, at her accession, to have met them in person; but the multiplicity of weighty affairs deprived her of that opportunity: however, she gave them full assurance, that she was firmly resolved to maintain and protect them in the full possession of their religion, laws, and liberties, "and of the presbyterian government of the church:" that she had been obliged, in pursuance of an express article of treaty entered into by the late king and her allies, to declare war against France and Spain, wherein she expected their hearty concurrence and assistance: and lastly, she earnestly recommended to their consideration an union of the two kingdoms.

The queen's letter being read, the duke of Queensberry and the earl of Marchmont, in separate speeches, enforced the several points therein; and the parliament meeting again on the eleventh of June, proceeded to appoint committees for the security of the kingdom; for controverted elections; for drawing up an answer to her majesty's letter; and for revising the minutes: then they passed an act for recognizing her majesty's authority; another for declaring the present parliament to be a lawful parliament; and another for securing the protestant religion and presbyterian church-government, upon which there happened great debates and several warm speeches; and among the rest one of sir Alexander Bruce, in which he had given vent to such stinging reflections against rigid presbytery as drew upon him the severe censure of the house, which ended in his expulsion; and, notwithstanding all the opposition those of the episcopal communion could make, the act passed; and the parliament transmitted an answer to the queen's letter, wherein, after expatiating on the blessings for which they were indebted to the late king, by the preservation and settlement of their religion, laws, and liberties, they lamented their misfortune of being deprived of her majesty's royal presence, who had shewn herself disposed to adopt the gracious resolutions of their late sovereign in regard to them, and particularly the presbyterian government as then established. That the growing power and unbounded ambition of the French king, and his owning the pretended prince of Wales as king, having engaged her majesty in a just and necessary war, they promised to raise supplies for the defence of their kingdom; and assure her, that the groundless secession of some members should increase and strengthen their care and zeal for her majesty's service, and what she had recommended to them: and as the union of the kingdoms had been so long desired by all good men, they were resolved to make such a suitable return to the advances already made by the parliament of England, as might best contribute to accomplish this great design.

In the mean time, however, the duke of Hamilton and his party had prepared an address to the queen, to justify their withdrawing themselves, shewing, that, by the constitution of Scotland, the convention or parliament was dissolved by the death of the late king. This address they sent up to London by the lord Blantyre; but her majesty refused to receive it, and adhered to the parliament, to which she sent the following Letter:

Anne R.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"Being informed, that at your first meeting, by virtue and warrant of the seventeenth act of the sixth session of this parliament, and of our proclamation of adjournment agreeable thereto, several members of parliament, after prayers said, and declining to wait the reading of our commission granted to James, duke of Queensberry, representing our royal person in this meeting of parliament, did presume to declare openly, that they did not conceive themselves warranted to meet and act in this present session of parliament, and therefore dissented from any thing that should be done or acted therein, and thereupon did take instruments, and withdrew and removed from their attendance; we have thought fit to signify to you our just resentment of that irregular and unusual proceeding, and our resolution to own and maintain this present session of parliament, and the dignity and authority of the same, and of our high-commissioner thereto, against all opposers: and this we thought fit to declare for your better encouragement, that you may proceed vigorously in your work, for the defence of the true protestant religion, and the maintaining the possession of the crown, and for the preserving and securing of the peace and safety of the kingdom. And so we bid you heartily farewell.

"Given at our court at St. James's, the seventeenth day of June, 1702, and of our reign in the first year."

On the twenty-fifth of June, the high-commissioner gave the royal assent to an act for enabling her majesty to appoint commissioners for treating of an union between the two kingdoms; after which it was proposed to settle the succession of the Scottish crown in the house of Hanover, as had been done in England; but there appearing a majority against settling the succession at this time, and the debates running very high, the lord-commissioner thought fit to adjourn them on the thirtieth of June, having first commended their unanimity and cheerfulness in recognizing her majesty, securing the protestant religion and presbyterian church-government, and dispatching the other acts for her majesty's service.

Soon after, the queen, in consequence of the power given her by the acts of parliament of both kingdoms, appointed commissioners for treating of an union between England and Scotland.

The commissioners for England were,

The archbishop of Canterbury,
Lord keeper Wright,
The earl of Pembroke,
The marquis of Normanby,
The duke of Devonshire,
The duke of Somerset,
The earl of Jersey,
The earl of Burlington,
The earl of Nottingham,

The chief justice Trevor,
Sir John Leveson Gower,

The commissioners of Scotland were,

The duke of Queensberry,
The duke of Argyle,
The marquis of Annandale,
The marquis of Lothian,
The earl of Seafield,
The earl of Hyndford,
The earl of Leven,
The viscount Tarbat,

Sir Alexander Douglas,
Sir David Dalrymple, Sir Patrick Johnstown,
Mr. Montgomery,
Mr. Scrimser,
The provost of Aberdeen.

Dr. Davenant was appointed secretary to the English commissioners, and Robert Pringle to those for Scotland*.

On the twenty-second of October, the commissioners met, for the first time, at the Cockpit, where, after both commissions had been read, the lord-keeper Wright made a short speech on the subject, and was answered by the duke of Queensberry. On the thirtieth of the next month they adjusted the preliminaries, which imported, "that nothing agreed on among themselves should be binding, unless it be ratified by her majesty and the respective parliament of both nations; and that, unless all the heads proposed for the treaty were agreed to, no particular thing agreed shall be binding." The lord-keeper then proposed on the part of England, "That the two kingdoms should be inseparably united in one monarchy, under her majesty, her heirs and successors; and under the same limitations as provided by the act of settlement." This proposal met with the ready acquiescence of the Scots. The duke of Queensberry then proposed, "That both nations should be united under one monarchy and one parliament, with a mutual communication of trade and privileges." In the mean time the queen, willing to quicken their deliberations, came to the assembly, and made them a speech, wherein she said, "she was so fully persuaded that a union of the two kingdoms would prove the happiness of both, and render this island more formidable than ever, that she wished the treaty might be brought to a speedy conclusion." Some days after, the Scots gave in six proposals; but they were so extravagant, especially one, by which they demanded the preservation of the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies, that the English commissioners could not comply with them, and nothing more was done upon this commission, which was annulled by the new Scottish parliament called by the queen. The tranquility of Ireland suffered no interruption at this time. The earl of Rochester, who, though lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, continued to reside wholly in England, committed the government of it to lords-justices: the earl of Mount Alexander, major-general Erle, and Thomas Knightley, esq. were appointed lords-justices in the room of the archbishop of Dublin and the earl of Drogheda.

We are now entering upon a war, the most glorious to England and her allies, if we consider her almost uninterrupted successes for the several years it lasted, that ever was known. The emperor and the States-general published their respective declarations of war against France and Spain much about the same time that queen Anne issued her's. The emperor's declaration turned chiefly upon the flagrant injury which had been done to the Austrian family by the French king's accepting the will made by the late king of Spain, Charles II. in favour of his grand-son the duke of Anjou. That of the States set forth in substance, "That Lewis had long since cast his eyes upon their provinces: that he had twice attacked their republic (namely, in the years 1672 and 1688) by a most unjust war, in order to make his way to universal monarchy: that so far was he from designing to observe the treaty of Ryſwick, that he thereby solely aimed at lulling the allies asleep, by making them lay down their arms, and particularly by ruining the commerce of the Dutch, to enervate them, since that treaty was scarcely ratified before he began manifestly to encroach on their trade, which is the great sinew of their state, by openly refusing the tariff promised by that treaty†.

The French king affected to be greatly incensed at these declarations, especially that of the States, of whom he spoke in the most contemptuous terms; but, notwithstanding all his vapouring, he was not ready to publish his declaration of war till the beginning of July, when it came forth to the following effect:

“ By the King.

“ Although the treaty concluded at Ryswick, at a time when the king, by the superiority of his forces, was in a condition to have given laws to the neighbouring princes, that were jealous of his power, was a certain proof of the sincere desire that his majesty had always to give peace to his subjects, and to restore peace to Europe; his majesty nevertheless finds that the emperor, without any lawful right to the Spanish monarchy, hath put himself in a condition, by the augmentation of his troops, by treaties and alliances with several princes, and particularly with England and the States-general of the United Provinces, to trouble the repose of Europe by a new war, as unjust as it is ill-grounded. They have begun hostilities on all sides, against and contrary to the treaties so solemnly sworn to. All Europe is witness of his majesty's moderation; he hath seen places attacked, advantageous posts seized, convoys stopped, and prisoners taken, before any declaration of war, and at a time when his majesty was endeavouring, by his ambassadors and envoys, to preserve the peace. All these steps being so contrary to sincere dealing, and their own interests, and the manifestos and declarations of war of the emperor, England, and the States-general, having been published, his majesty finds himself under an indispensable necessity (in order to preserve his own and the king his grand-son's dominions) to arm on his side, and to make levies sufficient to oppose the undertakings of the common enemies; and for that end his majesty is resolved to employ all his forces, by sea and land, and (by the help of divine protection, which he implores on the justness of his cause) to declare war against the emperor, England, the States-general of the United Provinces, and the princes their allies: his majesty orders all his subjects, vassals, and servants, to cruize upon the subjects of the emperor, England, and Holland,” &c. &c.

In the mean time, Lewis observing what a formidable confederacy was forming against him, left no stone unturned to draw over the German princes to his interest, and did not only succeed in his attempts upon the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, but prevailed also with the two dukes of Wolfenbuttle, Rodolphus and Anthony, to raise forces in the empire in his favour: whereupon the old duke of Zell, by the emperor's direction, made an incursion into their country, in order to compel them by force of arms to abandon the interests of the common enemy. This succeeded so well, that, after the duke of Zell had made himself master of several strong holds in the said principality, he blocked up Wolfenbuttle itself*. The two brothers, Rodolphus and Anthony, then held the regency together: Anthony, whether out of generosity, not to forsake his friend and ally, who had so well paid him, and from whom, perhaps, he expected greater advantages, or out of obstinacy, shewed no inclination to quit the French interest; and though the duke of Holstein-Ploen used all his endeavours to persuade him to understand his own good, he could never bring him to hearken to reason. But Rodolphus, either terrified by the impending danger, or desirous to have the regency to himself, began to incline to a composition: accordingly, a negociation was set on foot, which ended in an agreement between the duke of Zell and the elector of Hanover, his nephew, and Rodolphus Augustus of Wolfenbuttle, to this effect: “ That duke Anthony Ulric should be excluded from the regency; that Rodolphus should take the government into his own hands, and quit all his engagements with France: on the other side, that the elector of Hanover and the duke of Zell should take into their service a thousand horse, and two thousand four hundred foot, of the troops of Wolfenbuttle, which had been raised with French money, and withdraw their own forces out of the principality.”

The war was begun in the name of the elector Palatine, with the siege of Keyserfwaert†, a strong town on the Rhine, which the elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French. The place was invested, in the month of April, by the prince of Nassau Saarburch, mareschal du camp to the emperor: under this officer the Dutch troops served as auxiliaries, because war had not yet been declared by the States-general; at the same time prince Lewis of Baden assembled an army upon the Upper Rhine, in the neighbourhood of Croon Weissenberg and Lauterburg, to cut off the communication between Landau and Strasburgh, and the country of Alsace. The badness of the weather and the overflowing of the Rhine retarded the besiegers so much, that Keyserfwaert was not taken till the seventeenth of June; and marshal Boufflers, who commanded the French army under the duke of Burgundy, eldest grand-son of France, was very near surprizing the city of Nimeguen, while the allies were engaged in the siege: the earl of Athlone, who commanded a separate army of the Dutch, arrived scarce an hour before the French, and posted his army under the walls of Nimeguen, whereby he prevented the loss of that important place; for which he received the thanks of the States-general. Coehorn, with a detachment of ten thousand men, broke into Flanders, forced and demolished the French lines between the two forts of St. Donat and Isabella, which the enemy had been for many months raising, with great labour and expence, and laid the greatest part of the Chatellany of Bruges under contribution: but, upon the approach of the marquis of Bedmar and count de la Motte, he was obliged to † Keyserfwaert is a town below Dusseldorp, on the Rhine; mean, but well fortified, and did belong to the elector of Cologne. It had a broad ditch, very regular fortifications, and high walls faced with brick; as also the counterscarp, which was in a very good condition. It is seated on the north side of the Rhine, six German miles between Cologne to the north-west, and the same distance from Gulic (or Juliers) to the north. The French possessed themselves of it, for cardinal Furstenburgh, in 1688; but the late elector of Brandenburg retook it in the year 1689, and delivered it to the elector of Cologne, who in 1701 received a French garrison into it, which continued there till it was taken by the army of the allies. It is now subject to the duke of Neuburg. Busching.

retire under the walls of Sluys*; and, to prevent their taking fort St. George, he laid the country under water.

The unsuccessful attempt upon Nimeguen, and the reduction of Keyserfwaert, were not the only mortifications which the French suffered; for their army in Germany being weak, and drawing together but slowly, under the command of marshal de Catinat, prince Lewis of Baden seized this advantage, and laid siege to Landau †, on the sixth of June; but the place being strong, and defended by a numerous garrison, held out till the beginning of September, when prince Lewis informed the king of the Romans that the town was upon the point of surrendering, who came unto the Imperial army, and was present when the garrison beat a parley, on the tenth of September, and consequently had the honour of that conquest‡.

The States-general had now completed their levies, and waited only for the English to begin jointly with them the operations of the campaign in Flanders, while the combined squadrons of both nations prepared to carry terror and destruction on the coast of France and Spain. With this view they sent to press the coming over of the earl of Marlborough, to take upon him the supreme command of the allied army. It is said, that the queen was at first desirous, out of her affection to her consort, the prince of Denmark, to invest him with that high character, and had actually proposed this measure to the States-general; which, however, was not received in the manner she wished and expected. Those people thought that a war of such importance as that which they were going to enter upon, required a general to conduct it, who possessed the confidence of both nations, and had already distinguished himself in a military capacity; now this advantage was wanting in the prince of Denmark, while the earl of Marlborough possessed it in an eminent degree: the queen, therefore, very prudently gave up this point to her allies, and, to make the prince some amends for his disappointment, had created him (as we have seen) lord high-admiral of England, one of the most honourable and lucrative posts in the state; and the earl of Marlborough was confirmed in the supreme command of the British forces in Germany, to which he had been appointed by the late king. Accordingly, on the twelfth of May, his lordship set out for Holland, in order to assume the command. The earl of Athlone, who enjoyed the rank of veldt (or field) marshal, was requested by some of the Dutch officers to insist upon an equal command with the English general; but the States obliged him to yield that point in favour of Marlborough, whom they declared generalissimo of all their forces. As this nobleman became afterwards the greatest general of the age, it will not be improper to give a brief account of his life and character.

John Churchill, earl (afterwards duke) of Marlborough, was second son of sir Winston Churchill, of Wotton Bassett, in Wiltshire, by Elizabeth, daughter of sir John Drake, of Ashe, in Devonshire, at which place he was born, on the twenty-fourth of June, 1650 §. He was brought young to court, and made a page of honour to the duke of York, who, upon his discovering a natural inclination to a military life, procured him, at the age of sixteen, an ensign's commission in the guards. He afterwards went to serve in the French armies abroad, where he distinguished himself in a particular manner; and, upon his return to England, the fame of his bravery, and his sister's interest ||, raised him to be a lieutenant-colonel, gentleman of the bed-chamber and master of the robes to the duke of York, whom he attended in his retirement to Brussels, and afterwards to Scotland. In 1681, he married Sarah, daughter and co-heiress of Richard Jennings, of Sandridge, in Hertfordshire, who was then in great favour with the princess Anne, the duke of York's second daughter. Upon the duke's return from Scotland, colonel Churchill was created baron Churchill, of Aymouth, in Scotland, and appointed captain of the third troop of horse-guards. When the duke of York came to the crown, lord Churchill was made lieutenant-general, and sent ambassador to the court of France, to notify that prince's accession to the throne. In 1685, he was created an English peer, by the title of baron Churchill, of Sandridge, in Hertfordshire. We have taken notice of the part he acted at the Revolution, when he left his old master and benefactor, and went over to the prince of Orange, who, as soon as he ascended the throne, created him earl of Marlborough. The new earl commanded the English forces that served, in the year 1689, in Flanders, under prince Waldeck; and next year he reduced the city of Cork and town of Kingsale for king William. † Landau is a little but strong city of Germany, in the Lower Alsatia, upon the confines of the Palatinate of the Rhine, once imperial, but yielded to the French by the treat of Munster. This town was the great magazine where the French, after they had plundered most of the towns of the Palatinate in 1688, laid up the booty, all which was burnt by an accidental fire in May, 1689. It was now taken from the French by the Germans, but they retook it in 1703, as will be seen in the history of the next campaign. In 1704, the Imperialists reduced it again, after the battle of Blenheim. It stands on the Queich, eight miles south of Neustadt, and sixteen south-west of Spire.

§ His origin is traced up to Roger de Courcil, a younger branch of the illustrious house of Leon, in France, who attending William the Conqueror into England, received for his services a considerable estate in land; was grandfather to sir Bartholomew de Courcil, by corruption called Curriel, and so Churchill, who held the castle of Bristol for king Stephen; and whose descendant, Otho de Churchill, was the founder of a spreading family in Devonshire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire. Of this last county, and of the town of Wotton Bassett, was Winston Churchill, esq. who having had a liberal education at St. John's college, Oxford, asserted and suffered for the cause of king Charles I. but upon the Restoration was chosen member of parliament for Weymouth, admitted fellow of the Royal Society, soon after knighted and appointed commissioner of the claims in Ireland, where he began to retrieve his broken fortune; and afterwards, by the favour of the duke of York, made one of the clerk comptrollers of green-cloth to the king. She was maid of honour to the duchess of York, and afterwards favourite mistress to king James II. by whom she had two sons, James Fitz-James duke of Berwick, and Henry Fitz-James, commonly called the grand prior; and two daughters. She was afterwards married to colonel Godfrey, and by him had two daughters, Charlotta, wife of Hugh Boscawen, viscount Falmouth; and Elizabeth, wife of Edward Dunch, esq.

1692, he was suddenly removed from all his employments, for reasons which have been already related under that year, and continued out of favour till 1698, when he was appointed governor to the duke of Gloucester. In 1701, the last of king William's reign, he was declared commander in chief of the English forces in Holland, and ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary for the negotiations at the Hague, in which employments he was continued by queen Anne ‡.

The earl of Marlborough, says a late historian in his Life of Queen Anne, was by nature designed for a FAVOURITE, by fortune and personal merit raised to be a GENERAL, and by his own observation and long experience of court-intrigues, made a STATESMAN. His person was lofty and well made; his features manly, yet beautiful; his looks gracious and open; his mien great; his parts quick; his memory faithful and exact; his penetration deep; his judgment solid; his courage undaunted.

Although Marlborough had not yet shone at the head of armies, yet he had so far distinguished himself in the several actions in which he had been engaged, or had borne a share in the command, that he was thought the most proper person to fill the place of king William. Trained up to arms in the military school of the great Turenne, he had more than once received the approbation and thanks of that consummate master in the art of war for his gallant behaviour; and his after-conduct shewed how well he had profited by his lessons. Equally skilled in the intrigues of the cabinet and of the field, he possessed the happy art of gaining upon the minds of all those he dealt with: endowed with an exquisite discernment, he discovered a lucky moment the instant it presented itself, and failed not to avail himself of it with success, both in negotiating and fighting: as a soldier, he was a man of nice honour, punctual, vigilant, and indefatigable: as a statesman, he managed variety of business, either single or in concert with the prime minister, with great ease, dexterity, and sufficiency. As he perfectly well understood the interests of the powers he served, and seldom failed to penetrate into the designs of the enemy; and as he in a particular manner enjoyed the confidence of the troops he headed, he could always avert impending dangers by his prudence and foresight, or combat and overcome them by presence of mind and courage. These eminent qualities procured him the esteem and admiration of the allies, and even of the enemy, as well as of his own countrymen, till carried away by an unbounded ambition, and an insatiable thirst for riches, and intoxicated with the great reputation and credit he had acquired by his unparalleled successes*, he endeavoured to perpetuate to himself the supreme command, by perpetuating the war, forgetting what he owed to his royal mistress and benefactors; by which he lost her friendship, and with it all the high offices he occupied. In a word, the duke of Marlborough was a compound of many vices and many virtues; but, as lord Bolingbroke observes, the latter were so great, that they made those who knew him forget his failings.

Such was the person the allies cast their eyes upon to command their armies, and check the conquests of the French arms, nor could they at that time have made a more happy choice. Marlborough was not one of those generals who tamely receives from a first minister the plan of a campaign, and after having executed his orders, and put his troops into winter-quarters, returns back to solicit a renewal of his command. This general, on the contrary, governed his sovereign, as well from the necessity she had for his services, as by the great influence his wife possessed over her affections †. He managed the parliament as he pleased, by his own great credit with the nation, and the interest of Godolphin the high-treasurer, whose son had married one of his daughters. Thus, master of the court, the parliament, the army, and the treasury, with more power in the kingdom than ever king William possessed, whom he equalled as a politician, and excelled as a general, he did greater things than the allies had presumed to hope from him.

His first actions this campaign gained him universal admiration, and were a pleasing earnest of his future good fortune. Having regulated all things with the deputies of the States, he left the Hague on the thirtieth of June, and repaired to the army, which was now encamped under the command of the earl of Athlone, in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen, and which, after calling in the detached parties, he found to amount to about sixty thousand men. As with this force he was superior to the French under the duke of Burgundy and marshal Boufflers, the earl of Marlborough passed the Maese on the sixteenth of July, and made several attempts to bring the enemy to an engagement; but rather than expose themselves to the hazard of a battle, they chose to abandon the Spanish Guelderland, and leave it entirely to the discretion of the allies. Thus the Dutch, who were so lately in the deepest consternation upon the retreat of their army under the cannon of Nimeguen, before the earl of Marlborough's arrival, had now the pleasure to see the French fly ‡ Burnet. Boyer. Tindal. Collins's Peerage.

* It is said of the duke of Marlborough, "That he never sat down before a town which he did not take, nor ever fought a battle which he did not win."

† The beginning of this lady's favour with her royal mistress had a much earlier date than her entrance into her service: they had used to play together when children, and the princess Anne even then expressed a particular fondness for her: as they grew up this attachment became still stronger; and so desirous was she of having her always near her, that upon her own marriage with the prince of Denmark, in 1683, lady Churchill (for she was then married) was, at the princess's own request, made one of the ladies of the bedchamber, and was at length distinguished by so high a place in her favour, as perhaps no person arrived at a higher with queen or princess.

She had an ascendant over the mind of Anne in every thing, who seemed to think and act only in conformity to her confidant's sentiments. Lady Churchill, afterwards duchess of Marlborough, was a woman of very contracted knowledge, but of a clear apprehension, and a true judgment; a warm and hearty friend; violent and sudden in her resolutions, and impetuous in her way of speaking. She has been charged, and not without some appearance of reason, of growing proud and insolent on her favour, and with keeping the queen in a kind of subjection to her will. Nevertheless, it does not appear that she had ever recourse to the common arts of a court to maintain her credit with her mistress, for she did not beset or flatter her. The queen, on her accession to the throne, appointed her groom of the stole, and keeper of the privy-purse. Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough. Burnet.

in their turns; and thus were the United Provinces preserved by the earl's prudence and vigilance, whilst the duke of Burgundy, who came to the army to be taught how to fight, returned home, having learned nothing but how to avoid an engagement; and the French king was so dissatisfied with the conduct of marshal Boufflers, that he never after reposed any confidence in him.

The earl of Marlborough not being able to bring the French to an engagement, the deputies of the States in the army represented to him, that it would be much to the advantage of Holland to dispossess the enemy of the places they held in the Spanish Guelderland, whereby the navigation of the Maese would be opened; and accordingly preparations were made for the siege of Venlo, which was invested on the twenty-ninth of August. On the seventh of September the trenches were opened, and on the twenty-fifth of the same month the town surrendered. I shall not take upon me to give a diary of every siege during this long war; but there are some heroic actions which history ought not to pass by unnoticed: such was that performed by the lord Cutts before this place. On the eighteenth of September his lordship was commanded to attack Fort St. Michael, between the bastion that is next the plain and the ravelin that lies on the north side of it, having under his command brigadier-general Hamilton, with the royal regiment of Ireland, and general Hukelem's regiment, one hundred and seventy-two grenadiers, and one hundred fusileers, mostly English, under a lieutenant-colonel; and also three hundred workmen, with a competent number of engineers under colonel Blood. His lordship's orders were to make a lodgment from the point of the ravelin to the bastion, leaving him at liberty to proceed farther if he found it practicable: and at the same time the prince of Anhalt, with the same number of troops, was to make an attack between the bastion and the ravelin on the north side, with the like discretionary orders. The signals for both attacks, which was to be the blowing up a ton of powder, and the discharge of all the batteries of the besiegers, was accordingly made a little before six in the evening.

The attack was made with inexpressible vigour; the grenadiers cleared the covered-way of the enemy, and being sustained by fresh numbers, attacked the ravelin sword in hand, encouraging and assisting one another upon the assurance of being seconded, which lord Cutts perceiving, he marched with all his forces, engaged the enemy, and was soon master of the ravelin. The French then made a great fire upon the English from the rampart of the fort; whereupon his lordship sent orders to the officers that were at the head of the grenadiers to throw in their granadoes, and attack the fort sword in hand, if it were possible to find a passage, which they did, by charging and following the enemy so close, that they had not time to break the bridge, though it was hotly disputed by fire and push of pike, and especially by the enemy's grenadiers: but the bravery of the English grenadiers, encouraged by the example of their own and some other officers of distinction, was inexpressible: some of them attacked the bridge, and some clambered up the ramparts, after having thrown in their granadoes, and forced their way into the fort. The enemy, however, continued to defend themselves, till the English poured in so fast upon them, that they were no longer able to resist, which as soon as lord Cutts perceived, he checked the fury of the soldiers, and put a stop to the slaughter. The English took above two hundred prisoners, whereof thirty were officers, with a brigadier-general, and the governor: but all the rest that were in the fort, to the number of six hundred, were killed or drowned endeavouring to escape, except twelve who luckily passed the Maese in small-boats. On the twenty-fifth the town of Venlo beat a parley, and the garrison surrendering upon honourable terms, were conducted to Antwerp. While this siege was carrying on, the earl of Marlborough detached general Schultz, with a body of troops, to attack the town and castle of Wertz, which were both surrendered after a slight resistance.

In the month of October the general invested Ruremonde, which he took after a very obstinate defence, together with Stevenswaert, both situated on the Maese. The army then marched towards Liege*, and upon its approach mareschal Boufflers (to whom the duke of Burgundy had now left the command of the French army) thought fit to retreat from thence to Tongeren, on the river Jecker; after which he went towards Brabant, to defend such places as at that time were not intended to be attacked.

When our army came before Liege, they found the city abandoned, whereupon the earl took possession of it; but the citadel, and another strong fort called the Chartreuse of Liege, held out till the end of October. The citadel of Liege, in which were eight French battalions, was taken by storm the twenty-third; of which the earl of Marlborough transmitted to our court the following account: all things being prepared, and the signal given,

* Liege is a populous wealthy city, in the bishopric of the same name, in Germany, situated on the Maese, fourteen miles south of Maestricht, and twenty-eight north-east of Namur. It is about four miles in circuit; two branches of the Maese, with other rivulets or canals, run through many of the streets, forming little islands. It exceeds all the cities of Germany or France for fine churches and convents; of the former are no less than a hundred of all sorts, with a very numerous body of ecclesiastics belonging to the churches and monasteries. The city is so pleasantly situated, and has such rich endowments, that it is stiled the Paradise of the Clergy. Among other religious foundations here is one of English nuns; and here is also a famous university. The fortifications are not considerable, being overlooked and commanded by the contiguous hills; but the citadel is strong, and capable of making a good defence. It was taken this year by the earl of Marlborough; and the French investing it in 1705, were by the same general obliged to raise the siege, upon his expeditious return from the Moselle. The magistrates of Liege have sometimes pretended that it is an imperial city; but they have been severely handled for disputing the authority of their bishop, who is in effect absolute sovereign both of the city and bishopric: he is chosen by the sixty major canons, who are generally of noble extraction. The bishop of Liege is one of the most considerable ecclesiastical princes of the Germanic body; there being within his diocese fifty-two baronies, eighteen walled towns, and four hundred villages, all well peopled, with a yearly revenue of three hundred thousand ducats or nobles; and he can maintain a standing body of eight thousand troops, without oppressing his subjects, the bulk of whom are Roman catholics. Liege lies in latitude fifty degrees forty-six minutes north; longitude five degrees twenty eight minutes east. Busching.

our troops were out of their trenches, and marched towards the enemy without firing a shot, and with an order and intrepidity hardly to be paralleled. They then attacked the counterscarp with such fury, that the enemy were constrained to abandon the post: but our men, instead of lodging therein, got into the covert-way, passed the mount, and ascended the breach: whereupon the governor, who did not look for so vigorous an attack, beat a parley: our troops, however, being already in the place, would not hearken to it, and had cut the whole garrison in pieces, if they had not thrown down their arms and called aloud for quarter, which was granted them. In this glorious action the hereditary prince of Cassel signalized his courage: he went volunteer in the attack at the head of the grenadiers, and was the first man who mounted the breach, and with his own hands wrested the colours from a French officer. Mr. Wentworth, brother to the lord Raby, also served as a volunteer in this action, and had the glory of dying in the bed of honour. Monsieur Viviane the governor and the duke of Charôt were made prisoners. Three hundred thousand florins in gold and silver were found in the citadel, besides notes for about one million two hundred thousand florins more, drawn upon substantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money. The whole booty was so considerable, that an English grenadier is said to have gotten one thousand louis d'ors for his own share. Thus ended the campaign, equally to the advantage of the allies, and the honour of the earl of Marlborough, who had now established his military character beyond all controversy, and entirely secured the affection and confidence of the States.

On the third of November the confederate army being separated, the earl of Marlborough went to Maestricht, where he embarked that evening on the Maese for Holland, in company with Mynheer Gueldermansel, one of the deputies of the States, and the baron d'Opdam, general of the Dutch horse, taking with him twenty-five soldiers under the command of a lieutenant, by way of guard: next morning he was joined at Ruremonde by Mynheer Coehorn, a famous engineer in the service of the States; and having dined with the prince of Holstein-Beck, commander of that garrison, continued his voyage, escorted by fifty troopers, who rode along-side of the river; but the boats being separated in the night, a party of fifty-three men of the garrison of Guelder (the only place the French now retained in that province) who lay skulking on the banks of the Maese, near three leagues on this side of Venlo, in wait of prey, observing the boat, seized the rope by which it was drawn* by surprise, and hauling it on shore, immediately made a discharge of their small arms upon the boat wherein their Excellencies were, and then entering seized upon the boat; and having examined the several passports, without knowing my lord Marlborough, they afterwards searched the trunks and baggage, from whence they took what plate they could find, and made their Excellencies guard prisoners. About five in the morning they retired with their booty, leaving the earl and his companions to pursue their voyage.

The governor of Venlo hearing of this transaction, took it for granted that the earl of Marlborough was made prisoner, and carried into Guelder, whereupon he marched out with his whole garrison to attack that place. The same account being carried to the Hague, filled all minds with the utmost consternation: the states forthwith assembling, resolved that all their forces should march instantly, and threaten the garrison with the utmost extremity, unless they would immediately release the general: but before these orders could be dispatched the earl arrived at the Hague, to the no small joy of the people, and was complimented on his happy escape by the pensionary Heinsius, in the name of the States†.

In the mean time the duke of Bavaria, who had hitherto professed a neutrality, having declared for France, had surprised Ulm, an imperial city, and the capital of Suabia: whereupon the Imperial Diet assembled at Ratisbon, and by a plurality of voices resolved to declare war against the French king and the duke of Anjou (as they stiled the new king of Spain) and they desired his imperial majesty to act against the duke according to the constitution of the empire, and use his authority for recovering the city of Ulm, and to require the said duke to abstain from all attempts of the like nature for the future. Hereupon the duke (elector) of Bavaria published a manifesto, giving the circles of Suabia and Franconia to understand, that he expected they should observe a strict neutrality in this war, which did not concern the empire in general, but only the house of Austria: but several dispatches having been intercepted, by which it appeared that the Bavarians designed to penetrate into the territories of Brisgaw with ten thousand men, and to have posted themselves upon the Rhine near Hunninguen, the princes of the empire were incensed to such a degree, that they forbade the ministers of the elector of Bavaria and Cologne to appear any more in the general diet. The emperor used all means to reduce the elector of Bavaria to his duty; but neither promises nor threats had any effect: for having made himself master of Ulm, he marched towards the forest-towns, with a design to join the French army: but not succeeding in that attempt, the Switzers having secured the passes, he was obliged to return to his own country; and the declaration of war by the empire was published and notified to the cardinal Lamberg, the emperor's commissioner at the diet, on the thirtieth of September, by the direction of the elector of Mentz, in the name of the diet. The reasons assigned were, "That France had attacked the empire by invading in his own and the duke of Anjou's name, several fiefs of the empire in Italy, the archbishopric of Cologne, and the bishopric of Liege; as also by disturbing the trade on the Rhine, and committing several other hostilities, which rendered this a necessary defensive war on the part of the empire‡.

In the mean time, prince Lewis of Baden being weakened by several detachments he had made to prevent the junction of the French and Bavarians, had reduced his army to eight thousand men; in which situation he was surprized and attacked by marshal Villars on the 13th of October, near Friedlinguen*, where was fought a sharp and doubtful battle, in which both sides claimed the victory: Villars, because he took Friedlinguen the next day; and the prince, because he had gained his point in preventing the junction of the French and the Bavarians.

And now the empire having declared war against France, the diet came to a resolution to maintain an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men, but fell miserably short, as will be too evident in the ensuing history.

The elector of Bavaria's declaring for France had so embarrassed the emperor, that he was unable to send those reinforcements into Italy which he had promised prince Eugene; and his army, the best by far the emperor had, was suffered to moulder away for want of recruits. The prince thus neglected, had the mortification to behold the duke of Vendôme relieve Mantua, without being able to interrupt his operations; nay, he was himself obliged to relinquish some other places he had taken: nor was this all; for Philip V. the new king of Spain, being desirous of finishing the Italian war in person, had set sail for Naples; and after some stay there joined the duke of Vendôme in Lombardy. However, prince Eugene attacked their united forces, though forty thousand strong, on the fifteenth of August, and, according to the German account, obtained the victory, though the French gave out that their army gained the day, and sung Te Deum for it as well as the Germans. It was certainly a very bloody battle, and both sides had so much of it that they did not chuse to renew the fight the next day. The French however made themselves masters of the town of Luzzara, and prince Eugene on his side maintained all the rest of his posts. There happened no farther action in Italy this campaign†.

The north of Germany was now united in the interest of the confederates; and the princes would have been in a condition to assist them effectually, had not the neighbourhood of the war in Poland determined them from parting from their forces. England and the States-general in vain endeavoured this year to mediate a peace between the kings of Sweden and of Poland. Charles XII. was now become enamoured of war, and his ambitious soul was continually meditating fresh conquests. He threatened to invade Saxony through the dominions of Prussia. Augustus retired to Cracow, while Charles penetrated to Warsaw, and even ordered the cardinal primate to summon a diet for chusing a new king‡. The elector of Saxony was too hard pressed by Charles to spare his full proportion of troops to the allies, and the king of Prussia was overawed by the vicinity of the Swedish conqueror; so that although this war did not so immediately concern the confederacy as tho'e already mentioned, it had an ill effect by the Swedes and Saxons not sending their quota of troops for service.

Another war broke out this year in the Cevennes mountains of Languedoc, chiefly inhabited by French protestants, who being grievously oppressed by the government on the score of their religion, had recourse to arms, and defended themselves for several years. This insurrection was so far advantageous to the allies, that it obliged the French king to keep ten or twelve thousand men in that province to observe their motions. It remains to observe, that towards the latter end of October count Tallard and the marquis de Lomarie, with a body of eighteen thousand men, reduced Triers§ and Traerbach¶, while the prince of Hesse-Cassel, with a detachment from the allied army at Liege, retook from the French Zinch, Lintz, Brisac, and Andernach, towns on the Rhine.

While these things were transacting on the continent, the allies were not wanting in a proper attention to their naval preparations. The late king, a little before his death, had formed a design to reduce Cadiz; and this scheme was now proposed to be resumed, as the most likely means, if it succeeded, of putting an end to all the French designs, and obliging them to compromise matters to the satisfaction at least of the maritime powers. The plan was certainly very well laid, and conducted with surprising secrecy; for though the preparing so great an armament could not be hid, yet the intent of it was so effectually concealed, that France, Spain, and Portugal too, then in alliance with France and Spain, had equal cause to be alarmed, which had consequences very favourable to the grand alliance in those countries, as will hereafter more fully appear.

After the queen's accession, sir George Rooke was declared admiral of the fleet, and the duke of Ormond general of the land-forces to be employed on this expedition; and the Dutch having joined our fleet with their squadron, which had also its quota of troops on board, the admiral hoisted the Union flag on board the Royal Sovereign on the thirtieth of May; and on the first of June his royal highness the prince of Denmark dined on board the admiral, and took a view of the fleet and army, which was soon in a condition to sail. It consisted of fifty ships of the line, thirty English, and twenty Dutch; the former commanded by sir George Rooke, who had under him the admirals Fairborne, Hopson, and Graydon; the latter, by the vice-admirals Allemond, Callemburgh, Vandergoes, Pieterfon, and Wassenauer. The transports had on board about fourteen thousand land-forces; the English headed by the generals Bellasis, O'Hara, and lord Portmore, the colonels Seymour, Hamilton, and Matthews; and the Dutch commanded by baron Sparre and brigadier Pa-

Palandt *. The direction of the whole, as I have before observed, was committed to the duke of Ormond, who acted as commander in chief.

It was the first of July before the fleet set sail: on that day they put to sea, and standing to the westward, were joined off Plymouth by five other men of war; so that the whole fleet, including the transports, amounted to two hundred sail. On the seventh the fleet meeting with contrary winds, were forced to bear away for Torbay, where they lost their chief engineer colonel Brown. On the tenth of July they set sail again, and on the eighth of August they made the Rock of Lisbon; whereupon the admiral sent the Kent and Pembroke into the harbour, and the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, and Mr. Methuen the envoy's son, came into the fleet from Lisbon. They brought advice that there were in that harbour six French men of war and two galleys, and that the French commodore had desired leave of the governor to search her majesty's ships the Adventure and Leostoff, that brought the prince of Hesse and Mr. Methuen thither; but the governor answered, that the English were not their enemies, and they were obliged to protect them while they lay under their cannon. At the approach of the confederate fleet the Portuguese fired their beacons to alarm the country, being under some apprehensions. Their fears however were soon quieted; for on the eleventh of August a council of sea and land officers was held on board the admiral, and the next day sir George Rooke steered away for Cadiz, where the whole fleet arrived about five in the afternoon, and cast anchor in the bay of Bulls, about two leagues distance from the city.

In order to furnish the reader with a clearer idea of the operations of the fleet and army in this expedition, I shall here subjoin a description of the city and port of Cadiz, with its environs.

Cadiz is a famous trading city and sea-port of Andalusia, in Spain, on the north-west extremity of a long neck of land in an island extending from south-east to north-west, the west part of which is Cadiz, and the south-east the island of Leon, opposite to Port St. Mary's, being joined to the main land, from which it is separated by a narrow channel of the sea, by the bridge Suaco; both extremities of which are defended by redoubts and other works. This island, from fort St. Catherine's to the isle St. Pedro, is five miles long, and from the south point near the latter, to the north near Suaco bridge, two miles broad. The neck of land extending from this quadrangular island is at first very small, afterwards it becomes broader, has several windings and angles, and terminates in two capes, the principal of which, namely that to the west, is called St. Sebastian's. The island on which Cadiz stands and the opposite shore form a bay twelve miles long, and about six in breadth; but near the middle of the bay are two points of land, one on the continent and the other the island, five hundred fathoms asunder, on which are the forts Puntal and Matagorda, commanding the passage; and within the points is a large and very good harbour, which no enemy can enter till these forts are taken. This city contains about five thousand houses and fifty thousand inhabitants; it is the center of all the American trade, where the galleons take in their loadings, and return with the treasures and rich merchandize of Peru and Mexico. Cadiz, which is of a pretty large circuit, is surrounded with walls and irregular bastions, and mostly inaccessible, by reason of a steep coast, rocks, and sand-banks.

An hour before day, on the thirteenth of August, the duke of Ormond sent sir Thomas Smith, quarter-master-general, with colonel Carls, chief engineer, and some other officers, to take a view of the back part of the island of Leon (on which Cadiz stands), next the ocean, and to sound the shore, proposing to have landed on that side. The admiral also sent out to get intelligence, and having gained what information they could, a council of war, consisting of all the admirals and generals, was held the next day, being the fourteenth. In this council the duke of Ormond strenuously insisted upon landing on the island (where, according to report, there were very convenient bays to make a descent), in order to a sudden and vigorous attack of the town, where the consternation was so great, that, in all probability, the enterprize would have succeeded; but several of the council, especially the sea-officers, opposed the duke's motion, upon information they had received, that the enemy had about four thousand well-disciplined foot in the town, and a thousand horse (veteran troops), besides the militia that was assembled for the guard of the coast; and as the fleet could give no assistance to the land-forces after they were on shore, nor even supply them with provisions, if it should prove blowing weather, the landing directly on the island of Leon was represented as an impracticable attempt: it was therefore resolved by the majority of the council, that the army should first take the fort of St. Catherine and the town and port of St. Mary's, on the opposite shore of the continent, which would facilitate a nearer approach to Cadiz. This resolution being agreed to, the same evening a boat was sent to Cadiz from the admiral, with a flag of truce and some declarations; and the next day the duke of Ormond sent a trumpet with a letter to the duke of Brancaccio, governor of fort St. Catherine's, summoning him to surrender, declaring, that if he did not accept his terms, he should be hanged, and none of his soldiers receive any quarter. To this the governor answered, with great spirit and justice, "That if he must be hanged, it was all one to him whether by the duke of Ormond or the governor of Cadiz, and therefore desired leave to send to him for his orders," which was refused †. These harsh measures, with the subsequent behaviour of the English troops, instead of drawing the Spaniards to declare for the house of Austria, rendered them averse to it.

On the fifteenth of August, the duke of Ormond landed his forces in the Bay of Bulls, about a mile on the left of St. Catherine's fort, the cannon of which fired on his men, but with little execution. The first that landed were twelve hundred grenadiers, led by brigadier Palandt and the earl of Donnegal; but the wind was so high, and the sea beat on the shore with such violence, that several men were drowned, and the rest were obliged to wade up to their neck, which the enemy's horse observing, came down, and furiously attacked the English; but they were so warmly received, that they soon retired, leaving their general and several of their companions dead upon the place, and a Spanish captain and cornet, with some others, were made prisoners. Our foot were all happily landed that day, and marched within two miles of Rota, lying all night upon their arms in the field. Early the next morning the duke of Ormond continued his march towards Rota, and was met near the town by the alcaide, or chief magistrate, with the principal inhabitants, who offered to put it into his hands; whereupon the duke took up his quarters in the castle of Rota, while the army encamped before the town.

The duke now published a declaration, inviting the Spaniards to join the allies; and the prince of Hesse Darmstadt also published one, in the emperor's name, to the same purport, which he caused to be distributed in the neighbouring towns. The duke's declaration set forth, That the queen of Great Britain having been pleased to confer on his grace the command of her forces (in conjunction with those of the States-general), for asserting the rights of the house of Austria, in pursuance of their treaties of alliance with the emperor, his grace judged it necessary, before he made use of force, to declare that he did not come thither to possess himself of any place in Spain in the name of her majesty and the States-general, or to introduce the calamities of war by way of conquest, but rather to defend the good and loyal subjects of the said monarchy, and free them from the insupportable slavery of France, to whom they had been sold by some disaffected persons; concluding with an invitation of the Spaniards to join him, and they should thereupon be protected in their persons, estates, privileges, and religion; but if, contrary to expectation, they did not concur with the good intention of her majesty and the States, the hostilities committed by their forces must be ascribed to the Spaniards themselves, who having so fair an opportunity to shew their loyalty and pursue their own interests, refused to embrace it*."

While his grace continued at Rota, he summoned the governor of Port St. Mary's to surrender; to which the haughty Spaniard returned for answer, "Nos otros Espagnoles no mudamos de religion ni de rey. — We Spaniards neither change our religion nor our king." However, on the duke's advancing to Port St. Mary's on the twenty-first, the governor and his garrison, with most of the inhabitants, thought fit to abandon the city: the governor of St. Catherine's fort also retired out of the place, leaving only an ensign and a small party in it, which surrendered at discretion. Although the duke of Ormond, before the army reached Port St. Mary's had given strict orders against plundering, yet it was not in the power of the officers to restrain their famished and thirsty soldiers from forcing open the houses where they expected to find refreshments; nor was it long before they made their way to the cellars, which they found stored with rich and strong wines, where they caroused all the first night. The next day, their licentiousness being heightened by the fumes of their liquor, they proceeded to rifle and pillage the houses, and commit every other species of outrage; and even some of the officers, being intoxicated, joined with their men, and, calling in the sailors to their assistance, carried the spoils of the place on board the fleet, which are said to have amounted in value to above a million of money; for they even plundered the churches and altars of their plate and ornaments. These hostilities so enraged the Spaniards, that many, who before designed to have joined the confederates and declared in favour of the house of Austria, now adhered firmly to Philip V. The duke of Ormond was so incensed at these violences, committed in open defiance of his orders, that he commanded sir Henry Bellasis, and sir Charles O'Hara, who had the command of those troops that took possession of the place, to be put under arrest; and would have proceeded with greater severity, if the criminals had been less numerous.

The garrison of Cadiz having by this time recovered their consternation, and sunk three galleons at the entrance of the passage of Puntal, to prevent the confederate fleet from entering the harbour, and the marquis de las Fillidarias, governor of Andalusia, having received great reinforcements, and drew down his army between Xeres and Port St. Mary; hereupon the duke of Ormond marched his forces out of the latter on the twenty-fifth, and encamped at Santa Victoria, where he caused his declaration to be solemnly read through the town, and at the head of every regiment, whereby he forbade plundering on pain of death. But as the late excesses had made the Spaniards so much our enemies, that it was evident nothing could be expected in Spain, but what could be obtained by pure force, baron Sparre, the Dutch general, was ordered to invest the fort of Matagorda, which defended the entrance into the harbour of Cadiz; but the ground was so loose and swampy, that the batteries, which were raised without any madriers, or fascines, to support them, sunk at every discharge, and the taking that fort was found impracticable. The Spanish army also being daily augmented, and that of the confederates diminished by the flux, and provisions growing scarce, and the admiral being of opinion that the season was so far advanced, that he could not remain longer in those seas without great hazard to her majesty's fleet, it was determined to reinbark the troops, which was performed with little or no loss; and the fleet set sail for England, full of vexation for the disappointment they had met with*. Providence, however, put it in their power to do their country a more signal and effectual service than even the taking of Cadiz would have been.

Captain Hardy, commander of the Pembroke, having been detached with some ships to Lagos (a harbour on the Portuguese coast), to fetch water for the fleet, there heard that M. Chateau Renauld with a Squadron of French men of war and the Spanish flota were put into Vigo, a sea-port of Galicia, in Spain, situated in Bayonne Bay, at the mouth of a spacious harbour. Upon this news he sailed back to the grand fleet, and having fallen in with it on the sixth of October, gave the admiral an account of what he had learned. Sir George, delighted with the information, sent notice of it to the Dutch admiral, and declared it his opinion that they all should steer directly for Vigo; to which purpose, the next day he called a council of flag and general-officers; when the admiral's proposal being unanimously approved, orders were given for bending their course to the said port with all the speed that might be. But the wind proving very contrary, it was the eleventh of the month before they could gain the port; and though it was not to be entered without great difficulty, that work was performed without any considerable disaster. The weather proved so hazy, that the town of Vigo never discovered the fleet till they were just upon it; and though they fired very smartly upon our ships, we took very little notice of it, but bore up for the harbour, where the French fleet and the galleons lay,

The passage into the harbour, which was not above three quarters of a mile over, was defended by batteries, forts, and breast-works, on each side; by a strong boom, consisting of iron chains, top-masts, and cables, moored at each end to a seventy-gun ship; within this boom were moored five ships of the same force, with their broadsides to the entrance of the passage, so as to fire at any ship that should attempt to approach the boom, forts, and platform*.

As soon as the fleet came to an anchor, the admiral called a council of war of the general sea and land-officers, wherein it was concluded, that since the passage into the harbour was so narrow, that the whole fleet could not attempt the enemy's ships and galleons without running foul of each other, a detachment of fifteen English and ten Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ships, should be sent to take and destroy the enemy's fleet; that the frigates and bomb-vessels should follow the rear of this detachment; and that the great ships should move after them, and go in if there was occasion: it was resolved also, that the land-forces should be put on shore at the same time, and attack the forts that defended the entrance of the harbour; and to give the better countenance to the service, it was farther resolved, that all the flag-officers should go in with the squadrons; but as the first and second rates of the combined fleets were too large to enter, the admirals shifted their flags into smaller ships.

On the twelfth of October, the duke of Ormond, pursuant to the resolution of the council of war, landed early in the morning, in a sandy bay, about six miles from Vigo, with two thousand five hundred men; and not meeting with any opposition, he ordered the grenadiers to march, under the command of lord Shannon, directly to the fort that guarded the entrance of the harbour, where the boom lay, which he performed with the most intrepid gallantry; and though there appeared at the same time about eight thousand Spanish foot between the fort and the hills, they only made a shew, retiring, after some slight skirmishes with the grenadiers, who also drove before them another party of the enemy, followed them to the fort, and made themselves masters of the lower battery; whereupon lieutenant-general Churchill's (brother to the earl of Marlborough) regiment advanced upon the left, and took their posts. After the two batteries were taken, the enemy retired into an old castle, or stone tower, and fired from thence upon the English for some small time; but opening the gate in order to make a sally, the grenadiers forced their way into the place sword in hand, and obliged the garrison, consisting of French and Spaniards, in number about three hundred and fifty, to surrender prisoners of war. This was a conquest of great importance in respect to the fleet, since our ships would have been excessively galled by the fire from the platform and fort†.

As soon as the land-forces were on shore, the admiral made a signal to weigh, which was accordingly done, the line formed, and the squadron was briskly bearing up to the boom; but when the van was got within cannon-shot of the batteries, it fell calm, so that they were under a necessity to cast anchor; but a fresh gale springing up soon after, they cut their cables, and stood directly for the boom. Vice-admiral Hopson, in the Torbay, broke through at once; but the rest of his division, and vice-admiral Vandergoes with his detachment, who sailed abreast to add a greater weight to the shock, all stuck, and were obliged to cut their way through. The passage being thus opened, the whole squadron entered the harbour through a terrible fire from the enemy's ships and batteries, which, however, in a little time they silenced, though vice-admiral Hopson narrowly escaped from a fire-ship, by which he was boarded: several of his men, during the first consternation, having thrown themselves into the sea, were drowned; and his ship was so much damaged, that he was obliged to shift his flag on board the Monmouth.

After a most desperate engagement, the French, finding themselves unable to contend against the superior force and valour of the assailants, resolved to set fire to their ships and galleons, to prevent their falling into the hands of the victors. They accordingly burnt eight ships and as many advice-boats; but ten French ships of war were taken, together with eleven galleons, though they had secured a considerable part of their plate and merchandize, on the appearance of the combined fleet. The value of fourteen millions of pieces of eight, in plate and rich commodities, was destroyed in six galleons that perished, but about half that value was brought off by the conquerors; so that this was a dreadful blow to the enemy, and a noble acquisition to the allies. When the action was over, the duke of Ormond proposed to have made himself master of Vigo, and to have wintered in Spain, if the admiral could have spared him a squadron of men of war and provisions for his troops; but the admiral declaring he could not furnish the troops with provisions for more than two months, the land-forces were re embarked, and, on the nineteenth of October, sir George Rooke, with twenty sail of men of war, set sail for England, leaving sir Cloudesley Shovel, who joined the fleet two or three days before, to convoy home the prizes; whereupon sir Cloudesley, having burnt the ships that could not be got off, and taken one hundred and ten brass cannon out of the enemy's ships and batteries, followed the grand fleet a few days after, which arrived safely in the Downs on the seventh of November; from whence the great ships were, about the middle of the month, sent up to Chatham‡.

Among the successes of this year must not be forgot those we gained under that brave sea-officer commodore Leake, who took, in the French harbours in Newfoundland, this summer, twenty-nine sail of the enemy, and burnt twenty-two more, destroying all the stages and settlements of the French in and near Newfoundland. Admiral Bembow also protected the English trade in the West Indies, harassed the Spanish settlements, and made several prizes; but, unhappily, the glory of our arms was tarnished by the behaviour of a few treacherous miscreants, who owed their advancement to interest, without any personal merit.

The admiral understanding that monsieur du Casse, with a French squadron, was expected at Hispaniola, determined to go in quest of him. On the nineteenth day of August he came up with the enemy, near St. Martha. The French squadron consisted of ten sail, viz. four of seventy guns, one of forty, and the rest small frigates: admiral Bembow had with him seven sail, viz. the Breda (his own ship) of seventy guns; the Defiance of sixty-four; the Ruby, of fifty-four; the Pendennis, Greenwich, Windsor, and Falmouth, of fifty each. The admiral, in the Breda, with the Falmouth, captain Vincent, and Ruby, captain Walton, began the engagement; but the other four ships fell astern, and scarce fired a shot: however, admiral Bembow pursued the enemy, and continued a running fight for five days, when one of the enemy's men of war appeared quite disabled. But the French by this time discovering that the admiral was not seconded by the rest of his captains, fell furiously upon him, and he had the misfortune to have his leg shattered to pieces by a chain-shot; however, he ordered his cradle to be brought upon deck, and still continued the fight, till the captains who had so basely deserted him, coming on board, and alleging the French were too strong, and therefore desiring him to desist, the admiral, apprehensive, from what he had seen of their conduct, that if he withstood their importunities, they might desert to the enemy, returned to Jamaica; where, enraged at the treachery of his captains, he issued a commission to rear-admiral Whetstone, and other officers, to hold a court-martial, and try them for cowardice. Hudson, of the Pendennis, died before the trial; Kirby, of the Defiance, and Wade, of the Greenwich, were convicted, and sentenced to be shot; Constable, of the Windsor, was cashiered and imprisoned; Vincent, of the Falmouth, and Fogg, the admiral's own captain, were convicted of having signed a paper that they would not fight on the present occasion; but as they had behaved gallantly in the action, the court inflicted on them no other punishment than that of a suspension, nor was that to take place till the lord high-admiral's pleasure should be known. Wade and Kirby were sent home in the Bristol, and, upon their arrival at Plymouth, shot on board the ship, by order of a dead-warrant for their immediate execution, which had lain there for some time. Bembow himself was so deeply affected by this miscarriage, that he became melancholy, and his grief co-operating with the fever occasioned by his wound put a period to his life. The boisterous manners of Bembow had produced this base confederacy, which deprived England of one of the bravest sea-officers that ever she produced*. When Du Casse arrived at Carthagena, he wrote a letter to admiral Bembow to this effect:

"Sir,

"I had little hope on Monday last, but to have supped in your cabin, but it pleased God to order it otherwise: I am thankful for it. As for those cowardly captains who deserted you, hang them up, for by G--d they deserve it.

Your's,

Du Casse."

The last sea adventure I shall mention, is that in which admiral sir John Munden was engaged; and indeed, in point of time, it ought to have been taken notice of sooner. This gentleman, while the grand fleet lay at Spithead preparing for the Cadiz expedition, was detached, with a squadron of men of war, to intercept the same Du Casse whom Bembow afterwards so unfortunately engaged in the West Indies. Sir John Munden came up with the French admiral off the Groyn, on the coast of Spain, but did not think fit to attack him, for which he was tried by a court-martial; and though he was acquitted by his brethren the officers of the fleet, there appeared such marks of cowardice and treachery in his conduct, that the queen thought proper to cashier him. But notwithstanding, in some instances, we fell short of success in our sea-enterprizes this year, yet the advantages we gained furnished sufficient proofs how much it was the interest of this nation to make the sea the principal theatre of our martial efforts, both in Europe and America. Our successes in Flanders, however, were so dazzling, that we neglected the sea-war too much, to maintain vast armies in the Netherlands, where we were rather losers by the conquests we made for the Dutch and Germans on that side, our charges annually increasing in proportion to the acquisitions of our confederates.

Thus having surveyed the several scenes of war abroad, it is time now to return to England, where we find, that although the parliament ought regularly to have sat for six months after the king's decease, the queen dissolved it by proclamation on the second of July, and issued writs for calling another, which was to meet in the beginning of August. Her majesty's attachment to the Tories was so well known, and these latter had, by their writings and speeches, so prejudiced the nation against their adversaries the Whigs, that they obtained a considerable majority in the new parliament, which was afterwards prorogued to the eighth of October, and at last to the twentieth of that month.

In the mean time the queen was employed in securing the affections of her subjects: with this view she made a progress to Oxford, Bath, and Bristol, accompanied by her consort, prince George of Denmark, and was received with uncommon marks of loyalty and affection by the people in every place through which she passed. Her majesty, before her setting out on this progress, gave a public audience† to the count de Platens, envoy extraordinary from the elector of Hanover; and about the same time she made some promotions in the army, and disposed of several places and preferments: and on the nineteenth of July her majesty, in council, made an order against selling of offices and places in the household and family.

On Wednesday the twentieth of October the new parliament (the first of this reign) met, and the commons having chosen Mr. Robert Harley for their speaker, the queen made a speech to both houses, wherein she observed, that she had called them together to assist her in carrying on the just and necessary war in which the nation was engaged; that she was willing the commons should examine the accounts of the public receipts and payments; that if any abuses or mismanagements had been committed they might be detected, and the offenders brought to condign punishment. She told them, that the funds assigned by the last parliament, had fallen short of the sums proposed to be raised by them; although she had already paid and applied to the public service the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, which she had promised the last parliament; which, however, had not made up the deficiency. It was with great concern, she said, that she took notice to them of the disappointment of the expedition against Cadiz, as well as the abuses committed at Port St. Mary's, which had obliged her to give directions for an enquiry into the particulars. She expressed her desire that the parliament would find time to consider of some better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and improve that manufacture, which she was determined to encourage. She declared herself fully convinced, that the affections of her subjects were the surest pledge of their duty and obedience; that she was resolved to maintain the church as by law established, and protect her subjects in the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges, considering their interest and her own as inseparable; and that she would always exert her utmost endeavours to make them a happy and flourishing people*.

The lords returned the usual address of thanks to this speech, congratulating her majesty on the success of her arms under the earl of Marlborough. The commons were more particular, and in their address made several invidious reflections on the late reign. Among other things, they remarked, "that the wonderful progress of her majesty's arms, under the earl of Marlborough, had signally retrieved the ancient honour and glory of the English nation†." The word retrieved in this part of the commons address, occasioned several warm debates in the house, it being said to carry an evident reflection on the memory of the late king, as if the honour of the nation had been lost, or had greatly suffered, in his reign; and the word maintained was proposed to be inserted in the room of it: but the Tories, who introduced and supported the first expression, gained their point, and, upon a division, retrieved was carried, one hundred and eighty against eighty.

This being the first year of her majesty's reign, she was pleased to honour the city of London with her presence at dinner, on the Lord-mayor's day, where she was received with all possible demonstrations of joy and loyalty: and the next day, being the thirtieth of October, the lord Shannon arrived from the confederate fleet, with the news of its signal success over the French and Spaniards at Vigo. The house of commons, very unanimously and with great dispatch, agreed to all the demands of the court, and voted all the supplies that were necessary for carrying on the war: they decreed forty thousand men to the sea-service; and that the proportion of forces for England, to act in conjunction with those of the allies, should be thirty-three thousand foot and seven thousand horse and dragoons; and that three hundred and fifty thousand pounds be granted for guards and garrisons for the year 1703: they also voted seventy thousand nine hundred and thirty-three pounds for ordnance; eight hundred thirty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty-six pounds for the pay of the land-forces; and fifty-one thousand eight hundred and forty-three pounds for subsidies to the allies: at the same time, however, the commons shewed so much regard to their own rights, that they resolved, that justice had not been done them upon the impeachments of the earl of Orford, and other three lords, before the house of peers, in the thirteenth year of the late reign; but this resolution was not followed by a revival of those prosecutions. The next thing that came under their consideration, was a complaint, exhibited by sir John Packington, against the bishop of Worcester and Mr. Lloyd, his son, for certain undue practices to prevent his election for the county of Worcester; and the house, having examined into that matter, resolved, "that sir John Packington had, by evidence, fully made out the charge he had brought against the lord bishop of Worcester." Whereupon the house addressed her majesty to remove the said bishop from being almoner to her majesty, and gave directions to Mr. Attorney-general to prosecute Mr. Lloyd, the bishop's son, for his share in that offence‡.

The lords, alarmed at these proceedings of the commons, which they looked upon as an infringement of the privileges of their house, presented a counter-address to her majesty, beseeching her not to remove the bishop of Worcester from his place of lord-almoner, until he should be found guilty of some crime by due course of law, it being the undoubted right of every lord of parliament, and of every subject of England, to have an opportunity of making his own defence, before he suffer any kind of punishment. This address being presented to the queen, she returned for answer, "that she had not as yet received any complaint against the bishop of Worcester, but that she looked upon it as her undoubted right to continue or displace any servant attending upon her own person, when she should think proper." The lords, piqued at this reply, resolved the same day unanimously, "That no lord of their house ought to suffer any kind of punishment by any proceedings of the house of commons, otherwise than according to the known and ancient rules and methods of parliament||." But sir Edward Seymour attending her majesty with the resolution of the house of commons for removing the bishop of Worcester, the queen answered, "that she was very sorry there was occasion for this address against the bishop; and she would direct that he should no longer continue to fill the office of almoner:" for which answer the commons returned her majesty their most humble thanks. Thus did the Tories triumph over all opposition; but, like most parties when uppermost, they made a very partial and arbitrary use of their power, of which I shall present the reader with the following glaring instance: Mr. John Howe, knight of the shire for Gloucester, had drawn up an address for that county to the queen on her accession, in which were the most bitter reflections on the memory of the late king. By this act, and his subsequent behaviour in the house of commons, he had incurred the censure and disgust of the more moderate and unprejudiced part of his constituents, insomuch that when, on the election for this new parliament, he stood for the shire, he was thrown out by a great majority: yet such was his credit in the house, that the return in favour of his competitor was adjudged illegal and insufficient, and Mr. Howe was declared duly elected.

The twelfth of November being appointed for a public thanksgiving for the successes of the campaign, the queen went to St. Paul's, attended by both houses of parliament and the great officers of state. The duke of Ormond, now returned from his expedition, happening to be one of the staff-officers in waiting, rode in one of the queen's coaches with the duke of Somerset, and was hailed with the loudest acclamations by the innumerable spectators assembled on this occasion; and from that day may be dated the great popularity which he afterwards acquired, and which in the end proved fatal to him. His grace coming into the house of lords the next day, the lord-keeper (sir Nathan Wright) in the name of the house, returned him thanks for his signal services performed at Vigo. On the other hand, the commons drew up an address to the queen, desiring she would cause the duke of Ormond and sir George Rooke to lay before them an account of their proceedings, a request with which her majesty complied: but at the same time they gave those two officers the thanks of their house for their gallant achievements at Vigo. Sir George Rooke was afterwards, by the queen's order, sworn of the privy-council.

On the twenty-first of November the queen sent a message to the house of commons by Mr. secretary Hedges, importing, That her majesty, considering that there was but a very slender provision made for the prince her husband if he should survive her; and that she was restrained from increasing the same by the late act of parliament for settling the revenue, thought it necessary to recommend the making a further provision for the prince to their consideration. The commons having taken the message into consideration, it was unanimously resolved, That the yearly sum of one hundred thousand pounds be settled upon his royal highness, in case he should survive her majesty. About this time Thomas Colepepper, esq. one of the Kentish petitioners who had been so troublesome to the house in the late reign, presented a petition of another nature, acknowledging the just offence he had given to the house of commons, declaring his sorrow for the same, and humbly praying that the house would be pleased to interpose with her majesty in his behalf, to give orders to her attorney-general to surcease farther proceedings in the prosecution against him. Upon this petition and his publicly acknowledging his offence, and craving pardon for the same at the commons' bar, that house was pleased to address the queen to stop the prosecution against him, which had been set on foot at their desire; and thus this matter ended.

And now the earl of Marlborough being returned from Holland, he also received the thanks of both houses for his signal services this campaign: and on the second of December her majesty declared in the committee of council, that she was so satisfied of the eminent services of lord Marlborough to the public and herself, both in the command of the army, and the entire confidence he had settled between her majesty and her allies the States-general, that she intended to create him a duke; and on the tenth of the same month she sent the following message to the house of commons:

A N N E R.

"The earl of Marlborough's services to her majesty and to the public have been so eminent, both in his command of the army and in his having established an entire confidence and good correspondence between her majesty and the States-general, that she has thought fit to grant the title of a duke of this kingdom to him and to the heirs-male of his body, and also a pension of five thousand pounds per annum upon the revenue of the Post-office, for the support of his honour during her majesty's life: if it had been in her majesty's power, she would have granted the same term in the pension as in the honour; and she hopes you will think it so reasonable in this case as to find some proper methods of doing it."

This message occasioned great debates in the house; and one member in particular said, that he would not derogate from the duke's eminent services, but insisted that he was very well paid for them, and then took notice of the profitable employments enjoyed by him and his duchess. The result was an address, shewing their inexpressible grief that her majesty's most dutiful and loyal commons saw any instances where they were unable to comply with what her majesty proposed to them; but they begged leave humbly to lay before her majesty the apprehension they had of making a precedent for the future alienation of the revenue of the crown, which had been so much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the last reign, and which had been so lately settled and secured by her majesty's unparalleled grace and goodness: they however declared themselves infinitely pleased to observe, by her majesty's late gracious acceptance of the duke of Marlborough's services, that the only way to obtain her majesty's favour was to deserve well of the public; and begged leave to assure her majesty, that whenever she should think fit to reward such merit, it would be to the entire satisfaction of her people*. To this address, which in many parts of it highly reflected on the late king's person and reign, the queen only answered, That she should always think herself much concerned to reward those who had deserved well of her, and that on this account she had bestowed some favours on the duke of Marlborough, and was glad to find they thought them well placed. As this proceeding of the queen demonstrates the great influence the duke and dutchess of Marlborough had then over her, so it is thought the refusal of the commons began to alienate the duke from the Tories. It is very remarkable, that neither bishop Burnet nor the dutchess of Marlborough, in the vindication of her conduct, make the least mention of this circumstance.

I must here observe, that a clause having been added to the bill for settling the prince of Denmark's revenue, exempting that prince from that part of the act of succession, by which strangers, though naturalized, were rendered incapable of holding employments, it occasioned very warm debates. The clause related only to those who should be naturalized in a future reign, and was calculated as a restriction on the house of Hanover. Many members argued against this clause of exemption, because it seemed to imply that persons already naturalized would be excluded from employments in the next reign, though already possessed of the right of natural-born subjects; a consequence plainly contradictory to the meaning of the act. Others opposed it, because the lords had already resolved by a vote, that they would never pass any money-bill sent up from the commons, to which a clause foreign to the bill should be tacked; and this clause they affirmed to be a tack, as an incapacity to hold employments was a circumstance altogether different from a settlement in money. The queen expressed uncommon eagerness in behalf of this bill; and the court-influence was managed so successfully, that it passed through both houses, though not without an obstinate opposition, and a formal protest entered by seven-and-twenty peers*.

The commissioners for stating the public accounts having, by order of the house of commons, examined the accounts of the earl of Ranelagh, pay-master of the army, laid them before the house, with their own observations, in which they bore very hard upon that earl. The commons, after a full hearing of all parties, came to the following resolutions, viz. 1. That it appeared to the house, that the commissioners appointed by act of parliament for taking, examining, and stating the public accounts of the kingdom, had very good grounds for making the observations in their narrative or representation laid before the house. 2. That all monies issued to the pay-master-general of the army ought to be applied to the use of the army and forces only, and to no other purpose whatsoever. 3. That all privy-seals, orders of the Treasury, or other warrants to the pay-master-general of the army, to apply the money in his hands to other than the use of the army and forces, are illegal and void. 4. That all privy-seals or warrants of the auditors of the imprest to pass accounts without proper vouchers, or to make any allowances other than according to the law and course of the Exchequer, are illegal and void. 5. That the said commissioners had made good the allegations in their narrative: and, 6. That the pay-master-general of the army had misapplied several sums of the public money.

The earl of Ranelagh, to avoid any farther animadversions on his management, thought fit to resign his place, which was afterwards supplied by sir Stephen Fox and Mr. Howe as joint pay-masters: but it appears that the noble lord's resignation was not sufficient to appease the commons; for they expelled him their house, of which he was a member, and even addressed her majesty to order the attorney-general to prosecute him. Herein, however, her majesty did not chuse to oblige them. The commons also resolved, that the borrowing of money and striking of tallies, with interest, before the public occasions required, had been one cause of the great debt which the nation had incurred, and that the applying of the public money to the use of the civil list, which was otherwise provided for, was another cause of that debt.

This enquiry into the public accounts produced most violent animosities between the two houses; for the commons having passed several severe resolutions against Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipts of the Exchequer, as having been guilty of a breach of trust, and thereupon addressed the queen to direct her attorney-general to prosecute him for the said offence†; which her majesty, as in the other instance, refused to comply with; the lords, exasperated at the proceedings of the commons, which displayed so much party-rancour and malice, appointed a committee to examine all the observations which the commissioners of accounts had offered to both houses. The result was, that their lordships resolved, That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipts of the Exchequer, had performed the duty of his office according to the antient custom of the Exchequer and the late act of king William III. and that he had not been guilty of any breach of trust: at the same time, they ordered their proceedings to be printed and published. This difference blew up a fierce flame of discord between the two houses, which manifested their mutual animosity in speeches, votes, resolutions, and conferences. The commons affirmed, That no cognizance the lords could take of the public accounts would enable them to supply any deficiency, or appropriate any surplusage of the public money: that they could neither acquit nor condemn any person whatsoever upon any enquiry arising originally in their own house; and that their attempt to acquit lord Halifax was unparliamentary. The lords insisted on their right to take cognizance originally of all public accounts: they affirmed, that in their resolutions with respect to lord Halifax, they had proceeded according to the rules of justice: they owned, however, that their resolutions did not amount to any judgment or acquittal; but that, finding a vote of the house of commons reflected upon a member of their

† The particulars of the resolutions against this noble peer were as follow, viz, " That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipts of the Exchequer, had neglected his duty, and was guilty of a breach of trust in not transmitting the imprest-rolls half-yearly to the king's remembrancer, according to the late statute made in the reign of king William III. that the auditors of the imprest had been guilty of great neglect in not certifying the king's remembrancer of the neglect of the several annual accountants, and that process ought to go against them: that it appeared to the house that there had been a general mismanagement of the public money, by not obliging the accountants to make up their accounts in due time, which was another cause of the national debt: that Charles lord Halifax had been guilty of a breach of trust in not examining, every three months, the tellers vouchers for the payments upon the annuities which he allowed in his weekly certificates, according to the late act, house, they thought fit to give their opinion in their legislative authority. The queen interposed by a message to the lords, desiring they would dispatch the business in which they were engaged; but the disputes between the two houses still continuing, with a warmth that left little hopes of an accommodation, the queen resolved to check their farther progress by putting an end to the session*.

Another thing had occasioned a misunderstanding between the two houses, and took up a great deal of time this session: this was a bill for preventing Occasional Conformity. The Tories affected to distinguish themselves as the only true friends of the church and monarchy, and vehemently inveighed against the dissenters, who constituted great part of the Whig faction, as encroaching schismatics, that disgraced and endangered hierarchy; and in order effectually to humble them, on the fourth of November, Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, and Mr. Annesley, were ordered by the house of commons to bring in the above-mentioned bill†, in the preamble to which all prosecution for conscience sake was condemned. Nevertheless it was enacted, "That all those who had taken the sacrament and test for offices of trust, or the magistracy of corporations, and afterwards frequented any meeting of dissenters, should be disabled from holding their employments, pay a fine of one hundred pounds, and five pounds for every day in which they continued to act in their employments, after having been at any such meeting." They were also rendered incapable of holding any other employment till after one whole year's conformity, and upon a relapse the penalties and time of incapacity were doubled.

The promoters of this bill alleged in support of it, that it was intended only to restrain a very scandalous practice, which is a reproach to religion, gives offence to all good christians, and to the best amongst the dissenters themselves: that this bill enacted nothing new, and was only intended to make the laws in being more effectual: that those laws were thought sufficient to secure our establishment; but since the invention and iniquity of men had found out ways to elude them, it was proper to let those men see the legislature would not be wanting on their parts to prevent those mischiefs which must prove destructive to the church and monarchy; both which the commons declared themselves resolved to maintain and support. It was affirmed, That an established religion and a national church are absolutely necessary, when so many ill men pretend to inspiration, and when there are so many weak men to follow them: that if a national church be necessary, the only effectual way to preserve it is by keeping the civil power in the hands of those whose practices and principles are conformable thereto: that when the corporation-act was made, the parliament had fresh in their minds the confusion and calamities that had been brought upon the nation, by such as pretended to be at the same time in the interest of religion and of their country: that the parliament by that act, and afterwards by the test-act, thought it had secured our establishment both in church and state, and that they had provided a sufficient barrier to defeat and disappoint any attempt against them, never imagining that a set of men would rise up, "whose consciences were too tender to obey the laws, but hardened enough to break them:" that as upon the Revolution the last reign had begun with an act in favour of the dissenters, so the commons did desire that in the beginning of her majesty's auspicious reign, an act might pass in favour of the church of England; that the laws which had been evaded might now be effectually enforced; and that those men might be kept out of offices, who have shewn they never wanted the will, when they had the power, to destroy the church; and that nothing had been more misrepresented than this bill, which did not in any respect encroach on the act of toleration, or take from the dissenters any one privilege they have by law, or give any one privilege to the church of England which was not at least intended her by the laws as they now stand. It was moreover said, that a separation from the church, to which a man's conscience will allow him occasionally to conform, is a mere schism, which in itself was sinful, without the superaddition of a temporal law to make it an offence, and that conforming and nonconforming were contradictions; for nothing but a firm persuasion that the terms of communion required are sinful can justify the one, and this plainly condemns the other.

The members who opposed the bill argued, That the dissenters were generally well-affected to the present constitution: that in the last and greatest danger to which the church was exposed, they zealously asserted her against the papists, their common enemies, and have ever since continued to shew every mark of affection and submission to the government in church and state: that to bring any real hardship upon them, or give rise to jealousies and fears at such a juncture, might be attended with dangerous consequences: that the toleration had greatly contributed to the safety and reputation of the church, and plainly proved that liberty of conscience and gentle measures were the most effectual means for encreasing the votaries of the church, and diminishing the number of dissenters: that the dissenters could not properly be termed schismatics without bringing a heavy charge upon the church of England, which had not only tolerated such schism, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad: that the penalties of this bill were even more severe than those imposed by law upon the papists for assisting at the most solemn act of their religion: in a word, that toleration and tenderness had been always productive of peace and union, whereas persecution had never failed to excite discord and extend superstition.

The bill passed the lower house by a considerable majority, but met with a very warm opposition from the peers, many of whom were in the Whig

* Proceedings of the House of Commons, iii. 247, 260.

† The bill began thus: "As nothing is more contrary to the persuasion of the Christian religion, and particularly to the doctrine of the church of England, than persecution for conscience only, and in due consideration of it, an act passed in the first year of king William and queen Mary, for the exempting ther majesty's protestant subjects dissenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws; which act ought inviolably to be observed, and ease given to consciences truly scrupulous.

interest. Apprehensive that the commons would tack it to some money-bill, they voted, That the annexing any clause to a money-bill was contrary to the constitution of the English government and the usage of parliament. Their lordships, upon perusal of the bill, made several amendments, as, That Jacobite meetings should be included: that one hundred pounds penalty should be reduced to twenty pounds; and that the whole incapacitating clauses should be omitted. They also shortened the terms for information and prosecution, exempted dissenters from holding offices for which they could not be qualified without taking the sacrament, provided that the act should not extend to the university-churches, or to the French and Dutch churches, or to the governors of hospitals, or the assistants of corporations or work-houses for relieving or employing the poor. The commons taking their lordships amendments into consideration, agreed to some of them, but disagreed to others, which occasioned several conferences between the two houses, the managers on the part of the commons being Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, Mr. Finch, Mr. Solicitor-general, and sir Thomas Powis. On the part of the lords, the duke of Devonshire, the earl of Peterborough, the bishop of Salisbury, the lords Somers and Halifax. After long debates the lords adhered to their amendments: the commons persisted in rejecting them; so that conferences broke up, both parties publishing their proceedings as a vindication of their conduct. The court put their whole strength to carry this bill; even prince George came and voted for it, though he was himself an occasional conformist, for he had received the sacrament as lord high-admiral, and yet kept his chapel in the Lutheran way; but when it came to the final vote, the bishops made in the last reign, to the surprize of every one, fell with their whole weight into the scale of the Whigs, and the bill was lost by one voice only *.

A bill was now brought into the lower house, granting another year's consideration to those who had taken the oath abjuring the pretended prince of Wales. This being sent up to the lords, they added three clauses, importing, 1. That those persons who should take the oath within the limited time might return to their benefices and employments, provided they were not already filled. 2. That any person endeavouring to defeat the succession to the crown, as now limited by law, should be deemed guilty of high-treason. 3. That the oath of abjuration should be imposed upon the subjects of Ireland. These amendments occasioned some warm debates in the house of commons, where it was carried only by one voice to agree with the lords, and the bill passed both houses, by which a new security was provided both in England and Ireland for a protestant successor.

I must not forget that the duke of Ormond having, at his return from the Cadiz expedition, thrown out some reflections upon sir George Rooke's conduct, and hinting a design to subject him to a public accusation, the house of lords ordered the admiral's instructions and journals to be laid before a committee appointed for that purpose; and the majority of the house afterwards voted, That sir George Rooke had done his duty, pursuant to the councils of war, like a brave officer, to the honour of the British nation. On the other hand, sir Henry Bellasis was tried by a court-martial of general officers, broke, and dismissed the service: but major-general O'Hara was acquitted by the same court, and his suspension thereupon taken off by her majesty.

About this time the earl of Rochester, finding himself out-weighed in the council by the interest of the duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin, had become sullen and untractable; upon which the queen thought fit to order him to his government of Ireland, which he had never visited since his having been appointed lord-lieutenant. The earl, however, chose rather to resign than comply with this injunction, and that office was bestowed upon the duke of Ormond, who had now acquired great popularity, and was indeed a very accomplished nobleman.

In the beginning of January the queen gave the house of commons to understand, that the States-general had pressed her to augment her forces, as the only means to render ineffectual the great and early preparations of the enemy. The commons immediately resolved that ten thousand men should be hired as an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies: but at the same time, in an address, they intreated her majesty would make it a point with the States-general that they should put an immediate stop to all commerce and correspondence with France and Spain, which the commons said was so absolutely necessary for carrying on the war, to the interrupting the enemy's trade, and reducing them to the greatest straits, that they desired England might not be charged with the pay of such additional troops, but from the day that such step should be made by the States. The lords also addressed her majesty to the same effect, who readily acknowledged the justness of their precautions, and promised to comply with their requests. She was as good as her word, and the States-general, fore against their will, were obliged to publish a prohibition of all commerce with the subjects of France and Spain.

The public business being now dispatched, her majesty came to the house of peers the twenty-seventh of February, and gave the royal assent to the land-tax (four shillings in the pound); to the act for enabling her majesty to settle a revenue (one hundred thousand pounds per annum) on the prince of Denmark, in case he survived her; to the malt-tax; to an act for continuing the duties upon coals; to an act for granting an aid to her majesty by the sale of annuities (by this act every contributor was to have fourteen pounds per annum, for ninety-nine years, for every two hundred and ten pounds paid in); to an act for preventing escapes out of the King's-Bench and Fleet prisons; to an act for finishing and adorning the cathedral of St. Paul's; to an act for the punishment of accessories to felonies, and the receivers of stolen goods; to an act for enlarging the time for taking the abjuration-oath, and for the future securing the succession in the protestant line, and extinguishing the hopes of the pretender; to an act for stating and examining the public accounts; and to an act for advancing the sale of the forfeited estates in Ireland, with some others. After which her majesty made a speech to both houses, thanking them for the dispatch they had given to the public affairs, for the large supplies that had been granted, and the provision that had been made for the prince. She said, she hoped the dissenters would rest satisfied with the act of toleration, which she was resolved to maintain; and that those of the church would consider she had her education in it, and had run great hazards for it; and that therefore they ought to be sure she would make it her peculiar care to encourage and maintain the church, and transmit it securely settled to posterity. She thought some farther laws were necessary for restraining the licence of the press, and hoped they would endeavour to suppress pernicious libels; but above all she recommended union among themselves; and concluded with acquainting them, that she would apply her share of the prizes taken during the war to the public service.

Then the lord-keeper, by her majesty's command, prorogued the parliament.

To the transactions of this session it may not be improper to subjoin an account of the proceedings of the convocation, which sat at the same time as the parliament, and which was distracted by the same feuds and animosities that prevailed in that assembly.

It had been customary for a convocation to be summoned with every new parliament; but after the first convocation in 1689, had, as I have already related, discovered their aversion to the scheme of comprehension set on foot by king William; the king had ordered the convocation to be regularly prorogued, and never suffered them to sit till February 1701, when they were, after a vacation of ten years, allowed to meet and act. Then the contests about the right of adjourning were revived between the higher and lower houses, and so continued till William's death. When the convocation determined in consequence of that event, the advocates for the new claims set up by the lower house affected to call themselves a parliamentary body, and therefore insisted they had a right to sit as long as the parliament; but the archbishop and bishop affirmed, that the convocation being assembled by the bishop's mandate, in obedience to the king's writ, could no longer subsist than while the royal writ remained in force, and so the convocation broke up.

On the queen's accession, and the calling a new parliament, the convocation was again summoned, and Dr. Aldrich, dean of Christ-church, was chosen prolocutor; when the lower house, in imitation of the commons, proposed an address, reflecting on the memory of the late king, and even glancing obliquely at the conduct of the bishops; but the upper house refusing to concur, the lower receded, and both at length agreed in a joint address to her majesty, in which they congratulated her accession to the throne, thanked her for the assurances she had given of her fixed resolution to support the church of England as by law established, and to maintain the succession in the protestant line; and expressed their hopes, that whatever was wanting to restore the church to its just rights and privileges would be supplied by her majesty, and would be transmitted safe to the latest posterity. The queen in her answer told them, that she was highly pleased with this dutiful address, and considered their concurrence in this particular as a good presage of their union in every thing that should come before them.

Her majesty however found herself disappointed in her expectations; their former contests were immediately revived. The bishops offered to grant the lower house any thing that could possibly be granted without giving up their character and authority: they proposed, that in the intervals of session, the lower house might appoint committees to prepare matters; and when business should be regularly brought before them, the archbishop would regulate the prorogation in such a manner, that they might have sufficient time to sit and deliberate upon the subject. The lower house were not satisfied with this answer: they had many friends among the ministry, and therefore they resolved upon an address to the queen, which was presented on the twenty-third of December, 1702, begging she would call the question into her royal audience, and award such a sentence as to her should seem proper. Orders were hereupon given to the queen's counsel to examine how the matter stood in point of law between the two houses, which was thus stated to them, and from whence the reader will be best informed of the true nature of the dispute between the two houses of convocation. The constant practice, as far as there were books or records, was, That the archbishop prorogued the convocation by a schedule: of this the form was so fixed, that it could not be altered but by act of parliament. There was a clause in the schedule that continued all matters before the convocation in the state they were, to the day to which he prorogued them. Hence it was evident that there could be no intermediate session; for a session in the lower house could, by passing a vote in any matter, alter the state that matter was in.

The lower house on their part did not pretend to question the archbishop's power to prorogue the whole convocation, that is, to appoint a further day, on which the whole body should attend; but they conceived that such power was no ways inconsistent with the right claimed by the lower house, viz. the right of holding their assemblies, and continuing to act as an house, in the intervals of his grace's ordinary prorogations; which right, in their opinion, was so indisputably necessary to the being of the lower house, that they could not answer the trust reposed in them, unless they continued to insist on the claim of it. What the report made by the judges was, is not known; but it should seem, however, that it was unfavourable to the lower house, for the queen made no answer to their address. The dispute still subsisted, when the session was finished by the prorogation of the parliament*.

Those contests, however, gave rise to divisions through the whole body of the clergy, who ranged themselves into different parties, distinguished by the names of HIGH CHURCH and LOW CHURCH, who branded each other with the most invidious epithets: the former branded the latter with the appellation of Presbyterians and Republicans; and those in return stigmatized their adversaries as enemies to the Revolution, Jacobites, and Schismatics. Upon the whole, I cannot more aptly distinguish them than by giving to the former the term of Ecclesiastical Tories, and to the latter that of Ecclesiastical Whigs.

The latter end of February several promotions were made in the army; and on the seventh of March sir John Levison Gower, baronet, was created baron Gower of Sittenham, in the county of York; John Granville, esquire, baron Granville of Potheridge, in the county of Devon; He-neage Finch, esquire, baron of Guernsey, in the county of Hants; Francis Seymour Conway, esq. younger son of sir Edward Seymour by a second venter, baron Conway of Ragley, in the county of Warwick; and John Harvey, esquire, was created baron Harvey of Ickworth, in the county of Suffolk. At the same time, Sheffield marquis of Normanby was created duke of that name, and afterwards honoured with the additional title of duke of Buckinghamshire.

I shall close the transactions of this year with an account of some occurrences relating to our trade, which could not so conveniently be introduced in the course of the former pages.

In this year an attempt was made by the English from Carolina, under colonel Moore, governor of that settlement, against St. Augustine, the capital of Spanish Florida; but although we took and held the town for a whole month, we were not able to reduce the castle for want of mortars (which certainly should have been duly considered before) and were therefore obliged to withdraw, on the arrival of two Spanish men of war, and abandon the ships, ammunition, &c. to the enemy*.

In this year also the land-proprietors of the two provinces of East and West New-Jersey, in English America, who had purchased of the first proprietors, not readily finding purchasers of under-shares thereof, and being likewise at variance amongst themselves, agreed to surrender into the queen's hands both the charters for those two separate governments, reserving their particular rights and properties of the lands and settlements therein: whereupon her majesty consolidated the said two provinces into one, and appointed the lord Cornbury to be the first regal governor. This colony of New-Jersey has since prospered very well, and has been extremely useful in supplying our sugar-colonies with provisions, lumber, &c. Its two best towns are Burlington and Elizabeth town; but that of Perth-Amboy is reckoned to have the best harbour, and most commodious in point of situation†.

General Codrington, governor of the Leeward-Islands, having received advice that war was declared by England against France, attacked the French island of Guadaloupe, where, after some loss, he made himself master of the great town called Bassé-terre, and forced the enemy to retire into the castle and fort, which they defended for some time, and then blowing them up, retired to the mountains; after which the English burnt the town to the ground, razed the fortifications, took the best of the guns on board, and made their retreat without the loss of a man; then embarking, they returned to St. Christopher's‡.

We have seen, under the preceding reign, the indispensable necessity there was for uniting the old and new English East India companies, even if it had been for no other reason but the sake of public tranquillity. This coalition was finally effected this year under an act of arbitration, wherein lord Godolphin and Mr. Harley, afterwards earl of Oxford, were for the old company, and Charles Montagu lord Halifax for the new; and on the twenty-second of July, an indenture tripartite was entered into by the queen and the said two companies, in substance as follows, viz. That the old company's stock in the funds should be transferred to the new, and that the old company should purchase of the new as much of their stock as, with that which was transferred by the old, should make up a moiety of the whole capital of the united companies. The old company was likewise to give an equivalent for the new company's dead stock. During seven years, each company was to have an equal power in the administration of the fund and trade, and to that end twelve persons were to be yearly appointed by the general court of each company respectively, who were to be stiled Managers of the United Trade to India; and after those seven years were expired, the old company were to surrender their charter, and the new company was henceforward to change its stile, and to be called "The United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies," whose affairs were afterwards to be conducted by their own sole directors, agreeable to the charter of the tenth of king William. Thus a prudent stop was put to much contention on account of those two bodies of traders; and this agreement was the foundation of that company which has subsisted, with so great credit to themselves and benefit to the nation, ever since§.

The order of time leads me now to take a view of what passed in Scotland and Ireland, at the beginning of the second year of queen Ann's reign.

A change had been made in the ministry of Scotland, which seemed favourable to the episcopalians and antirevolutionists of that kingdom. The earls of Marchmont, Melvil, Selkirk, Leven, and Hindford, were laid aside: the earl of Seafield was appointed chancellor, and the duke of Queensberry and the lord viscount Tarbat were declared secretaries of state; the marquis of Annandale was made president of the council, and the earl of Tullibardin lord privy-seal. The episcopal clergy, encouraged by these proceedings, which appeared so favourable to them, drew up an address to the queen, imploring her protection, and humbly beseeching her to allow those parishes in which there was a majority of episcopal freeholders, to bestow the benefices on ministers of their principles. This petition was presented to the queen on the thirteenth of March, 1703, by Dr. Skeen and Dr. Scot, introduced by the duke of Queensberry and lord Tarbat: her majesty, in her answer, assured them of her protection and endeavours to supply their necessities as far as conveniently she could, and recommended to them to live in peace and christian love with the clergy who were by law invested with the church-government in her ancient kingdom of Scotland*.

The convention of estates that had met in Scotland at the Revolution, had been continued as a legal parliament all the reign of king William, the presbyterians not daring to hazard the establishment of their kirk by a new election. The continuance of this convention was complained of as a great grievance, as unprecedented in that nation, and an invasion of their old constitution, by which a parliament was annually to be chosen: her majesty was pleased, therefore, this year, 1703, to gratify the people of Scotland by calling a new parliament; but, previous to relating its transactions, it will be necessary to present the reader with a short sketch of the state of parties in Scotland at this time.

A proclamation of indemnity having been lately published, a great number of Jacobites returned from France and other countries, pretending to have changed their sentiments, and took the oaths, that they might be qualified to sit in parliament: these joined with the more rigid episcopalians and the antirevolutionists, who by this accession of strength, hoped to secure such a majority as might be able to vote down presbytery, and to restore patronages, or at least to carry a toleration so as their own clergy might be called to benefices as well as the presbyterians. This, however, proved to be an union without harmony, and consequently possessed of very little real strength. The presbyterians and revolutionists were headed by the duke of Argyle; the earl of Hume declared himself the chief of the antirevolutionists; the country-party of malecontents, which took its rise from the disappointments of the Darien settlement, acted under the management of the duke of Hamilton and the marquis of Tweddale. The majority of the country-party were friends to the Revolution, and endeavoured only a redress of the grievances which the nation had sustained during the late reign. The antirevolutionists, though declared enemies to the name or memory of king William, yet thought all parties were safe under the shelter of the queen's indemnity. The Jacobites, even those who had taken the oaths, made no scruple openly to confess, that they had sworn to her only as tutrix or regent during the minority of the prince of Wales her brother. By this it will appear, that the whole kingdom of Scotland was in a ferment at the sitting down of the parliament †.

In this disposition of affairs the new parliament met at Edinburgh on the sixth of May, 1703, and the duke of Queensberry, who had been appointed her majesty's high-commissioner, having taking his seat on the throne, the queen's letter was read, in which she demanded a supply for the maintenance of the forces; advised them to encourage trade, and exhorted them to proceed with wisdom, prudence, and unanimity. After the queen's letter was read, the high-commissioner and the earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor, each of them made a speech of the same purport with the letter. Then the duke of Hamilton offered the draught of an act for recognizing her majesty's authority, and her undoubted right and title to the imperial crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the estates of the kingdom, containing the claim of right. This was immediately received; and at the second reading, the queen's advocate offered an additional clause, denouncing the penalties of treason against any person who should quarrel (dispute) her majesty's right and title to the crown, or the exercise of her government from her actual entry on the same. This clause duke Hamilton and his party warmly opposed, alleging, that the ministry only proposed it as being conscious they had, contrary to law, been instrumental in advising her majesty to exercise some acts of administration, such as calling together the parliament which had continued all the late reign, and promoting in it some commissions, laws, and powers, which determined the being of the parliament, and circumscribed its powers. After a long and warm debate, however, it was carried to add the advocate's clause, by the concurrence of the antirevolutionists.

The earl of Hume, after this, offered the draught of a bill for the supply; and immediately after it was read, the marquis of Tweddale moved, that, previous to entering upon any other business, the parliament would establish such conditions and regulations respecting the constitution of the kingdom, to take place after the decease of her majesty and the heirs of her body, as should be thought most likely to tend to the security and preservation of their liberty and religion. This overture and the bill were ordered to lie upon the table. In the mean time, however, the high-commissioner found himself greatly perplexed how to proceed. He had been told by the duke of Argyle and the other chiefs of the presbyterian party, that they were determined to obtain an act for ratifying the Revolution, and confirming the kirk-government, before they would enter upon the business of a supply, intimating at the same time, that they were certain of a majority in their favour. This was a confounding explanation to the commissioner, who now plainly saw he must either give up the supplies, which were at this time particularly needful, or abandon the antirevolutionists, with whom he had hitherto been connected: he clearly perceived, that on this occasion the Whigs would throw all their weight into the scale of duke Hamilton and the country-party, which would then outweigh that of the antirevolutionists. He had nothing then left, but to endeavour to cajole both parties, in which, however, he found himself unsuccessful. He desired in parliament, that the act for the supply might be read, promising that he would allow the house sufficient time afterwards to discuss all other subjects. The marquis of Tweddale insisted on his overture or motion; and, after some warm debates, it was carried in favour of the overture. The marquis of Athol presented the heads of a bill for the security of the kingdom, in case of her majesty's decease; but before they were read, Argyle offered his draught of a bill for ratifying the Revolution, and all the acts consequent thereupon. Mr. Fletcher, of Saltoun, also produced an act for limiting the succession after the death of her majesty, and the heirs of her body; as did the earl of Rothes another, importing, that no person coming to the crown of Scotland after her majesty's death, and the failure of issue, and being at the same time king or queen of England, should, as king or queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war without the consent of the Scottish parliament. The earl of Marchmont moved for an act to secure the true protestant religion and presbyterian government, the heads of which he recited: and sir Patrick Johnston proposed another for admitting the importation of wines and other foreign liquors. All these bills were ordered to lie upon the table.

After this the earl of Strathmore proposed an act for the toleration of all protestants in the exercise of religious worship; whereupon a most violent remonstrance was offered against it, in the name, and at the appointment of the general assembly of the kirk, wherein they insist there could be no just ground to grant a toleration to the episcopal persuasion, since there was no sinful communion required of them; and difference in opinion about church-government was not a sufficient reason for separation in worship: they likewise insisted, that in the present case and circumstances of that nation, to enact a toleration in favour of the episcopalians, would be to establish iniquity by law. And here it might be demanded of these tenacious gentlemen, whether the English might not, with equal justice, be said to have established iniquity by a law, in tolerating the dissenters among them at the Revolution? I shall leave it to others to determine how far this indulgence on our parts was wicked or laudable; but surely, to an unprejudiced mind, it will appear equally just and innocent to have tolerated episcopacy in Scotland, as it was to tolerate presbytery in England. But to proceed: the kirk so managed matters, that the act of toleration was dropped. Some time after the parliament passed the act for preserving the true reformed religion, and confirming presbyterian church-government; as also the duke of Argyle's act for ratifying and perpetuating the first act of king William's parliament, for declaring it high-treason to disown the authority of the then parliament, or to alter or innovate the claim of right, or any article thereof. The queen's high-commissioner, the duke of Queensberry, giving the royal assent to those acts, so far embroiled him with the cavaliers, or antirevolutionists, that they renounced his interest, resolving to separate from the court, and jointly pursue such measures as might be for the interest of their party, which was now strengthened by the accession of the marquis of Athol and the viscount Tarbat, who had protested against the foregoing acts.

But of all the bills that were produced in the course of this remarkable session, no one raised such a violent dispute as the act of security, proposed by the duke of Argyle and his party, in which it was provided, in order to secure the ancient independency of the Scots, that in default of issue of her majesty, the same person should in no event be capable to be king or queen both of England and Scotland, unless a free communion of trade, the freedom of navigation, and the liberty of plantations, &c. were fully agreed to by the parliament of England; and several other provisions were likewise made therein, all calculated to abridge the prerogative of the crown, to limit the successor, and throw a vast additional power into the hands of the parliament. It would be equally tiresome and ungrateful to the reader, was I to go about to recite the many inflammatory speeches and bitter sarcasms that were bandied between party and party on this occasion; let it then suffice to say, that notwithstanding the most obstinate opposition from the ministry and the antirevolutionists, the bill was passed on the thirteenth of August, by a majority of fifty-nine voices, and the commissioner was warmly importuned to give it the royal assent; but he declined from time to time to give any answer: at length, on the tenth of September, he made a speech to the house, in which he gave them to understand, that he had received her majesty's orders, empowering him to give the royal assent to all the acts voted in this session, except the act of security, which they might easily believe required her majesty's farther consideration; at the same time her majesty expected they would mind their own safety, in making the necessary provisions for the troops, and that they would put the trade and customs upon that foot, that the civil list might be supported; and he intreated them to finish these matters as soon as possible. The earl of Marchmont afterwards proposed the settling the succession in the house of Hanover; but his motion was rejected, not so much it should seem from any aversion the majority in parliament entertained to the said succession, as that they were resolved to avoid a nomination, until such conditions of government should be previously stipulated, as might secure them against the influence of an English ministry. Some members of the house, among whom Mr. Fletcher of Saltoun, a man of professed republican principles, was the chief, began to question, whether the crown had a negative or not: they said till of late a negative had never been interposed, and that but in very few cases; and in the end the majority peremptorily refused to go upon the supply till the act of security had received the royal assent: in short, the ferment grew so high, that the commissioner, apprehensive of the most fatal consequences, called for such acts as he was empowered to pass, and then, on the sixteenth of September, adjourned the parliament to the twelfth of October following.

Although the queen refused to pass the act of security, the royal assent was granted to an act of limitation on the successor, in which it was declared, that no king or queen of Scotland should have power to make peace or war without consent of parliament. Another law was enacted, to allow French wines and other liquors to be imported in neutral bottoms; it being alleged, that without this expedient the revenue would have been insufficient to maintain the government. An act passed in favour of the company trading to Africa and the Indies; another for a commission concerning the public accounts; another for punishing slanderous speeches and writings: the commission for treating of an union with England was vacated, with a prohibition to grant any other commission for that purpose without consent of parliament. As no supplies had been provided for before the adjournment, the pay of the army, with the charge of the government, was left to run upon credit; and such was the national humour among the Scots at this period, to render themselves a free and independent people, that they seemed capable of the most extravagant things that could be suggested to them.

majesty, in her answer, assured them of her protection and endeavours to supply their necessities as far as conveniently she could, and recommended to them to live in peace and christian love with the clergy who were by law invested with the church-government in her ancient kingdom of Scotland*.

The convention of estates that had met in Scotland at the Revolution, had been continued as a legal parliament all the reign of king William, the presbyterians not daring to hazard the establishment of their kirk by a new election. The continuance of this convention was complained of as a great grievance, as unprecedented in that nation, and an invasion of their old constitution, by which a parliament was annually to be chosen: her majesty was pleased, therefore, this year, 1703, to gratify the people of Scotland by calling a new parliament; but, previous to relating its transactions, it will be necessary to present the reader with a short sketch of the state of parties in Scotland at this time.

A proclamation of indemnity having been lately published, a great number of Jacobites returned from France and other countries, pretending to have changed their sentiments, and took the oaths, that they might be qualified to sit in parliament: these joined with the more rigid episcopalians and the antirevolutionists, who by this accession of strength, hoped to secure such a majority as might be able to vote down presbytery, and to restore patronages, or at least to carry a toleration so as their own clergy might be called to benefices as well as the presbyterians. This, however, proved to be an union without harmony, and consequently possessed of very little real strength. The presbyterians and revolutionists were headed by the duke of Argyle; the earl of Hume declared himself the chief of the antirevolutionists; the country-party of malecontents, which took its rise from the disappointments of the Darien settlement, acted under the management of the duke of Hamilton and the marquis of Tweddale. The majority of the country-party were friends to the Revolution, and endeavoured only a redress of the grievances which the nation had sustained during the late reign. The antirevolutionists, though declared enemies to the name or memory of king William, yet thought all parties were safe under the shelter of the queen's indemnity. The Jacobites, even those who had taken the oaths, made no scruple openly to confess, that they had sworn to her only as tutrix or regent during the minority of the prince of Wales her brother. By this it will appear, that the whole kingdom of Scotland was in a ferment at the sitting down of the parliament †.

In this disposition of affairs the new parliament met at Edinburgh on the sixth of May, 1703, and the duke of Queensberry, who had been appointed her majesty's high-commissioner, having taking his seat on the throne, the queen's letter was read, in which she demanded a supply for the maintenance of the forces; advised them to encourage trade, and exhorted them to proceed with wisdom, prudence, and unanimity. After the queen's letter was read, the high-commissioner and the earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor, each of them made a speech of the same purport with the letter. Then the duke of

Hamilton offered the draught of an act for recognizing her majesty's authority, and her undoubted right and title to the imperial crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the estates of the kingdom, containing the claim of right. This was immediately received; and at the second reading, the queen's advocate offered an additional clause, denouncing the penalties of treason against any person who should quarrel (dispute) her majesty's right and title to the crown, or the exercise of her government from her actual entry on the same. This clause duke Hamilton and his party warmly opposed, alleging, that the ministry only proposed it as being conscious they had, contrary to law, been instrumental in advising her majesty to exercise some acts of administration, such as calling together the parliament which had continued all the late reign, and promoting in it some commissions, laws, and powers, which determined the being of the parliament, and circumscribed its powers. and the heirs of her body; as did the earl of Rothes another, importing, that no person coming to the crown of Scotland after her majesty's death, and the failure of issue, and being at the same time king or queen of England, should, as king or queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war without the consent of the Scottish parliament. Thus

Thus ended this famous session of parliament, in which the greatest part of the ministry had abandoned the duke of Queensberry, and particularly the earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor, the marquis of Athol, lord privy-seal, and the viscount of Tarbat, secretary of state, with all their followers. Nevertheless, the queen thought proper to confer honours upon several who appeared to have influence in the nation, and who, though in opposition to her ministry, were thought to have an attachment to her person and government: the marquis of Athol was made a duke, and the lord Tarbat earl of Cromarty; the marquis of Douglas, though a minor, was also created a duke; the viscounts of Stair and Roseberry were created earls of the same name; the lord Boyle, earl of Glasgow; James Stewart, of Bute, earl of Bute; Charles Hope of Hoptoun, earl of Hoptoun; John Crawford, of Kilbruce, viscount of Garnock; and sir James Primrose of Carrington, viscount of Primrose. Soon after, her majesty revived the order of the Thistle, which had been dropped by the late king; it was to be carried in a green ribband, as the George is in a blue; the glory was in the form of a St. Andrew's cross. The dukes of Argyll and Athol, the marquis of Annandale, the earls of Orkney and Seafield, were the first who had it, the number being limited to twelve*.

Whilst things were in this situation in Scotland, there were also high discontents in Ireland, where an animosity now came to be raised, as well as in England, between Whig and Tory. The duke of Ormond having been constituted lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, as has been observed already, held a parliament there the latter end of the year, when it appeared that this nation looked upon themselves to be under very great hardships; for the commons having chosen Alan Broderick, esq. solicitor-general, to be their speaker, one of the first things they did, was to resolve, "That all the protestant freeholders of that kingdom had been falsely and maliciously traduced, misrepresented, and abused, in a representation made of them in a book entitled, 'The Report of the Commissioners appointed to enquire into the Irish Forfeitures,' in which it is asserted, that the said freeholders, through length of time, and by contracting new friendships with the Irish, or by inter-purchasing with one another, but chiefly through a dislike of the dispositions of the forfeitures, are scarce willing to find any person guilty of the late rebellion, even upon the fullest evidence." And it appearing to the house, that Francis Annesley, a member of the house, John Trenchard, Henry Langford, and James Hamilton, were authors of that book, they farther resolved, that Annesley should be expelled the house: Hamilton was dead, and Trenchard had returned to England. It seems they had finished the enquiry about the forfeitures before the meeting of this parliament, and had sold the best of the estates to the Sword-blade company of London, at an under-value; and that company had petitioned for a bill to enable them to take possession, make conveyances in consequence thereof, &c. but the parliament refused to confirm the bargain, and expelled John Apgill, one of their members, who, as agent to the said company, had offered to lend the Irish government money, on condition an act was procured to confirm the company's purchase of the forfeited estates.

The commons pursued the trustees of the forfeited estates still farther, for they resolved to offer a representation of the state and grievances of the nation to the queen, in which they gave her majesty to understand, "that the constitution of the kingdom of Ireland had been of late greatly shaken, and the lives, liberties, and estates, of the subjects called in question, and tried in a manner unknown to their ancestors: that the charge they had been put to by the trustees for forfeited estates, in defending their just rights (which, after many and expensive delays, had been allowed by the said trustees) exceeded the value of the current cash of that kingdom: that they could not, without the greatest grief of heart, reflect on the loss of their trade, and of being deprived of the means of earning their livelihood, and maintaining their own manufactures, whereby their poor were become very numerous, especially the poor industrious protestants: that very many protestant families had been forced to leave the kingdom, and remove into foreign countries: that their foreign trade was under such restrictions and discouragements, that it became in a manner unprofitable: that the want of frequent parliaments had given encouragement to evil men, who minded nothing but their own gain, though tending to the ruin and oppression of her majesty's subjects: that the rapacious covetousness of some civil officers was insupportable, who amassed together vast estates in a short time, in that poor country: that others resided for the most part out of the kingdom, and neglected their duties, to the great detriment of her majesty's subjects, and failure of justice: and that it was from her majesty's gracious interposition alone in their favour, that they hoped for relief from these their manifold griefs and oppressions."

The commons afterwards voted the necessary supplies, and granted one hundred and fifty thousand pounds to make good the deficiencies of the necessary branches of the establishment. They also voted a provision for the half-pay officers, and abolished pensions to the amount of seventeen thousand pounds a year, as unnecessary branches of the establishment. They passed an act for settling the succession of the crown after the pattern sent them from England. A very severe bill was also passed against the papists, by which it was enacted, that all estates of papists should be equally divided among their children, notwithstanding any settlement to the contrary, unless the persons to whom they might be settled, should qualify themselves by taking the oaths, and communicating with the church of England. They were proceeding with great zeal against popery and the pretender, when they were suddenly adjourned by the command of the lord lieutenant, and broke up greatly irritated against that nobleman, whom they severely reflected upon as the adviser of this measure; though in truth his excellency, on the bill "to prevent the growth of popery" being offered to him by the house, had transmitted it to the English ministry, warmly recommended by himself; but the latter, being in expectation of very considerable presents from the papists, strenuously opposed the sending back the bill with the royal assent, on pretence that as the queen was then earnestly interceding with the emperor for favour to the protestants in his dominions, it seemed not seasonable, and was scarce decent, to pass so severe a law against those of his religion*. It is now time to return to the military operations of this year.

The emperor had agreed with the allies, that his son, the archduke Charles, should assume the title of king of Spain, by the name of Charles III. demand the infanta of Portugal in marriage, and undertake some enterprize of importance in conjunction with the maritime powers. Leopold had likewise promised to send such an army into the field, as would in a little time be able to expel the elector of Bavaria from his dominions; but he was so dilatory in his preparations, that the French king broke all his measures by sending powerful reinforcements to the elector; accordingly marshal Villars, who lay with an army of thirty thousand men at Strasburgh, had orders to join the elector. The marshal passed the Rhine, and invested Kehl, an important fort, over-against Strasburgh, which was surrendered to him after a short resistance. The emperor, alarmed at this event, ordered count Schlick to enter Bavaria on the side of Saltzburgh, with an army; and count Stirum, on the side of Newmark, with another. The Imperial generals committed great ravages in the electorate, but were frequently met with and defeated by the elector's troops, who, encouraged by these successes, advanced to Ratisbon†, where the diet of the empire was assembled, and demanded that he should be immediately put in possession of the bridge, and one of the gates of the city. The burghers, overawed by so powerful a force in their neighbourhood, thought proper to comply, and on the eighth of April his electoral highness entered the town; however, he signed an instrument, by which he engaged to withdraw his forces as soon as the emperor should ratify the resolution of the diet for the neutrality of Ratisbon.

In the mean time marshal Villars having received orders to join the elector at all events, and being reinforced by a body of troops under count Tallard, determined to break through the lines which prince Lewis of Baden had formed at Stollhoffen, which he at last effected, after having been repulsed several times, and penetrating through the vale of Kintzig, he joined the elector in the beginning of May; and it was resolved between them, that the marshal should watch the motions of the prince of Baden, whilst the elector invaded the county of Tyrol, in order to open a communication with the French in Italy. Bavaria's motions were so swift, and such his success, that it alarmed the court of Vienna; for in six days time he made himself master of the whole Tyrolese, and took as many strong places as might have stopped a numerous army for as many months, had they been in such a condition as they ought: at length the elector made a triumphant entry into Inspruck, the capital of that country, from which he demanded homage, and a monthly contribution of one hundred and twenty thousand florins. But the elector marching afterwards to the mountain Brenner, in order to join the duke of Vendosme in Italy, upon which junction the ruin of the house of Austria would have probably followed; the boors in Tyrol rose, and retook several of the places he had reduced, and cut in pieces the garrisons he had left to guard them; and though the elector afterwards revenged himself upon the peasants, yet understanding that some of the Imperial generals were marching against him, and that his country had suffered very much during his absence, he was obliged to abandon Tyrol, and his design of joining Vendosme, and return to Munich. Being afterwards rejoined by marshal Villars, they both together fell upon Stirum, who, with a considerable body of the Imperialists, was marching to join prince Lewis of Baden, and defeated him near Hochster. In the mean time count Tallard besieged and took Old Brisac‡; and on the seventh of October invested Landau. The defence made by the governor of Brisac was so slender, that he was condemned in a council of war to be beheaded, and all the officers who signed the capitulation were punished.

The confederates, sensible of what importance the preservation of Landau was, after they had disposed the rest of the army into winter-quarters, ordered the hereditary prince of Hesse Cassel to attempt the raising of the siege; to which purpose he set forward from the Netherlands with twelve battalions and twenty-nine squadrons; and having reached Altzey, in the Palatinate, by means of very long marches, was there met by the prince of Nassau Weilburg, general of the Palatinate forces, in order to concert proper measures for the relieving of Landau. The French having notice of this march immediately detached M. Pracontal, with a body of ten thousand men, to follow the prince closely, or rather, if possible, to get before him. Pracontal used such diligence that he joined count Tallard before the confederates had any notice of his march. The prince of Hesse being arrived at Spires, within four leagues of Landau, the French generals surprized him on the 15th of November, and obtained a complete victory, after a very bloody and obstinate engagement, in which the prince of Hesse behaved with exemplary courage and conduct; he had three horses killed under him, and slew a French officer with his own hand: but after

* This parliament, besides the bills already mentioned, passed an act for an additional excise on beer, ale, and other liquors; another encouraging the importation of iron and slaves; a third for preventing Popish priests from coming into the kingdom; a fourth for securing the liberty of the subject, and for preventing imprisonment beyond seas; and a fifth for naturalizing all protestant strangers. Burnet. Hist. of Europe, vol. vii. Oldmixon. Tindal.

† Ratisbon is a very large and strong city of Germany, in the circle and dukedom of Bavaria, and a bishopric, under the archbishop of Saltzburg. It is free and imperial; famous for the general diets of the empire. Although it was seized by the elector of Bavaria this campaign, he lost it (as well as his own dominions), in 1704, soon after the action of Schellenberg, near Donawert. It has a fair stone bridge over the Danube, one thousand and ninety-one feet long, and thirty-two feet broad, supported by pillars, and adorned with three towers; here is also a magnificent old cathedral, and a stately castle, where the imperial diets are commonly held.

‡ Brisac is a very considerable city and castle of Germany, and esteemed one of the strongest places in Europe, whether its situation upon a high hill be considered, or what art has contributed to render it regular. The fortifications are a French league in compass; the bastions are filled with earth, faced with brick, and secured with a large broad ditch full of water, and it will require (in time of war) eight or ten thousand men to defend it. It stands on the river Rhine, twenty-six miles north of Basil, and thirty-fourth of Strasburg.

incredible efforts, he was obliged to retreat, with the loss of some thousand men. The French, however, gained not a bloodless victory; Pracontal, and several other officers of distinction, being slain in the action; nevertheless they resumed the siege of Landau, which the count de Frize, its governor, despairing of relief, surrendered on the nineteenth, upon honourable terms. Count Marlin being sent, about the same time, to command the French army in conjunction with the elector of Bavaria, in the room of marshal Villars, whose haughty and assuming behaviour the elector could not bear, they invested the city of Augsburg*, with their united forces, on the sixth of December, which was surrendered on the fourteenth.

To add to the distractions of the empire, this winter the Hungarians broke out into open rebellion, under prince Ragotski, who published a declaration, setting forth, that, provided they might enjoy their religion, liberties, and estates, and the government of Hungary might be put into the hands of a native, they would return to their allegiance. The emperor hereupon sent prince Eugene to Presburgh, to give the necessary orders for the security of the frontiers, and to endeavour to bring the malecontents to some accommodation†. Having thus given some account of the state of the war in Germany, let us now turn to the Netherlands, where the arms of the allies were attended with better success.

The duke of Marlborough's departure from England had been delayed for some time by the death of his only son, the marquis of Blandford, who died of the small-pox in the beginning of the year: so equally are good and evil intermixed. The duke no sooner saw himself happy in his sovereign's favour, and confessed by all the powers in Europe one of the greatest generals of his age, than he found himself deprived of the only heir of his wealth and grandeur, by whom he hoped to transmit his great name down to posterity. His grace, however, having somewhat recovered this heavy stroke of fate, crossed the sea about the middle of April, 1703, and, assembling the allied army, opened the campaign in Flanders with the siege of Bonne, which was invested on the third of May, N. S. This town is situated on the Lower Rhine‡, about fourteen miles south of Cologne, the usual residence of that elector, and the only place of strength he had left, so fatal was his alliance with France. This place was attacked in three different quarters; in one by the prince of Hesse Cassel, in another by general Coehorn, the celebrated Dutch engineer, and in the third by lieutenant-general Fagel. The garrison made a stout and vigorous defence, and continued to hold out for a week, when the fort having been taken by assault, and the breaches being practicable, the marquis d'Alegre, the governor, ordered a parley to be beat; hostages were immediately exchanged, and two days after, the garrison marched out, and were sent to Luxemburgh.

While the greatest part of the confederate army was employed before Bonne, the French king, imagining that city would make a longer resistance, sent orders to the marshals Boufflers and Villeroy to lay siege to the city of Liege; which they were preparing to do, when they received advice from the marquis d'Alegre, that he could no longer defend Bonne. Hereupon the two marshals advanced suddenly into the neighbourhood of Tongeren||, with an army of forty thousand men, which they surprised, and made the garrison prisoners. Bonne being surrendered, the duke of Marlborough marched towards the French army, with a design to have given them battle; but, upon his approach, marshal Villeroy thought proper to retire within the lines, having first blown up the works about Tongeren. Hereupon it was resolved to attack the French lines; which service was effectually performed by general Coehorn and baron Spaar, though not without considerable loss in the attack.

The joy for this success was not a little abated by the arrival of an express from general Opdam, with an account that the French, under marshal Boufflers, had come out of their lines, near Antwerp, and being joined by a considerable detachment from the grand army, had surrounded the confederate forces under his command, and entirely routed them, and that he had escaped to Breda, with only thirty horse: but while the States were under some consternation at this misfortune, another express arrived from mynheer Hop, treasurer-general of the States, and their deputy in that army, giving an account, that the army was indeed surrounded by a superior force, but had repulsed the enemy, and effected an honourable retreat to Lillo. The truth was, that general Opdam had the misfortune to be cut off from the rest of his army at the beginning of the engagement, and looking upon all as lost, fled with precipitation to Breda: the rest of the Dutch generals, however, behaved themselves with such bravery and conduct, that the French were repulsed. General Schlangenburg, who commanded in the absence of Opdam, gained immortal honour in this action, and received the thanks of his masters for saving their army, when it had been given over for lost. On the other hand, general Opdam, though he had served his country above thirty years without any imputation on his courage, and his being cut off from his army was purely accidental, yet could he never afterwards recover any tolerable reputation in the field. This battle, which was extremely bloody, was called the Battle of Eckeren, from the name of the place where it was fought.

The duke of Marlborough finding it impossible to bring the French to an engagement, sat down before Huy§, of which he made himself master in about ten days time, the garrison capitulating to be be exchanged for that which was surprized at Tongeren. The tenth of September, the confederates invested Limburgh †, and on the twenty-eighth of the same month the garrison surrendered, and were made prisoners of war. Thus ended the campaign in Flanders. The town of Gueldres surrendered on the seventeenth of December following, having been blocked up for some months by a detachment of the Prussian troops, by the surrender whereof the Dutch became masters of all the Spanish Guelderland, as they were before of Limburgh, another of the provinces of the Spanish Netherlands; so that their frontiers were now sufficiently enlarged, and the enemy removed to a convenient distance ‡.

The naval operations of this year were not attended with all the success that might have been wished. The making prince George lord high-admiral proved, in many instances, very unhappy to the nation: men of bad designs imposed upon him; he understood sea-affairs very little; and they sheltered themselves under his name, to which great submission was paid: but the complaints rose the higher for that our main fleet was ready to go to sea in May, but the Dutch fleet was not yet come over to join us; and therefore sir George Rooke was ordered on a cruize upon the French coast, in order to keep the enemy in an alarm. The admiral, however, being taken ill, George Churchill, esq. admiral of the blue, was sent to take upon him the command of the fleet; but he not arriving in time, and sir George Rooke finding himself better, put to sea, and continued out for something more than a month. Sir George had proposed a scheme for distressing the enemy, by sailing very early into the bay of Biscay, where he thought, if they had any men of war without Port Louis and Rochefort, they might be surprized and taken; but by the unavoidable delays in our fleet putting to sea, the French had got notice of the design, and most of their squadron had failed. Sir George therefore perceiving that he could do the nation no service by remaining longer on the French coast, returned home about the middle of June, but not till he had first taken and sent in a French East India ship, worth one hundred thousand pounds, one of their men of war of thirty-six guns, and a West India merchant-ship worth forty thousand pounds, with several other prizes of inferior value. Bishop Burnet, indeed, is pleased to assert, that sir George's illness was only a pretence to avoid going to sea; and that when he did, he at last returned without attempting any thing. As the above facts are related from the best authorities §, I shall leave the reader to comment upon the candour and veracity of this right reverend historian, who has been too implicitly followed by several of our late writers.

In the spring of this year vice-admiral Graydon was sent to the West Indies with a pretty strong squadron to attack the island of Placentia, and expel the French from the Newfoundland fishery. In his passage he fell in with monsieur Du Caffé, as he was returning from Carthagena, with four ships only, and those very foul, having on board a large treasure. The Montagu, one of Graydon's squadron, engaged the sternmost of those ships; but he was called off by the admiral, who said he had orders not to lose any time by chasing or speaking with any ship whatsoever. This affair drew very heavy reproaches on the admiral: the admiralty, however, took the whole blame upon themselves, and inserted a paragraph in the Gazette to justify this officer's conduct, by declaring his orders to have been what he said they were, assigning for a reason, that the contrary winds having kept him in port much longer than was intended, and the service upon which he was bound very much requiring his presence, with the regiment that was with him, it was thought proper to lay him under strict restrictions from losing any time in his passage, by chasing or engaging any vessels he might meet at sea. After this rencounter admiral Graydon proceeded with all imaginable diligence on his voyage; but when he came off the coast of Newfoundland, about the beginning of August, he received certain advice that the enemy at Placentia were not only superior in number, and consequently able to make a good resistance, but that the avenues to the place were extremely difficult, the grounds marshy, and that there were no planks or other materials for mounting the guns on the batteries. These circumstances being duly weighed, together with the assistance the enemy might receive from their privateers and other shipping then at Placentia, a council of war, which was held on board the admiral, were unanimously of opinion, that it would be in vain to make any attempt on the place with the ships and forces at such an advanced season of the year: and that instead of success, they should only subject her majesty's arms to disgrace and defeat; upon which it was resolved to return to England *.

Sir George Rooke, on his return home, was again attacked by his disorder, which rendered him so weak and infirm, that he asked and obtained leave to go to Bath, and the command of the grand fleet this year was bestowed upon sir Cloudesley Shovel. It consisted of 35 ships of the line, and the admiral had under him sir Stafford Fairborne, vice-admiral of the red; sir George Byng, rear-admiral of the red; and sir John Leake, vice-admiral of the blue. One principal design of sending out this fleet was, to encourage the king of Portugal (who, as we shall see, had by this time joined the grand alliance) to remain firm to the confederates, and to protect his coasts against the French. Another was, to make a descent in Spain, and try the affections of the Spaniards for the emperor's family;

* This account is taken from Campbell, who says, that he had it from a MS. defence of admiral Graydon's, in which are particular certificates as to the truth of the facts; and as the admiral was never prosecuted, though his conduct was afterwards enquired into by the house of lords, it is to be presumed it was found satisfactory.

but the scheme was so ill laid, that nothing could be expected from it. The fleet was not ready to sail till the beginning of July, and the admiral had orders to leave the Streights by the end of September; a strange inconsistency! Sir Cloudesley represented the impossibility of performing any essential service in so short a time; but the admiralty-board enforcing their orders, he had nothing left but to comply.

He waited till the middle of June for the Dutch, and then was joined only by twelve ships of the line, under Allemonde, and two other flags. On the first day of July he sailed from St. Helen's with the combined squadrons, amounting to fifty-seven ships, having also a fleet of upwards of two hundred and thirty merchantmen under his convoy. On the twenty-fourth he arrived off the Rock of Lisbon, where he held a council of war, in which the rendezvous was appointed to be held in Altea-bay, on the coast of Valencia. There the whole fleet arrived on the thirty-first of August; and having made a descent with two thousand five hundred marines, they sent a message to the governor, that they did not come as enemies, but friends. The general answered, he had a great esteem for the English, but he was sorry he was not in a condition to oppose their landing. Sir Cloudesley and the Dutch admiral then published a short manifesto, importing, that, pursuant to the orders of her majesty the queen of Great Britain, and the States-general, they were come to protect such of the good subjects of Spain as were willing to return to the obedience of their lawful sovereign the archduke Charles, and endeavour to shake off the yoke of France. This manifesto seemed to have no other effect but that the Spaniards, seeing no injury was offered them, brought in plenty of all refreshments and provisions, for which they were paid in ready money. The fleet having taken in water and fresh provisions, the marines were reimbarcked, and the admiral sailed again the third of September for Leghorn, where count Lamberg, the imperial ambassador at Rome, came on board sir Cloudesley's ship, and acquainted him that the archduke was proclaimed king of Spain at Vienna the twelfth of September, by the name of Charles III. † Hereupon fifteen guns were fired by every ship in the fleet, and his Catholic majesty's health drank.

The admiral, on his leaving England, had received orders to send some assistance to the Cevennois, or inhabitants of the Cevennes, a mountainous country in the south part of Languedoc in France; and who having, in the course of the preceding year, been persecuted into a revolt on account of religion, had implored the protection of England and the States-general. Agreeable to his instructions, therefore, sir Cloudesley, before he left Altea-bay, had sent the Pembroke and Tartar into the Gulph of Narbonne, with arms and ammunition for those malecontents; but the court of Versailles had been so fully apprized of the expedition, that they had taken effectual methods to render it abortive: whereupon the two ships left the French coast, and sailed for Leghorn, where they arrived the twenty-third of September, and joined the grand fleet that had put in there three or four days before. Such of our readers who are desirous of seeing a more particular account of the insurrections of the Cevennois, and our attempt in their favour, may consult M. de Voltaire's Essay on General History, and his Age of Lewis XIV. as also Mr. Oldmixon's History of England, it being foreign to our purpose: I shall therefore only observe, that the time being now expired to which the admiral was limited, he sailed from Leghorn on the twenty-second of October; and having ordered a squadron of ships to Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers, to renew the peace with those piratical states, he came again into Altea-bay, where several of the natives declared for king Charles, and entered as volunteers to serve on board our fleet; after which the admiral, having victualled and watered, set sail for England, and arrived in the Downs on the seventeenth of November following, not having had an opportunity of engaging the French fleet, which kept close in Toulon while the confederates were in the Mediterranean. This expedition did not reflect much honour upon the nation, and therefore created some murmurs; but these fell, very undeservedly, upon the admiral, who certainly did all that was in his power, and not on those who gave him his orders, and were thought to have rather more power than parts ‡.

But while the grand fleet was at sea, Thomas Dilkes, esq. rear-admiral of the white, did the nation a very acceptable service in distressing the French trade. Intelligence was brought to the lord high-admiral's council, that a considerable fleet of French merchant ships, with their convoy, were in Cancalle bay, on the coast of Normandy; upon which the rear-admiral, who was then at Spithead with a small squadron, had orders to sail immediately in pursuit of them, which he did on the twenty-second of July, and executed his commission with such success, that he took, burnt, and sunk, upwards of forty sail, three of which were equipped as men of war. This service was thought of such importance, that the queen ordered a gold medal to be struck on the occasion, and delivered to the rear-admiral and all his officers, who certainly dis-

† The ceremony of proclaiming the archduke was performed in the following manner: the privy-council, to the number of thirty-five, and all the foreign ministers, having met in the council-chamber, by an invitation from the emperor, his imperial majesty made a long speech to the assembly, in which he declared, that, after the example of his predecessor, the emperor Charles V. he made a formal resignation of all his claims and pretensions to the crown of Spain, in favour of his eldest son, Joseph, king of the Romans. And at the same instant the king of the Romans, on his part, made the like resignation in favour of his brother the archduke, who thereupon made his acknowledgements to the emperor and the king of the Romans for the same. The usual oaths were then administered to him on the Gospel, by cardinal Collonitsch, before a crucifix placed on a large table, in the midst of four wax tapers; and the new king received the compliments of the whole court. After this he entertained the emperor his father and all the imperial family at dinner; and in the evening he himself was entertained at supper by his brother the king of the Romans. Never had there been a more magnificent festival seen at Vienna. All the Neapolitan nobility, who were in the Austrian interest, kept open house; at night there were public balls, fireworks, and illuminations. The new king made an offering at the shrine of the Holy Virgin, in the church of Marienzel, of a large cross richly adorned with jewels. On this occasion the states of Lower Austria made his Spanish majesty a present of fifty thousand ducats. Chavauette's Nouvelle Hist. d'Angleterre, 1765, tome iv. p. 259, 260.

In the midst of these battles, and the sieges of so many towns and cities, and whilst the confederate fleets lorded it on the Ocean, Lewis XIV. straining every nerve of government, still appeared in a capacity to make head against the united efforts of the grand alliance: it was therefore resolved to weaken him, by detaching from his interest two of his principal allies, the duke of Savoy and the king of Portugal, in hopes, by means of the latter, to cut out sufficient work for him and his grandson in Italy, and by the assistance of the other to open an easy entry into Spain, whither the archduke Charles had now in view to transport himself in person. The project succeeded to admiration; and in the summer of this year Lewis, to his infinite surprize, learnt for certain that the duke of Savoy was on the point of quitting the Bourbon interest, and was actually in treaty with the emperor. The duke had been treated with great insolence by the generals of France: this, joined to the advantageous offer made him by the emperor, and that versatility which was so truly the characteristic of his family, determined him to abandon the interest of his son-in-law Philip V. and to espouse the cause of the allies. The event proved that he was not at all wanting to the rules of policy in the treaty he made, but he was wanting in another very essential point of politics; I mean the leaving his troops at the mercy of the French while he was treating with the emperor; for though he used the utmost circumspection to conceal his intentions till the end of the campaign; yet the court of Versailles having, as observed, got intelligence of the duke's proceedings, immediately sent orders to the duke of Vendosme to seize and disarm the troops of Savoy that were in his service, to the number of twenty-two thousand men. The duke, by way of reprisal, commanded several French officers that were in Turin, and the French ambassador himself, to be put under arrest. This proceeding produced another order from the French king to the duke of Vendosme, to invade Savoy immediately, and to transmit the following letter, in his Most Christian majesty's name, to his royal highness: “ Since neither religion, honour, interest, alliance, or even your own hand-writing, are of any force between us, I send my cousin the duke of Vendosme at the head of my armies, to make known to you my intentions. He will allow you but twenty-four hours to resolve what you have to do.

The duke in return published a manifesto, setting forth the necessity and justice of his proceeding, and sent expresses to the confederated powers to solicit their assistance against the impending storm. Queen Anne, knowing his importance, as well as his selfish disposition, assured him of her protection; and both she and the States sent ambassadors to the court of Turin. In the mean time, the duke concluded a treaty with the court of Vienna, who promised him all that France and Spain had refused him, viz. Montferrat, Mantua, Alexandria, Valencia, and the countries between the Po* and the Tanaro†, with more money than he received from France in subsidies. The money was to be furnished by England, for the emperor had hardly sufficient to pay his troops. England, the richest of all the allies, contributed more than any of them towards the common cause: she ever has done so. The duke of Savoy in return acknowledged the archduke Charles as king of Spain, and prepared for the worst. Leopold, however, sensible in what a delicate situation this new ally was placed, ordered count Staremberg to march from the Secchia‡ with a body of fifteen thousand men to join the duke. This march is said to have been the best concerted and the best executed of any that was performed during the whole war. He advanced from the Modenese in the worst season of the year, through an enemy's country, and ways that were deemed impassable, having the French both in front and rear. He surmounted, however, all these difficulties, and at length joined the duke at Canelli, so as to succour the country of Piedmont ¶.

No sooner had the house of Bourbon lost this ally than she heard that Portugal had likewise declared against her. Mr. Methuen, our ambassador at that court, had spared no pains to detach his Most Faithful majesty from his unnatural connections with the Grand Monarch. He represented to him, with no less spirit than truth, that should the crowns of France and Spain ever devolve upon the same person, he must not expect to remain long a king. He alarmed his apprehensions for his present safety, by painting to him in the most striking colours, the acknowledged superiority of the confederates by sea, the weight of whose power he must expect certainly to feel, should he at any time, in consequence of an alliance with France, refuse them the free use of his ports; and that his compliance with such a demand would, on the other hand, render his friendship to France of little account. These arguments had their due weight with his Portuguese majesty, who was moreover allured by the prospect of a match between the Infanta his daughter and the archduke Charles, to whom the emperor and the king of the Romans should transfer all their pretensions to the crown of Spain: in fine, a treaty was set on foot and soon concluded at Lisbon, between the emperor, the queen of Great Britain, the king of Portugal, and the States-general. In this treaty it was stipulated, that king Charles (for so I shall henceforward stile the archduke) should be conveyed to Portugal by a powerful fleet, having on board twelve thousand soldiers, with a great supply of arms and ammunition, and that twenty-eight thousand Portuguese should be ready to join him immediately at Lisbon §.

In consequence of these arrangements, the archduke Charles having been proclaimed king of Spain at Vienna, the emperor his father made preparations for sending him to Portugal by way of Holland and England, and at the same time dispatched letters to his Portuguese majesty and the queen of Great Britain, recommending him to their protection. About the middle of September king Charles set out from Vienna for Holland; and passing through the territories of the elector of Hanover, was met by that prince, and complimented on his accession. At Dusseldop * he was visited by the elector-palatine and the duke of Marlborough, the latter of whom made him compliments of congratulation in the name of our queen. Charles received the duke with the most obliging courtesy. In the course of their conversation, taking off his sword from his side (which was very rich, and provided for that purpose) he presented it to the duke, telling him, in French, he was but a poor prince; adding, "Je n'ai que le cape et l'épée; I have nothing but my cloak and my sword: the latter may be of use to your grace, and I hope you will not think it the worse for my having wore it one day." "On the contrary," replied the duke, it will always put me in mind of your majesty's just right and title, and of the obligations I lie under to hazard my life in making you the greatest prince in Christendom." His majesty arrived at the Hague the second of November, where he represented to the States, that the province of Lemburgh appertained to him as king of Spain, and desired he might have the civil government thereof; which the States complying with, his majesty appointed count Zinzendorf to take possession of the town and province of Lemburgh in his name †.

The duke of Marlborough, at the end of the campaign in Flanders, returned to England the thirtieth of October: the queen and prince George of Denmark having been at the Bath seven weeks, came back to Windsor the same month, and on the ninth of November the parliament met: but before we enter upon a detail of its proceedings, I must take notice of the most violent storm, both by sea and land, that had ever been known in the memory of man; I mean the dreadful tempest which arose on the twenty-sixth of November, 1703, about eleven o'clock at night, attended with such flashes of lightning and peals of thunder as filled every mind with the utmost terror and consternation throughout the kingdom. The houses in London shook from their foundations, and several of them falling, overwhelmed the inhabitants in their ruins. The Thames overflowed several streets, and rose to a considerable height in Westminster-Hall. London-bridge was almost choaked up by the wreck of vessels that were beat in pieces in the river. The loss sustained by the capital alone was computed at near two millions, and the city of Bristol suffered to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds: but the greatest loss fell upon our navy, of which there perished no less than thirteen ships: upwards of fifteen hundred seamen were drowned, among whom was Beaumont, rear-admiral of the blue, who had been employed all this year in observing the Dunkirk Squadron. These losses, however, greatly as they might affect us at home, served in some measure to raise our reputation abroad; for orders were immediately issued for building a greater number of ships than were destroyed; and the queen, by several gracious bounties, gave such speedy relief to those seamen who escaped with their lives, and to the distressed widows of such as were drowned, as gained her full possession of the hearts and affections of her subjects. The reader will see in the notes the particulars of this great loss, as taken from the best accounts ‡.

And

§ Besides this treaty, which was ratified on the fourteenth of July, O. S. 1703, Mr. Methuen concluded, on the part of our court, a treaty of commerce with his Portuguese majesty, much to the benefit of both nations, viz.

"Article I. The king of Portugal, on his part, stipulates, both in his own name and that of his successors, to admit for ever hereafter into Portugal the woollen cloths, and the rest of the woollen manufactures of the Britons [these are the very words of the treaty, as found in the fourth volume of Treaties of Peace and Commerce, printed in the year 1732] as they were accustomed, till they were prohibited by the laws. Nevertheless, upon this condition,

"That her royal majesty of Great Britain, in her own name and that of her successors, be obliged, for ever hereafter, to admit the wines of the growth of Portugal into Britain and France; so that at no time, whether there shall be peace or war between the kingdoms of France and Britain, any thing more shall be demanded for those wines, by the name of customs or duty, or by whatsoever other title, directly or indirectly, whether they shall be imported into Great Britain in pipes or hogheads, or other casks, than what shall be demanded for the like quantity or measure of French wines, deducting or abating one third part of the customs or duty. But if at any time this deduction or abatement of customs, which is to be made as aforesaid, shall in any manner be attempted and prejudiced, it shall be just and lawful for his sacred majesty of Portugal, again to prohibit the woollen cloths, and the rest of the British manufactures." Dated at Lisbon, December 27, 1703.

This most just and beneficial convention has remained inviolable to this day, which has preserved an uninterrupted friendship and alliance between the two nations. After England had declared war against France and Spain, it was by no means her interest to use the wines of those two countries, which doubtless could have been imported by neutral ships; and as the red wines of Portugal were therefore in some sort the only kind we could then conveniently and reasonably come at, this treaty was and is still beneficial to both countries, especially as Portugal has, in return for our taking such vast quantities of their wine, constantly taken off a greater quantity of our manufactures, so as to occasion a considerable yearly balance in our favour; and our palates being long so well reconciled to Portugal wines, the Portuguese for our supply have turned great quantities of their lands into vineyards.

And now for parliamentary affairs. The session, as I said before, beginning the ninth of November, the queen opened it with a speech, in which she took notice of the declaration by the duke of Savoy, and the treaty with Portugal, as circumstances very advantageous to the allies: she told them, that though no provision was made for the expedition to Lisbon, and the augmentation of the land-forces, the funds had answered so well, and the prizes had turned out so valuable, that the public had not incurred any debt by those additional services. She observed, that she had contributed out of her own revenue to support the circle of Suabia, whose firm adherence to the allies deserved her seasonable assistance. She assured them that she would not engage in any unnecessary expence of her own, that she might have the more to spare towards the ease of her subjects. She recommended union amongst themselves, and dispatch in the business before them; and above all pressed them to avoid all heats or bickerings that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and state.

It was thought by many that the admonition with which her majesty closed her speech, was intended to prevent the resuming the occasional conformity bill. It appears, however, by a letter of her's to the duchess of Marlborough, that she was no enemy to that bill*. However this might be, the commons would not lose sight of their favourite scheme, and the bill was revived early in the session, though the penalties indeed were somewhat lowered. In the mean time, however, the commons attended her majesty with an address of thanks for her speech, and for engaging the king of Portugal and the duke of Savoy in the alliance; for contributing part of her own revenue to the public service; and for her assistance to the circle of Suabia; and they assured her that they would support her majesty in her alliances, and enable her to carry on the war with vigour†. The lords also presented an address on their parts, much to the same effect.

About a fortnight after the meeting of the parliament, a new draught of an occasional conformity-bill was offered to the lower house. In this the preamble against "persecution for conscience only" was now left out; and in the enacting part, whereas the former bill allowed but four, besides the family, where a conventicle was held, this allowed nine, and inflicted no punishment, unless there were ten or more besides the family. It was hoped by these softenings to make the bill more readily go down. It occasioned, however, very warm debates; but after a violent opposition from the few Whig members that were in the house, it was put to the vote, and was carried by a great majority. The bill being finished on the seventh of December, it was the same day ordered up to the lords for their concurrence, who on the eighth expected it in a full house; but the same not having been sent up, neither on that day nor on the ninth in the morning, lord Hartington, eldest son to the duke of Devonshire, who sat in the house of commons, moved to know the reason why the bill was not carried up according to order, which occasioned a very hot debate in the house about the matter. At length the question being put, whether the house should adjourn till Tuesday the fourteenth, and it being carried in the affirmative, the bill was then sent to the house of lords, who read it the first time; and great debates arising thereupon, there were many learned speeches made for and against the bill; but at last the house divided, whether it should be read a second time, and carried it in the negative, seventy-one to fifty-nine. It is not easy to account for so great a majority this year against the bill, in comparison of last year, when there was not above one or two odds: one would have supposed that the new-made Tory lords might have added such a weight to the balance on the other side as to have carried the point; but the event proved the contrary, and so there we will leave it.

This disappointment, however, did not prevent the commons from making provision for the prosecution of the war. The treaty with Portugal having been laid before them, and being duly considered, they voted forty thousand men, including five thousand marines, for the sea-service of the en-lost on the Goodwin Sands. All her company was lost, being two hundred and twenty men, including twenty-four marines.

IV. The Stirling-Castle, a third-rate, captain Johnson, on the Goodwin Sands, seventy men of which, and four marine officers, were saved; the rest were drowned, being two hundred and six.

V. The Mary, a fourth-rate, rear-admiral Beaumont, captain Edward Hopson, on the Goodwin Sands; the captain and purser ashore. One man, whose name was Thomas Atkinson, was saved, though the rest, to the number of two hundred and sixty-nine, were drowned. The escape of this Atkins is very remarkable: he saw the rear-admiral, when the ship was breaking, get upon a piece of her quarter-deck, from which he was soon washed off; and about the same time Atkins was tossed by a wave into the Stirling-Castle, which sinking soon after, he was thrown the third time into her boat by a wave that washed him from the wreck.

VI. The York, a fourth-rate, captain Smith, lost at Harwich; all her men saved except four.

VII. The Mortar Bomb, a fifth-rate, captain Raymond, on the Goodwin Sands. All her crew lost, being sixty-five.

VIII. The Eagle advice-boat, a sixth-rate, captain Bostock, lost on the coast of Sussex. All her crew, being forty-five, saved.

IX. The Resolution, a third-rate, captain Lisle, on the coast of Sussex. All her company, being two hundred and twenty-one, saved.

X. The Litchfield Prize, a fifth-rate, captain Chamberlain, on the coast of Sussex. All her company, being one hundred and eight, saved.

XI. The Newcastle, a fourth-rate, captain Carrer, lost at Spithead. The carpenter and thirty-nine men were saved. The rest, being one hundred and ninety-three, drowned.

XII. The Vesuvius fire-ship, a fifth-rate, captain Paddon, at Spithead. All her company, being forty-eight, saved.

XIII. The Restoration, a third-rate, captain Emms, three hundred and eighty-seven men, on the Goodwin Sands. Not one saved.

Sir Cloudesley Shovel, who was just returned from the Mediterranean, was then at anchor in the Gunfleet with several great ships, which were all in the utmost danger. He cut his main-mast by the board, which saved the ship from running on the Galloper, of the beach of which she was then in view. Sir Stafford Fairborne had his flag, as vice-admiral of the red, flying in the Association, in which he was driven to Gottenburgh, and then to Copenhagen, from whence he did not get home till next year. The Revenge was forced from her anchors, and with much ado, after driving some time on the coast of Holland, got into the river Medway. The Russell, captain Townshend, was forced over to Holland; and the Dorset, captain Edward Whitaker, after striking thrice on the Galloper, drove a fortnight at sea, and then got safe to the Nore. fuing year; the like number of land-forces to act in conjunction with the allies, besides the additional ten thousand; and they resolved that the proportion to be employed in Portugal should amount to eight thousand. For the maintenance of these armaments, as well as for the discharge of the subsidies payable to her majesty's allies, they granted the sum of three millions eight hundred eighty-one thousand six pounds fifteen shillings. They likewise presented an address to the queen, in which they assured her that they would provide for the support of such alliances as she had made or should make with the duke of Savoy.

At this period the nation was alarmed by the detection of a conspiracy, said to be set on foot in Scotland. It appears that both the French and the pretender entertained great hopes of his restoration to the crown of that kingdom at least, when they saw the Scots would neither settle the succession in the Hanover line, nor grant the necessary supplies for the support of the war; and thereupon Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, with two other persons, were sent over from St. Germain's to Scotland, with instructions to learn the strength and sentiments of the clans, and endeavour to persuade some of the nobility and leading men to engage in the design. Frazer had on his part undertaken to raise a body of twelve thousand Highlanders to act in favour of the pretender, if the court of France would assist them with a body of troops: this Lewis had promised to do. As soon as Frazer landed in Scotland, he waited privately upon the duke of Queensberry, and acquainted him with the whole transaction, at the same time putting into his hands a letter from the late king James's queen, directed to the marquis of Athol. This letter was couched in general terms that might have been addressed to any of the nobility, and the direction was written in a different hand; so that it was generally believed Frazer, who was a man of a most infamous character, had forged it, in order to wreak his vengeance upon the marquis, who had prosecuted him for having violated the chastity of his sister. Queensberry, in consequence of this service, and of the informer's promising to make him acquainted with the whole correspondence between the pretender and his friends in Scotland, provided him with a pass, under favour of which he made a progress through the Highlands, to sound the inclinations of the chieftains. He afterwards proposed a second journey to France, pretending that he should then be able to make more material discoveries; and the duke procured a pass for him to go to Holland from the earl of Nottingham, secretary of state, though under a borrowed name. The duke had already imparted the discovery to the queen, but had concealed the name of the informer, at his own earnest request. Her majesty was the more readily induced to credit the particulars, on account of the evidence given by sir John Maclean, who had lately come over from France to England, and had been apprehended at Folkestone in Kent, and afterwards brought up in custody of the queen's messengers to London. One Keith, whose uncle had accompanied Frazer over to England, was also taken up at the same time; as was Mr. Lindsey, who had been under-secretary to king James and the pretender. One James Boucher also, who had been aid-de-camp to the duke of Berwick, was taken on the coast of Sussex coming over from France. The flocking over of such a number of rebels and out-laws tended still farther to confirm the truth of a conspiracy being in agitation, though they all asserted that their only design was to live peaceably at home under her majesty's government for the future. Sir John Maclean being examined at the earl of Nottingham's office, who was then secretary of state, said, that he was going to Scotland to take the benefit of the queen's pardon; but afterwards both he and Keith, being more closely interrogated, did acknowledge that they had heard of some consultations at St. Germain's, concerning the sending a body of troops to join the malcontents in Scotland, but declared there was no other design on foot at this time, but to pave the way for the pretender's ascending the throne after the queen's decease. On the other hand, one Ferguson, who had been much famed for having a hand in every Jacobite plot, came in voluntarily, and declared that Frazer had been employed by the duke of Queensberry, her majesty's high-commissioner in Scotland, to draw some persons whom he hated into a plot, but that there was in reality no such thing in agitation.

Little credit however was given to these assurances; and the house of lords taking these matters into consideration, resolved, that a committee should be appointed to examine into the particulars; and ordered that sir John Maclean, and the other emissaries, should be taken into the custody of the black-rod, and no person admitted to speak to them. The queen being displeased with this step, as thinking it too officious an interposition to take them out of the hands of her messengers, gave the lords to understand by message, that she thought it would be inconvenient to change the method of examination already begun, and that she would in a short time inform the house of the whole affair. On the seventeenth day of December the queen went to the house to pass the bill for the land-tax, when she made a speech to both houses, in which she declared that she had unquestionable information of the practices and designs carried on by the emissaries of France in Scotland, "which might have proved extremely dangerous to the peace of these kingdoms, as they would see by the particulars, which would be laid before them as soon as the examinations could be fully perfected and made public without prejudice; and that in the mean time, she doubted not but by this seasonable discovery she should be able to give such directions for their security as would effectually prevent any ill consequences from these pernicious designs."

The lords, however, persisting in their resolution to bring the enquiry into their own house, proceeded to name their committee by ballot, and the choice fell upon the dukes of Somerset and Devon, the earls of Sunderland and Scarborough, and the lords Somers, Townshend, and Wharton; and on the twentieth of December they presented the following address to her majesty:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, return our most humble acknowledgements to your majesty for your gracious condescension in promising to communicate to us those informations you have received of the ill practices of your majesty's and our enemies in Scotland.

"And we doubt not but the zeal this house hath shewed for having the persons secured, and their designs signs brought to light, has been very acceptable to your majesty.

"We rely upon your majesty that you will give such directions as may effectually prevent all pernicious designs; and we trust in God Almighty's goodness, that that watchful providence which has discovered the wicked plot so seasonably, will likewise prosper all your majesty's councils and good intentions.

"We reckon all our concerns, but chiefly the greatest of all, the protestant religion, to be very safe under your majesty's tender care and wise administration; and we will, by our utmost zeal, maintain the rights of the crown and the church of England, all such ways as may best answer your majesty's pious designs, and may most promote the good and happiness of all your subjects. We desire not to let our thoughts go beyond your majesty's person to a future security, but as it is necessary for your majesty's preservation, as well as for settling the minds of all your good subjects, who look on the protestant succession as your majesty's best security, as well as their own."

The commons also addressed the queen, and thanked her for her speech and communicating the plot to them, whereby they had an opportunity to repeat their unanimous resolution to stand by and support her majesty and the protestant succession against all pretenders, and all her majesty's enemies whatsoever. They said, they could never have the least distrust of her majesty's vigilance and care for the preservation of the protestant interest in general, and of the monarchy and church of England, as by law established; and they assured her majesty that they would never be discouraged, but would continue incessant in their endeavours by all proper methods to transmit them securely to posterity. In answer to which the queen assured them they might depend upon her willingness to join her endeavours with them in securing the protestant succession and the church of England.

Things had begun now to veer about at court: the earl of Nottingham found himself tottering, the lord-treasurer and the Marlborough family having obtained the ascendancy. Those things, together with the rejection of the occasional conformity bill by the lords, created a misunderstanding between them and the commons, and the latter were glad to find an opportunity to vent their disgust: they took it for granted that the queen was displeased with the proceedings of the upper house, in taking the suspected persons out of the hands of her messengers (though upon the queen's message to them, already related, they had returned them back to their former custody) they therefore presented another address on the twenty-third of December, in which they expressed the just concern they were under to see her royal prerogative violated. They said, they were surprized to find, that when several persons, suspected of treasonable practices, were taken into custody by her majesty's messengers in order to be examined, the lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, had wrested them out of her majesty's hands, and without her leave or knowledge, in a most extraordinary manner, taken the examination of them solely to themselves, whereby a due enquiry into the evil practices and designs against her majesty's person and government might in great measure be obstructed. They desire her majesty that she will suffer no diminution of her prerogative, in the exercise whereof they were resolved to support her, as well as in the carrying on the war. The queen thanked them for their concern and assurances, and did not seem ill pleased at the nature of the address; though the charge against the peers of violating the known laws of the realm was certainly over-stretched, since there did not want precedents of their house having assumed such a right of enquiry: and the attack of the commons seems to have been rather unparliamentary: for the usual method established was, that when the one house was affected with any thing done in the other, conferences were demanded, in which the objected matters were freely debated: but indeed this behaviour in the commons was the pure result of party-pique and artifice. The Tories, or High-Church men, as they were called, who carried all before them in that house, thought no conjuncture so favourable as the present for ingratiating themselves with the queen, by appearing zealous assertors of the royal prerogative.

The lords, however, burning with indignation at the charge brought against them, which they thought most cruel and malicious, resolved to vindicate their honour, and assert their privileges. Accordingly, they came to the following resolution, That by the known laws and customs of parliament they had an undoubted right, whenever they conceive it to be for the safety of the crown and the kingdom, to take examination of persons charged with criminal matters, whether they be in custody or not; and to order that persons to be examined be taken into custody by the sworn officers of the crown attending that house; and that the said address of the commons was unparliamentary, groundless, without precedent, &c. This resolve they backed by a remonstrance to her majesty, which for beauty, decency, and energy of style, was esteemed one of the most capital pieces of the kind that were in all the records of parliament; for which reason, as well as for its containing a precise account of the nature of the dispute between the two houses, we shall give it to our readers verbatim, together with the reply of the commons thereto, though somewhat long*.

"May it please your most excellent majesty,

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, find ourselves under an unhappy necessity of making this our humble application to the throne, upon occasion of an address presented to your majesty by the house of commons the twenty-third day of December last, and since that time published to the whole nation in print; by which the house of lords is charged with the violation of your royal prerogative, and of the known laws of the land; with wresting persons suspected of treasonable practices, and taken into custody by messengers, out of your majesty's hands, without your leave or knowledge, in a most extraordinary manner; taking the examination of them solely to themselves, whereby a due enquiry into the real practices and designs against your majesty's person and government might in great measure be obstructed; and they conclude their address by most earnestly desiring your majesty to suffer no diminution of your prerogative, and promise to support you in the asserting it against all invasions whatsoever. It is not possible for us to remain silent under this heavy charge, so unjustly, and without the least ground or colour, endeavoured to be fixed upon the whole body of peers, which, tending directly to create an ill opinion of us to your majesty, puts us under an inevitable necessity of vindicating both the legality and dutiful manner of our proceeding.

"The expressions in the address of the house of commons are so very harsh and indecent, that we may truly affirm the like were never used of the house of peers, in any age, not even by that assembly which, under the name of the house of commons, took upon them not only to abolish the house of lords, but to destroy the monarchy. We shall carefully avoid making returns of that kind: we consider too much what we owe to ourselves, and we know too well the profound respect due to your royal person, to let any provocation transport us so as to use words unfit to be offered by us to our sovereign.

"The matter of this address is no less injurious to us, than the terms. There was not the least occasion for a just objection to any part of our conduct in the business to which the address relates. The proceeding was strictly justifiable by the known laws and customs of parliament: it was carried on with the utmost respect to your majesty, and with true zeal for the safety of your person and government. All that was done, was agreed to by the concurrent opinion of the house, without the least objection from any of our members, who have the honour of serving your majesty in your great offices and employments.

"We humbly represent to your majesty, that by the known laws and customs of parliament, the house of peers has an undoubted right, in cases where they conceive it to be for the good and safety of your majesty and the kingdom, to take examinations of persons charged with criminal matters, whether such persons be then in custody or not: and also to order the persons so to be examined to be taken into custody of your majesty's sworn officers, attending the house, during such examinations; or to commit them to any other safe custody, that they shall think proper; and to restrain others, if they see cause, from having access to, or communication with them. The house of lords have exercised this right from time to time, as occasions have required, without objection: our records are filled with precedents which warrant our claim, in every part of it; and we presume to affirm to your majesty, that the drawing this right into question, at any time, cannot but be of dangerous consequence to the liberties and safety of the people, and to the constitution of the government, as tending to avoid or render in a great measure ineffectual, the enquiries of parliaments; which are so absolutely necessary, especially where many and great persons are engaged in dangerous designs against the government, or where ill ministers abuse their favour, towards the oppressing and enslaving of the people. Your majesty's wisdom and goodness makes us secure at present against all influences of that kind; and we unanimously and heartily pray we may long enjoy the blessing of your reign; but if it happens in future times, that ill men should gain too great a degree of favour with our princes, how easily will it be for them to stifle or defeat all parliamentary enquiries into their crimes: for if being in prison, or in the hands of a messenger, will protect men from being examined in the house of lords, or from being put into the custody of proper officers of the house, during the examination, and debarred from conversing with others, it will certainly be always in the power of favourites, to cause those who can be witnesses against them, as well as accomplices of their designs, to be taken into custody; and if persons in custody are out of the reach of the house of lords, who are the hereditary counsellors of the crown, and in whom a judicial power is lodged by the constitution, it is not to be imagined that the commons can pretend to a greater power of examining, committing, or restraining them.

"No house of commons, till now, has given countenance to this dangerous opinion, which does so directly tend to the rendering ill ministers safe from the examination of parliament; and we are persuaded no house of commons hereafter will assert such a notion; because they are not wont easily to part with a power they have assumed; and it is certain that they have several times taken upon them to exercise an authority like that which they have so severely reflected on in their address. This consideration gave us the greater astonishment, to find our proceeding represented in the strange terms of wresting prisoners out of your majesty's hands, and taking the examination of them solely to ourselves. We believe the ordering persons to be examined in that high court, where your majesty is always present in consideration of law, and in the great council where you may be present in your royal person as often as you please, will never be thought an exclusion of your majesty from the examinations, if that was intended to be insinuated, by saying we had taken the examinations solely to ourselves. Having thus laid before your majesty what it is we claim, and must insist on as the indisputable right of the house of peers, which was never thought, in the time of your royal ancestors, to be prejudicial to the just prerogative of the crown, and which is manifestly necessary for the securing the liberties of the people, whereof we are assured your majesty will have an equal care; we humbly beg leave to lay before you a short state of the particular matter of fact relating to these prisoners, not doubting but when the whole proceeding is known to your majesty, it will be approved, not only as lawful, but every way respectful to your majesty.

"On Tuesday the fourteenth of December, the house of lords was informed, that several persons had been seized by the custom-house officers on the coast of Sussex, as they came from France; and that among them there was one Boucher, who was capable of making considerable discoveries, having been in arms in the French service for many years, and gentleman of the house and aid du camp to the late duke of Berwick, who stands attainted of high-treason, and who had been secretly in England several times before. That it was probable, if he was strictly examined, he might be brought to confess, since he saw his life was in apparent danger; but that he was a bold man, and likely to attempt an escape, on that very account, if he was not carefully looked after. And the house was also told, that there was a general remissness, both in the taking, searching, and looking to such prisoners; which did afterwards appear very evidently in the examinations that were taken. Upon this information, the earl of Nottingham, your majesty's principal secretary of state, acquainted the house, that he had not heard of Boucher's name particularly; but had sent messengers to bring one Ogilby, and the other prisoners, who had been apprehended by the custom-house officers, to town; and that he believed that the messengers would do their duty; but he would not be answerable for them.

"After this account of the prisoners, and what had been done in order to secure them, the house thought themselves obliged, in duty to your majesty and the public safety, at a time when the kingdom is engaged in a war with France, and that there are too just grounds to apprehend the dangerous practices of French emissaries, to make a humble address to your majesty, that particular care might be taken for securing the persons of Boucher, and of those who were taken with him; and that none might be suffered to speak with them till they were examined.

"The next day your majesty's gracious answer to this address was represented to the house, that care had been taken to secure the prisoners, and that your majesty would give orders, that nobody should speak with them till they were examined. Thereupon the lords entered into a farther consideration of the importance of this matter; and conceiving nothing to be more likely to bring prisoners, who had forfeited their lives, to a full discovery of the truth, than to find themselves under the enquiry of a parliament, they thought it would be a public service for them to make examinations of these persons; and accordingly an order was made, that no persons should speak with the prisoners till they had appeared at the bar of the house.

"On the sixteenth day, the earl of Nottingham informing the house of lords, that the prisoners were brought to town, the usher of the black-rod was ordered to take them into custody, in order to their examination, and to keep them separate and in close custody (as your majesty had before directed); and it being thought most proper, for the nature of the thing, that the examination should be by a committee of lords rather than by the whole house, it was resolved accordingly.

"We beg leave to mention to your majesty a matter of fact, which satisfied the lords that their resolution to examine Boucher and the persons apprehended with him, was neither unknown nor disagreeable to your majesty. On the same day when that was ordered, being the fifteenth of December, the lords resolved to examine sir John Maclean, a very dangerous person, as was represented to the house, who then stood committed in the hands of a messenger; and for that purpose ordered him to be brought to the house the next day, having, as they then thought, very good grounds to believe it might prove of great service to your majesty. Sir John Maclean was brought to the house, according to the order; but your majesty being pleased so far to take notice of this order, as to signify to the house, by the lord-steward, that sir John Maclean had been in part examined already, and that your majesty thought it not proper to have that business taken out of the way of examination it was then in, but that your majesty would, in a short time, communicate it to the house; the lords immediately acquiesced in your majesty's opinion, and sent back sir John Maclean to the place from whence he was brought. It was with this disposition of mind the lords acted in this whole matter; and if your majesty, who no doubt had the same notice of both orders, had thought any other method of examination of Boucher, and the persons taken with him, more proper than that of the lords, they had reason to conclude your majesty would have intimated it at the same time; and most certainly the house would have paid a like deference for your royal judgment in that instance also.

"The lords committees appointed to examine the prisoners, proceeded with all possible dispatch, and made their report to the house on the twenty-first of December. Upon consideration of the report, the house found it requisite to commit Boucher to the prison of Newgate, for high-treason; and the lords committees having submitted to the judgment of the house, whether several parts of the examinations referred to in their report, should be laid open to the house, or put into any other way of being farther enquired into, or prosecuted; the house, out of a full assurance they had, that when the matter of fact should be laid before your majesty, you would certainly give such orders thereupon as were every way suitable to your royal prudence and tender care of the public safety; did unanimously resolve, without so much as suffering those parts of the report to be laid open to the house, that an humble address should be made from the house to your majesty, by the lord-steward and the duke of Somerset (two of the lords committees to whom the examination had been referred), laying before your majesty the whole report, with all the matters relating thereto; and humbly desiring your majesty to give orders, that Boucher should be prosecuted by Mr. Attorney-general for high-treason: and that as for the commitment, prosecution, or discharge of the other prisoners, mentioned in the report, you would be pleased to give such directions as should seem most proper to your royal wisdom. Thus, as the whole affair was entered upon out of zeal for your majesty's preservation, and the safety of the kingdom, and was carried on and concluded with all possible respect to you, so we had the comfort to rest assured, that our behaviour was no less graciously accepted by your majesty, from the answer you were pleased to make, the same day, to our last address on that subject, and which was reported to us, on the twenty-second of December, by the duke of Somerset, whereby your majesty was pleased to signify to the house, with your accustomed goodness, that you would give order for every thing as the lords had desired it.

"Madam,

"This is a true and just account of our proceedings, which have been so strangely misrepresented, and to which no exception can possibly be taken by any persons, rightfully informed: for as we had your royal approbation of all that was done, so the house of commons would have had no pretence of objection, if they had taken the usual parliamentary methods of desiring to be informed of what we had done, and of the grounds of our proceedings, before they had approached your majesty with such a representation of them.

" Their carrying this unprecedented address to your majesty in so hasty a manner, gives us almost as great trouble as the hard usage we find in it. The ancient known, and only effectual method of preserving a good correspondence between the two houses of parliament, has been by conferences: if, at any time, either house conceived they had a reasonable ground to object against the proceedings of the other, conferences have been desired, and the matter in debate with them fairly discussed; and thereby mistakes have been cleared, for the most part, a good understanding cultivated, and a mutual respect preserved, which is always highly requisite in the nature of our constitution, but more especially necessary in the time of war and danger.

" Had the house of commons thought fit to have pursued this method, upon this occasion, we should have been able to have given them entire satisfaction, not only of the lawfulness of all we have done, but of the just and weighty grounds upon which we took the examination of these persons into our hands; or, at least, if they could have convinced us of any mistake, we should have given them any reasonable satisfaction.

" But without taking any such previous step, the house of commons have made an appeal directly to the throne against the house of lords, and charged them most unjustly with attempts of the highest nature. Nothing like this was ever done before; and, out of hearty concern for the preservation of our happy constitution, we hope the same will never be done again. We know your royal heart is unmoveably fixed for the preservation of the liberties of your people, and transmitting them entire to posterity; but if in after-time the house of parliament should be appealing against one another to the crown (for if such a course be justifiable in the house of commons, the same methods may be taken by the lords), as your majesty is now sensible how great difficulties it necessarily brings upon a good prince, so it is easy to foresee (and we cannot think upon it without terror) how fatal the consequences may be in the reign of an ill-designing prince, and what advantages may be taken from it, for utterly subverting the best ordered form of government in the world. There are examples abroad, where proceedings of this kind have ended in the overthrow of the liberties of the people, which makes us the more apprehend the beginning of them among ourselves. Your majesty's great judgment cannot but readily discern, whether it does naturally tend for one house of parliament to be exciting and earnestly desiring the sovereign to exert a real, or supposed, prerogative against the other house. It is not easy to imagine what the commons could expect from your majesty, from such an application. The lords have never entertained a thought of using this dangerous method, whatever occasions may have been given within the compass of late years; and we promise your majesty, we will alway endeavour to preserve a good understanding with the house of commons, and shall never think it too dear to procure that union at any rate, unless that of delivering up those rights and powers which are lodged in us by law, and without which the constitution cannot subsist.

" We shall never be guilty of the presumption of prescribing to your majesty when, and against whom, you should exert your prerogative; but we will be always ready to assist you in the support of all the just rights of the crown, as well as in the maintaining the liberties of the subjects, which we know are no less dear to your majesty.

" It may, with modesty and truth, be affirmed, that the lords have, in all times, been the surest and most natural bulwark of the prerogatives of the crown; they being (as your grand-father, of ever blessed memory, was pleased to express it) an excellent skreen and bank between the princes and people, to assist each other against any encroachment of the other.

" We will never contribute, by any act of ours, to the diminution of the rights of the crown; nor, as far as we are able, will suffer it in others: we cannot act otherwise, without hurting ourselves in the highest degree, being thoroughly convinced, that the preservation of the legal prerogative is not only the surest way to secure our own privileges, but of absolute necessity for the happy and rightful administration of the government; and we hope the house of commons will, in all times to come, speak and act with that regard to the prerogative which they seem to have taken up lately.

" There remains one particular more, which we only name to your majesty, because we rest satisfied it cannot have weight any where; that is, the insinuation in the address, as if the examination of these prisoners by the lords, was in order to obstruct the enquiry into the designs against your majesty's person and government; or, at least, that it was likely to produce such an effect. Our dutiful zeal for your majesty's government, and our warm concern to discover all designs, and oppose all practices, against it, are too well known to the world, that any suggestions of that sort should make the least impression to our disadvantage; and we are very sure it was no suspicion of that nature, which gave the true rise to this very sharp address. It is easy to determine, whether a hearty and forward undertaking to search into the designs of your enemies, or the seeking occasions to object to, and to interrupt, such endeavours, be most likely to obstruct the discovery of the pernicious practices of traitors.

" Most gracious sovereign,

" We most humbly ask pardon for presuming to give your majesty the trouble of this long representation, which has proceeded from the passionate concern we have to stand, not only acquitted, but entirely approved, in the judgment of so excellent a queen, and so justly beloved of all her subjects.

" We depend upon your justice, as well as your goodness, that nothing can do us prejudice (from whatsoever hands it comes) in your royal opinion, while we continue to act, in that station where we are placed by the form of the English government, according to the laws and customs of parliament, with all imaginable respect and duty to yourself, and all possible zeal for the safety and happiness of your kingdom.

" Give us leave to conclude this our humble address with this firm promise, that no dangers, no reproaches, nor any artifices whatever, shall deter or divert us from using our utmost endeavours, from time to time, in discovering and opposing all contrivances and attempts against your royal person and government, and the protestant religion as by law established."
no

To this remonstrance her majesty was pleased to return for answer, "that she was sorry for any misunderstandings that happen between the two houses of parliament, which was so inconvenient for the public service, and so uneasy to her, that she could not but take notice, with satisfaction, of the assurances their lordships gave her, that they would carefully avoid all occasions of them. She thanked them for the concern they expressed for the rights of the crown and her prerogative, which she should never exert so willingly as for the good of her subjects and the protection of their liberties."

The remonstrance of the lords occasioned another from the commons in answer thereto, and in vindication of their own conduct: but this was the language of irritated faction, by which, indeed, both sides were too much actuated. The commons therein said, "their lordships had thought fit to take offence at the manner and words of their address; but that they had made use of no terms but what were suitable to the occasion, and such as had been frequently and reciprocally used by both houses to each other; and whatever expressions their zeal for her majesty and the public might have inspired, they could never have offered their sovereign so ungrateful a remembrance as the destruction of the monarchy, by a detestable assembly composed of members of both houses, who, being alike partakers of the guilt, ought equally to share the reproach."

"That they might, with more reason, observe that their lordships, not contented with preferring their own examinations to her majesty's, and not content with excluding her and the commons (to whom parliamentary enquiries properly belong) had appropriated to their house only the name of a Parliament; an instance, they observed, not to be paralleled, unless by that very assembly that subverted the monarchy."

"The question, they said, was not, Whether their lordships had a right to take into custody persons under examination for matters cognizable in parliament? but, Whether the peers had a right to take the prisoners of the crown, and the examination of them solely into their hands, without her majesty's consent, and in such a manner as must necessarily prove an exclusion of her majesty and the commons? This is a proposition which the commons deny, and for which their lordships have produced no precedent."

"They observed, that when her majesty communicated to the lords the Scottish conspiracy, with an exception only of some matters not yet proper to be made public, and with which her majesty assured them they should be acquainted, as soon as it could be done without prejudice, their lordships immediately addressed her majesty to lay before them the whole matter. This could not but sensibly affect her faithful commons, who earnestly desired that both houses of parliament, and the nation in general, would agree to pay the just deference due to her majesty's wisdom, to confide in her care, and maintain her honour and dignity."

"That the lords, not satisfied with assuming this unprecedented power, had endeavoured to persuade her majesty of the necessity of it, to prevent the ill designs of bad princes and their favourites. But the commons thought it unreasonable to begin to practise upon a good prince those methods which were calculated only to guard against a bad one; and it was their opinion, that the danger might be much greater by admitting this precedent, should the lords at any time combine to defend one another from enquiries or prosecutions."

"Had the lords, say they, consulted their own Journals, they would not have affirmed, that a direct application to the throne, without any previous conference, was an unprecedented practice; nor could they soon forget their address presented to her majesty last session, on behalf of the bishop of Worcester, and their address to the late king, on behalf of the four lords impeached by the commons of high crimes and misdemeanors."

"The commons declared for themselves, that they should be careful, as far as was consistent with their own necessary justification, of reviving animosities; and how great soever the provocation had been, her majesty having declared her uneasiness at these misunderstandings, they should make no difficulty of laying aside their resentment; but hoped they should stand acquitted to the world, and her majesty, since the zeal they had shewn, and the reproaches they had borne, had been owing to no other cause but the defence of our excellent queen, in whose hands God had placed the executive authority over these nations *."

The queen returned an answer to this, much in the same terms as she had done to the lords remonstrance.

The commons also addressed her majesty again, that she would reassume the just exercise of her prerogative, and take to herself the examination of the said conspiracy, declaring, that the establishing a committee of seven lords, for the sole examination of the conspiracy, was of dangerous consequence, and might tend to the subversion of the government.

The lords, however, proceeded with their examinations of the Scottish plot, and on the twenty-ninth of January, 1704, the earl of Nottingham acquainted the lords, that the queen had commanded him to lay before them the papers, containing all the particulars hitherto discovered, in relation to that affair; but that there was one circumstance which could not be properly communicated, without running the risque of preventing a discovery of greater importance. It seems that Keith had tampered with his uncle to disclose the whole secret of the correspondence between the court of St. Germain's and the Scottish Jacobites; and this was the circumstance the queen declined imparting to the lords, until she should know the success of her endeavours, which happened at last to prove ineffectual. The lords, however, not satisfied with this reserve, or perhaps suspecting Nottingham's integrity, presented an address, desiring that all the papers, without distinction, might be submitted to their inspection, that they might be better enabled to go to the bottom of this conspiracy before the end of the session. This application the queen took as an affront, indeed not without reason; and returned for answer, that she did not expect to be pressed in this manner immediately after the declaration she had made; but she hoped, that before the end of the session she should be able to inform them of those particulars, which could not at present be published without manifest inconvenience. Nevertheless, Nottingham in a few days delivered the papers, sealed, to the house, and all the lords were summoned to attend on the eighth of February, that they might be opened and perused.

Accordingly, on the day appointed the lords began with the most material of them, which was drawn up by the earl of Nottingham, entitled, An Account of the Conspiracy in Scotland. It was an abstract of all the examinations the council had taken. Some of the Whigs took great exception at it, as drawn with a design to make the affair appear more inconsiderable than they believed it to be. They then proceeded to examine sir John Maclean, who mentioned several circumstances that were not to be found in Nottingham's paper. He named the persons who sat in council at St. Germain's: he said the command of the troops to be sent over to Scotland from France was offered to the duke of Berwick, who thought proper to refuse it till trial should be made whether the duke of Hamilton, whom he judged the more proper person, would accept it. He likewise explained the particular directions which had been sent to Scotland, in order to prevent the establishing the succession in that kingdom. These, with some other very interesting facts, which were entirely omitted in Nottingham's papers, together with his having discharged an officer belonging to the late king James, who had been seized by the governor of Berwick, and who, had he been detained, might have been of great use in detecting the conspiracy, brought several severe reflections from the house of lords upon that nobleman. It was even moved to pass a censure on the account he had given; but the question being put, it was carried in the negative by eleven voices. The lords were highly offended with Ferguson's report already mentioned, and passed a severe vote against those who had received such scandalous papers, and had not ordered him to be prosecuted, which they now directed the attorney-general to do: but Ferguson never received the least punishment. During the debates one thing very extraordinary happened: the earl of Nottingham affirmed, that upon three or four occasions some things had been ordered in the cabinet-council which the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, who were likewise of that council, did not agree with him in.

The lords having finished the examinations, and glowing with all the flame of faction, voted, That there had been dangerous plots between some persons in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germain's; and that the encouragement for this plotting arose from the not settling the succession to the crown of Scotland in the house of Hanover. These votes were signified to the queen in an address; and they promised that when the succession should be thus settled, they would endeavour to promote the union of the two kingdoms upon just and honourable terms. Then they composed another representation in answer to the second address of the commons, which was filled with reflections and insinuations against the commons, and contained some farther justifications of their own conduct. Among other things, they take notice that the commons stopped the issuing of writs for filling up the vacancies in their house, whereby, they said, they made themselves an imperfect representation, which was a wound to the constitution; that there were very few things less excusable in that unhappy house of commons who began the rebellion, than their refusing to fill up their body, and compleat the representation; and that an ill prince might take advantage of these precedents, and think himself justified in withholding his writs from some places, by as good law as the commons could shew for pretending to stop them from issuing to others; and concluded with expressing a just sense of her majesty's moderation in not suffering herself to be prevailed upon to do any thing to the prejudice of the constitution, from whatever hands the invitation came.

The queen answered, she hoped none of her subjects desired to lessen her prerogative, since she should use it only for their protection and advantage: that any misunderstanding between the two houses must be to the prejudice of the public; therefore she should not omit any thing in her power to prevent the occasions of them.

In the mean while a complaint having been made in the house of commons against the earl of Nottingham, as having endeavoured to stifle the conspiracy, a warm debate ensued, which at length, through the prevailing interest of the Tory party, ended in a resolve, "That the said earl, one of her majesty's principal secretaries of state, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unquestionable fidelity to the queen and her government, and for his steady adhering to the church of England, as by law established, highly merited the trust her majesty reposed in him." They ordered the speaker to present this resolution to the queen, who said in reply, that she was pleased to find the commons so well satisfied with the earl of Nottingham, who was trusted by her in so considerable an office. They then perused the examination of the witnesses which was laid before them, but through the whole of their proceedings gave plain testimony of their disbelief of the reality of a plot: however, they thanked her majesty for having communicated those particulars, as well as for her wisdom and care of the nation*.

The lords and commons, actuated by such different principles, eagerly sought every occasion of arraigning each other's conduct. Unhappily they found but too many: I shall instance one in particular, as being of the most importance to the constitution. The case was as follows †:

An action was brought by one Matthew Ashby against William White, and three other constables of the borough of Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire ‡, for refusing his vote at the last election of burgeceedings of the House of Commons, iii. 308.

ses to serve in parliament for that borough. The cause was tried at the assizes, and the constables were cast, with damages; but the defendants moved the court of Queen's-Bench in arrest of judgment. Three of the judges, Powel, Gould, and Powis, were of opinion the action could not lie, for that the judging of elections belonged solely to the house of commons; adding, that this was the first action of the kind that had been brought, and if these suits were encouraged, it would make the returning officers liable to an infinite number of vexatious prosecutions. Lord chief-justice Holt, however, was of a very different opinion: he said, this was a matter of the utmost importance, as well to the whole nation in general, as to every individual in particular: that there was a great difference between an election for a member and a right to vote in that election: that the house of commons were undoubtedly the only judges of the former; but that the right of voting at an election was an original right, founded on certain specified legal titles, and as such were cognizable only in a court of law. His opinion, however, could not prevail against that of the three other judges, and an order of the court was accordingly issued to quash all the proceedings in consequence of the decree at the assizes. Ashby, disappointed in this quarter, moved the cause by writ of error into the house of lords, where the matter was argued with great warmth, and all the judges were ordered to deliver their opinions: whereupon sir Thomas Trevor, lord chief-justice of the Common-pleas, and several others of his brethren, declared it was their opinion, That the house of commons only had a right to judge of elections, and consequently of the qualifications of the electors; and observed, that petitions to that house were frequently founded on allegations: that some of the voters had no right, and that others were refused that had a right; nor had it ever been disputed that the commons were the only proper judges of this matter, alleging, that if two independent jurisdictions should be allowed in the same case, this might frequently occasion contrary judgments, and create great confusion in the execution of such judgments. To this it was answered, that a voter had no other remedy but in a court of law; for supposing the person was returned he would have voted for, he had no pretence to complain to the house of commons; and if they could admit of such a complaint, they could give him no damages to make him satisfaction for the officers denying his vote; and since this was a right inherent in every voter, it was reasonable an action should be brought for it in the courts of law where all other rights were tried. It was farther urged, that if this determination of the court of Queen's-Bench was confirmed, it would amount to an indemnity for the returning officers, how partial or unjust soever they should prove, and exceedingly multiply those disorders. Many other arguments were employed on both sides the question; but their lordships adhering to the latter opinion, confirmed the verdict given for Ashby the plaintiff at the assizes, and ordered the determination of the court of Queen's Bench to be set aside.

The commons were grievously offended at this decision of the lords, which they looked upon as an encroachment on their privileges, and in the first transports of their resentment passed the following five resolutions, 1. That according to the known laws and usage of parliament, it was the sole right of the commons (except in cases otherwise provided for by act of parliament) to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of election of their own members. 2. That neither the qualification of any elector, or the right of any person, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the commons, except as aforesaid. 3. That the examining and determining the right of qualification, or right of any elector, or any person elected in any court of law, or elsewhere than before the commons, except as aforesaid, will expose all mayors and other returning officers to multiplicity of actions and vexatious suits, and subject them to different and independant jurisdictions, and inconsistent determinations. 4. That Matthew Ashby having brought his action against White, &c. for not receiving his vote, was guilty of a breach of privilege. 5. That whoever shall commence or prosecute any action, indictment, or information, which shall bring the right of electors or elected to the determination of any other jurisdiction than the house of commons, except as aforesaid, such persons, and all attornies, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law, soliciting, pleading, or prosecuting in any such case, are guilty of a high breach of the privilege of this house. These resolutions, signed by the clerk, were ordered to be fixed upon Westminster-hall gate.

The lords were not a little alarmed at these vigorous proceedings of the lower house, and thought it behoved them to support their decrees with the utmost firmness. To this end they appointed a committee to draw up the state of the case; and the committee having made their report, their lordships came to the following resolutions; 1. That by the known laws of this kingdom, every freeholder, or other person having a right to vote at the election of members to serve in parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered so to do by the officers who ought to receive the same, may maintain his action against such officer, and recover damages for the injury. 2. That the asserting that a person having a right to give his vote at an election, and being hindered so to do by the officer who ought to take the same, is without remedy for such wrong by the ordinary course of law, is destructive of the property of the subject, against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tends to encourage corruption and partiality in officers who are to make returns to parliament, and to subject freeholders and other electors to their arbitrary will and pleasure. 3. That the declaring Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the house of commons for prosecuting his action against the constables of Aylesbury, &c. after he had obtained a judgment in parliament for recovery of his damages, is an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature in parliament, and is in effect to subject the law of England to the votes of the house of commons. 4. That the deterring electors from prosecuting actions in the ordinary course of law, where they are deprived of their right of voting; and the terrifying attornies, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law, from soliciting, prosecuting, and pleading in such cases, by voting their so doing to be a breach of privilege of the house of commons, is a manifest assuming a power to controul the law, to hinder the course of justice, and subject the property of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the house of commons.

Printed copies of the case and of these resolutions were sent by the lord-keeper (by the command of the house) to the sheriffs of all the counties of England, to be circulated by them through the different boroughs of their respective counties; and this being the first question of the kind that had ever been agitated, the nation was divided in its sentiments between the two parties.

During these differences between the two houses, her majesty performed an act of generosity which greatly endeared her to her subjects, and was a strong proof of the regard she had to God and religion, by conferring on the poor clergy a more extensive and magnificent bounty than any of her predecessors had done, and which at this day amounts to upwards of twenty thousand pounds per annum, and is still increasing. On the seventh day of February, 1704, her majesty sent a message to the commons, importing, that having taken into her serious consideration the mean and insufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom, she had remitted the arrears of the tenths to the said poor clergy; that she would grant her whole revenue arising out of the first-fruits and tenths, as far as it should become free from incumbrances, towards an augmentation of their maintenance; and that if the house of commons could find any methods by which her good intentions to the poor clergy could be rendered more effectual, it would be a great advantage to the public, and very acceptable to her majesty.

The commons, upon receiving this message, addressed her majesty, expressing their thanks for her gracious message, and her pious concern for increasing the maintenance of the poor clergy out of her own revenue; and assured her majesty they would do their utmost to make her majesty's charitable intentions more effectual; and accordingly a bill was brought in "for the making more effectual her majesty's gracious intentions for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy, by enabling her majesty to grant in perpetuity the revenue of the first-fruits and tenths*." To this they added a repeal of the statute of mortmain, so far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed or by their last wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmentation of benefices. This addition was opposed with great warmth by some of the lords, who alleged it would be opening a door for the clergy to practise on the weakness of dying men: but after some debate the bill was carried by a great majority, and was passed into a law.

The lords have always been considered as the chief support of the rights of the crown; and the commons, as the principal bulwark of the people. At this juncture, however, they appear to have shifted sides; at least the commons had been very remiss in their station. Prince George of Denmark, the lord high-admiral of England, knew nothing of sea affairs, and was moreover so afflicted with an asthma, that he was incapacitated from attending to public business of almost any kind. The management of the navy was therefore committed to a council, who acted under the authority of his name. They had been guilty of shameful neglects and mismanagements, which however had been passed over unnoticed by the commons; but the lords, who now seemed resolved to drag every abuse forth to public view, on the second of March entered upon an enquiry into the condition of the navy†; in which, as I observed before, they found things very indifferently managed: for instance, complaints had been made to the lord high-admiral of bad provisions, by which the seamen were poisoned, as well as the nation cheated; yet a survey of the provisions complained of was delayed for three months, which gave a great opportunity for making such removes and changes, as rendered the proof of this charge altogether impracticable. The merchants complained that they were ill served with convoys, and that so little care was taken of the Newcastle trade, as occasioned an excessive rise of coals. The neglect of providing for such seamen as were prisoners in France was likewise rendered very evident, as was the danger of Jamaica, and the betraying our naval councils to the enemy. These were all digested into an address, which was presented by the house of lords to the queen, who endeavoured to pacify the house by a soft answer, though perhaps the rightest step she could have taken would have been to have dismissed his royal highness's council as lord high-admiral, and either restored the earl of Pembroke, or appointed other commissioners. The lords still continuing their enquiries, soon after resolved, That admiral Graydon, with a squadron of men of war, meeting four French ships and not attacking them, on pretence of his instructions to make the best of his way to the West Indies, was a prejudice to the queen's service, and a dishonour to the nation; and also that his disorderly pressing men at Jamaica, and his severe usage of the masters of merchantmen and transports under his convoy, was a discouragement to the inhabitants

* The first-fruits and tenths was an imposition begun by the popes in the time of the holy wars, and it was raised as a fund to support those expeditions; but when taxes are once raised by such an arbitrary power as the popes then assumed, and after there has been a submission, and the payments have been settled into a custom, they are always continued, even after the pretence upon which they were first raised, subsists no more. Thus this became a standing branch of the papal revenue, till Henry VIII. seemed resolved to take it away. It was first abolished for a year, probably to draw in the clergy to consent the more willingly to a change that delivered them from such heavy impositions: but in the succeeding session of parliament this revenue was again settled as part of the revenue of the crown for ever. It is true, it was the more easily borne, because the rates were still at the old value, which in some places was not the tenth, and in most not above the fifth part of the true value; and the clergy had been often threatened with a new valuation, in which the rates should be rigorously set to their full extent. The tenths amounted to about eleven thousand pounds a year, and the first-fruits, which were more casual, rose one year with another to five thousand pounds; so that the whole amounted to between sixteen and seventeen thousand pounds a-year. This was not brought into the Treasury as the other branches of the revenue were; but the bishops, who had been the pope's collectors, were now the king's, and persons in favour obtained assignments on them for life, or for a term of years. of that island, and prejudicial to the queen's service, and thereupon addressed her majesty that the said admiral might be no more employed. Graydon was accordingly laid aside.

The lords at the same time resumed the examination of the earl of Orford's accounts, in relation to his victualling the fleet while it wintered at Cadiz. This matter had been much canvassed in king William's time; their lordships now were of opinion, that the remarks which had been made on them by the commissioners for auditing the public accounts, were frivolous and trifling; and they confirmed an order the lords of the Treasury had made to pass the said accounts. The commons proposed, and sent up a bill for continuing the commission; the lords made some alterations, especially in the nomination of the commissioners; but these were rejected by the commons. The peers adhered to their amendments; the commons refused to admit them: the bill was dropped, and the commission of consequence expired. No other bill of importance passed in this session, except that for raising recruits, which empowered justices of the peace to impress idle persons for soldiers and mariners. On this occasion the lords addressed against any persons being put in the commission of the peace who had refused the oaths to king William.

The parliament having finished the business before them, her majesty came to the house of peers on the third of April; and the commons being sent for up, she made a speech to both houses, on the usual topics of acknowledgement, unity, and moderation, and prorogued the parliament to the fourth day of July. The acts passed this session, besides the land-tax already mentioned, were, the malt-tax; an act for granting an aid to her majesty by the sale of annuities; an act for registering deeds in the West Riding of the county of York*; an act for the increase of seamen and encouraging navigation, and for the security of the coal-trade; an act for granting to her majesty an additional subsidy of tonnage and poundage for three years; and the act for the augmentation of poor livings, by granting the revenues of the first-fruits and tenths, &c. Thus ended this session of parliament, in which all the rancour of party had been displayed on both sides; and the merit of the cause was less considered than the ends which a particular faction had to answer by it.

I shall just observe, that the two houses of convocation sat at the same time with the parliament;

* By this law, a memorial of all the deeds and conveyances, and of all wills and devises in writing, whereby any honours, manors, and the like, in the said West Riding, may be any way effected in law or equity, may at the election of the party or parties concerned, be registered in the manner as after directed.—And that after such register, every subsequent deed or conveyance of the said honours, manors, and the like, so registered, or any part thereof, shall be adjudged fraudulent and void, unless a memorial thereof shall also be registered; and the like of wills and such matters.—The Register-office to be kept at Wakefield.—This act not to extend to copyhold estates, nor to leases at rack-rent, nor to any lease not exceeding twenty-one years.

The preamble to this law assigns the following very good grounds and reasons for enacting it, viz. "That this West Riding is the principal place in the North for the cloth manufacture, and that most of the traders therein are freeholders, and have frequent occasions to borrow money upon their estates for managing their said trade; but for want of a register find it difficult to give security to the satisfaction of the money-lenders (although the security they offer be really good) by means whereof the said trade is very much obstructed, and many families ruined." See stat. 2 & 3 Annæ reginæ.

It is certainly much to be wished that such a register could be rendered practicable all over England, since many frauds and the division still continuing between the upper and lower house, nothing of any moment was transacted in that assembly, except their address to the queen, upon her granting the first-fruits and tenths for the poor clergy †.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, the earl of Nottingham, after having ineffectually pressed the queen to discard the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, who thwarted him in all his measures, waited on her majesty, and told her that he could no longer serve in councils to which those lords were admitted, and thereupon resigned the seals as secretary of state. The earl of Jerley and sir Edward Seymour, the former lord-chamberlain, and the other comptroller of the household, resigned their staves of office; upon which the earl of Kent was made chamberlain; Mr. Mansel, a gentleman of a very considerable family in Wales, comptroller; Mr. Harley, secretary of state; and Mr. Henry St. John was appointed secretary at war, in the room of Mr. Blathwayte.

Upon these removes, which seemed to throw the weight once more into the scale of the Whigs, that party became so elated, that they quickly after published a paper, entitled, Legion's humble Address to the Lords; in which they reflected with more acrimony than decency on the house of commons, whom they charged with having betrayed their trust, and giving up the rights of the people. They had even the boldness to assert, that the commons were become an unlawful assembly, and ought to be deposed, by the same rule that oppressed subjects may, and in all ages have, deposed bloody and tyrannical princes: that the tyranny of five hundred usurpers was no more to be endured than that of one, since no number or quality of persons could make that lawful, which in its own nature was not so.

They complained that the town of Maidstone had not been permitted to chuse representatives the last session: they inveighed against the notorious partiality shewn by the committees of the commons appointed to examine into and decide concerning controverted elections: they exclaimed against that house for its proceedings in the Aylesbury affair, and having deprived the electors of the right of election; of their complimenting the queen with an hereditary right, when her title was purely parliamentary; and of their addressing her majesty to exert her prerogative against the peers.

They highly commended the lords for having would undoubtedly be prevented thereby, and this too without exposing the circumstances of persons families (the great objection to such an establishment) farther than the nature of such registers absolutely require.

† By this act the queen was empowered to incorporate such persons as she should think fit, and to settle upon such corporation the first-fruits of all benefices for the maintenance of the ministers of the church of England, not sufficiently provided for: and it was farther enacted, That any person by deed or will might grant to the said corporation their estate or interest in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments; and their property in any goods or chattels, for the augmentation of the maintenance of such ministers, having no settled competent pension, to be applied according to the appointment of the benefactor; and in default of such appointment, then in such manner as by her majesty's letters-patent shall be appointed: and the said corporation are enabled to purchase, take, and hold, for the purposes aforesaid, any lands, tenements, goods or chattels, as shall be given or granted to them. An act also passed this session for discharging out of prison such insolvent debtors as should serve, or procure a person to serve, in her majesty's fleets or armies: and another act for the further explanation and regulation of privilege of parliament, in relation to persons in public offices. See stat. 2 & 3 Annæ reginæ.

so nobly vindicated their undoubted rights against the encroachments and invasions of the commons, and asserting the rights and liberties of the people of England: they acknowledged their lordships to be the sanctuary and safeguard of the nation, and the glorious instruments of preserving her majesty and their undoubted rights, and assure them that they will adhere to and faithfully defend their lordships, both in their persons and authority, in vindicating their just rights, defending her majesty's person and their own liberties, and that they would live and die with them. This very extraordinary address was subscribed, "Our Name is MILLION, and we are more."

It can hardly be supposed that so flagrant an outrage upon so illustrious an assembly as that of the house of commons, would pass uncensured by any government that had the least regard to its own dignity and authority, or indeed safety. Accordingly, the queen issued a proclamation, offering a reward of one hundred pounds for the discovery of the authors, and fifty pounds for the printer of this libel. However, I cannot find that any one was punished for it.

As soon as it was known in France that the Scottish conspiracy was discovered, Frazer was, by Lewis's order, confined in the Bastille, where he remained several years. In England, Lindsay being sentenced to die for having corresponded with the French court, was told that no hopes of mercy remained for him, unless he would reveal the whole mystery of the conspiracy. Nevertheless, he persisted in denying all knowledge of any such conspiracy, even at the gallows, whither he was carried with all the dreadful parade of death, the near prospect of which, it was imagined, would have extorted a confession from him; but this not having the desired effect, he was carried back to Newgate, where he remained some years. He was afterwards banished the kingdom, and at length died of hunger in Holland. As to sir John Maclean, the lords, after examining him, had come to a resolution to address the queen in his favour, on account, they said, of his ingenuous confession. He was then discharged from prison, and even received a considerable pension from the crown, though in the queen's time he secretly, and after her death openly, continued in the interest of the pretender, and died in the rebellion against king George I. in 1715.

The ministry had been so very remiss in their enquiries into this plot, that it afforded a very plausible handle to their adversaries the Whigs, to load them with the popular odium of Jacobitism; nor did they scruple to insinuate that the queen herself was influenced by a sisterly affection for the court of St. Germain's. What seemed to confirm this allegation was, the disgrace of the duke of Queensberry, who had been particularly active in investigating the secret machinations of the French court with the pretender's friends in Scotland, though his being laid aside at this time appears to have been really occasioned by the manifest decline of his interest in Scotland, which incapacitated him to do the government any essential service in that kingdom.

The Scots had given repeated proofs of being greatly dissatisfied with their neighbours of England, who, they thought, had too much exerted their influence in their affairs; and they seemed only to wait for an opportunity of shewing their resentment. Their refusal to come into the Hanover succession, or to give supplies for the war in the last parliament, had given occasion to many to conclude that they aimed at a change of government, and to put themselves under the protection of France again, and bring in the pretender. Our court therefore was very desirous to obtain a majority in the Scottish parliament, in order to secure to itself the nomination of a successor to the crown, and obtain those supplies which had been refused last session. Mr. James Johnston, who had been secretary of state for Scotland under king William, had, in concert with the marquis of Tweddale, engaged to carry those points, on condition that the successor to be nominated should be subjected to certain limitations and restrictions; to which the queen agreed. Hereupon Johnston was taken into the administration, and made lord-register, in the room of sir James Murray of Philiphaugh; the duke of Queensberry was displaced, and his post of high-commissioner given to the marquis of Tweddale, and the earl of Cromarty remained sole secretary of state; the earl of Leven was installed governor of Edinburgh castle, in the room of the earl of March; the earl of Glasgow was removed from being lord-treasurer depute, and his place remained vacant.

These alterations being made in the Scottish ministry, the parliament was convened on the sixth day of July this year, when the new lord-commissioner presented them a letter from her majesty, wherein she observed, that their unhappy divisions had proceeded to such an height, as had not only given her the greatest concern, but had also encouraged her enemies abroad to employ their emissaries to debauch them from their allegiance, and render that kingdom a scene of war; but she was willing to hope that none but men who were obnoxious to the laws, or of mean and desperate fortunes, had given ear to them. She said, she was always inclined to believe that the late mistakes did not proceed from any want of duty or respect to her, but only from difference of opinions as to measures of government: that she was resolved to give every satisfaction to her people that they could desire, in regard to the rectifying abuses, and for that end had named the marquis of Tweddale her high-commissioner, of whose capacity and disposition to serve his country there could be no doubt; that she had given him authority to consent to such laws as they should think yet wanting to secure their government in church and state; and having done her part, she hoped they would lay hold of this opportunity of shewing the world the sincerity of the professions they had made her. The remaining part of the letter turned upon the necessity of their granting a supply, the discouragement of vice, the encouragement of commerce, and the usual recommendation of moderation and unanimity*.

This letter was backed by a speech from the lord-commissioner and the lord-chancellor, who each of them assured the parliament, that the whole affair of the Scottish plot should be laid before them, and that her majesty trusted in their prudence and loyalty to take such measures as would effectually prevent the like machinations on the part of her enemies for the future. It would be equally uninteresting and unentertaining to the reader, was I to detain him here with relating the various modes of opposition set up against the ministry on this occasion by the several parties in Scotland, who were at this time adverse to the English government. Suffice it then to observe, that the court, with all the interest it could make, was not able to carry any one of its points. The Scottish parliament resolved not to name a successor to that crown until they had concluded a previous treaty with England, in relation to commerce and other concerns. The populace without doors seconded, in tumultuous assemblies, the resolutions of their advocates within: and the commissioner and his friends finding it impossible to oppose the torrent, and under some apprehension for their own safety, the marquis, with the concurrence of the other ministers, wrote a letter to the queen, representing the disagreeable situation of affairs, and advising her majesty to pass the bill of security, as it was called, without which she must not expect that the parliament would grant any supplies. The lord-treasurer Godolphin, on whose counsel the queen chiefly relied, considering that the army, which was already greatly creditor for arrears, must of necessity be disbanded, and that this would expose the kingdom to imminent danger of an invasion, seconded the advice of the Scottish ministers; upon which the queen authorized the commissioner to pass the bill which was then depending, under the title of a bill "for securing the religion, liberty, and independency of the Scottish nation."

This act provided, that in case of the death of the queen, her heirs and successors, the parliament then in being should immediately meet, and nominate the successor to the crown, different from the person possessing the throne of England, unless during her majesty's reign, there be such conditions of government enacted as may secure the honour and sovereignty of the crown and kingdom, the freedom of the parliament, the religion, liberty, and trade of the nation, from English or any foreign influence: and until the meeting of the estates on such death as aforesaid, the administration of the government shall be by such of the members of the said estates, and such of the privy-council as are then at Edinburgh. And all civil commissions granted during pleasure shall be void, except sheriffs, stewards, and justices of the peace. And for a farther security to the kingdom, it was enacted, that the whole protestant heritors, and all the burghs, shall provide themselves with arms for all the fencible men who are protestants; and the said heritors and burghs shall discipline their said fencible men once a month at least.

The Scottish parliament having obtained this act of security, on which the minds of the nation had been so strongly bent, granted the supply without farther hesitation: but not yet satisfied with this concession on the part of the English court, they began to canvass the affair of the conspiracy, and the proceedings of the house of lords in England, which they termed an officious intermeddling in their concerns, and an encroachment upon the sovereignty and independency of the nation: but while they were proceeding in their debates upon this matter, the high-commissioner, who, from the specimen he had already received of their ungovernable ferocity, dreaded the effects of this enquiry, came to the house on the twenty-seventh of August, and, after a soothing speech, prorogued the parliament to the seventh day of October following. However, before they separated, they drew up an address to the queen, desiring that the witnesses, and all the papers relating to the plot, might be sent down, in order to be subjected to their examination in the next session. Immediately after the adjournment of the parliament, an entire change was made in the Scottish ministry. Tweddale was made chancellor of Scotland, in the room of the earl of Seafield, who, with the earl of Roxburgh, was appointed joint secretaries of state; the privy-seal was given to the earl of Rothes; the post of justice-general, to the earl of Cromarty; the management of the Treasury was vested in the hands of the earl of Selkirk, lord Belhaven, and sir John Hume; Bailie of Jerviswood was made treasurer-depute; and at the same time a commission was sent down to Edinburgh, by which most of the cavaliers or Jacobite party, and all the duke of Queensberry's faction, were outed, and their places supplied by such as it was known would concur with the measures pursued at that time by the court of England, where the Whig interest seemed now to become every day more prevalent*.

From the cabinet and civil affairs of these kingdoms, I shall now proceed to take a view of the operations of the war abroad. The emperor's affairs were at this time in a most deplorable situation, and the house of Austria beheld itself on the verge of ruin, without a timely and powerful assistance. The elector of Bavaria was master of Passau†: thirty thousand French, under the command of marshal Marsin, who had succeeded Villars, overspread the country on the other side the Danube. There were several flying parties in Austria. Vienna itself was threatened on one side by the French and Bavarians, and on the other side by prince Ragotski, at the head of the mutinous Hungarians, fighting for their liberty, and supplied with money by the French and Turks. In this forlorn condition, Leopold had no resource left but to implore the assistance of her Britannic majesty; accordingly, in the beginning of April this year, count Wratislaw, the imperial envoy here, presented a memorial to the queen, setting forth the imminent danger which threatened Germany, and earnestly requesting her relief. This memorial was strongly enforced by the duke of Marlborough, who represented the absolute necessity of speedily succouring the emperor. The queen, entirely guided by that general, returned a favourable answer to the memorial; and the duke embarking for Holland, arrived at the Hague about the beginning of May, where he had a conference with the States-general; and having represented in the strongest terms the danger that the empire and all Europe were threatened with, if an immediate check was not given to the French and Bavarians in Germany; and having shewn that the allies, being now masters of the Maese and all Spanish Guelderland, their frontiers were sufficiently secured, the Dutch at length came into the project for sending a body of troops immediately for the relief of the empire. The forces for the expedition being ordered to rendezvous, and all proper measures being concerted, the duke set forward for Maestricht, and on the sixteenth of May joined the detachment commanded by brigadier Ferguson; and on the eighteenth the English forces commanded by his own brother, general Churchill, assisted by lieutenant-general Lumley, the earl of Orkney, and other officers of distinction. In the mean time, the States regulated the posts of their general officers: Mynheer Auverquerque, their veldt (or field) marshal, was appointed to command their forces on the Maese, having under him the counts de Tilly and Noyelles; Slangenberg, those on the Moselle; Salisch, in Brabant; and Spaar and Fagel in Flanders. As the duke now seemed to bend his march towards Coblenz, the French in Flanders imagined he designed to open the campaign with the siege of Traerbach, and penetrate into France along the Moselle; whereupon they laid siege to Huy, in order to divert him from that enterprize: but this consummate general had a much more important scheme in view; no less than that of marching into the heart of the empire, and delivering the house of Austria from impending ruin. This design he had imparted to a few only, in whose discretion he could safely confide. It was approved by the pensionary and deputy Gueldermallen, who procured the approbation of the States-general thereto. The duke, paying little regard to the motions of the French against Huy, proceeded in his march by Bedburgh, Kerpenord, Kassecken, and visited the frontiers of Bonne, where he received advice that the recruits and reinforcements for the French army in Bavaria had joined that elector at Villingen. The duke now redoubled his diligence, and on the ninth of June got to Miltenheim, where he was visited by prince Eugene, and next day prince Lewis of Baden arrived at the camp. These three celebrated generals held a long consultation; the result of which was, that the duke and prince Lewis should command alternately from day to day, and that prince Eugene should head a separate army on the Rhine. Accordingly, prince Eugene set out for Philipsburgh, and on the sixteenth the duke marched with the horse from Eberspach to Grossen-Seinsen; his other troops proceeding in two columns under the command of the prince of Hesse and general Bulow, but encamped in such a manner that the whole might join prince Lewis in a day's march. On the twenty-second the army made a motion, and joined that prince at Wassertel. In the mean while, the duke had notified to the States-general her Britannic majesty's orders to march to the relief of the empire, expressing his hope that they would approve of the design, and allow their troops to share the honour of the enterprize. By the return of the courier he received their High Mightinesses approbation of the project, and full power to command their forces*.

The English general having his hands now at full liberty, and being left to act as he pleased by his queen and her allies the Dutch, prosecuted his march into the heart of the empire, and by forced stages arrived on the banks of the Danube near Donawert†, opposite to the Bavarian lines, where about eight thousand French, and as many Bavarians, lay entrenched, to guard the country they had conquered. On the first of July Marlborough encamped with his right at Amerdghem, and his left at Onderingen. The elector of Bavaria hereupon sent a detachment of his best troops to reinforce count d'Arco, who was posted at Schellenberg, a rising ground on the Danube, near Donawert, where for several days he had been raising entrenchments, as being a post of vast importance. The duke, however, knowing that the works were not compleated, resolved to attempt driving the enemy from their post; and, willing to have the sole glory of this important piece of service, he chose the day on which he had the command, which, as I have already mentioned, he was to share alternately with the prince of Baden, and gave orders for attacking the enemy without the assistance of his colleague. Accordingly, on the second of July his grace advanced at three o'clock in the morning, with a detachment of six hundred foot, thirty squadrons of English and Dutch, and three battalions of imperial grenadiers, the rest of the army following him with all possible diligence: but the way being bad and long, and other unavoidable accidents intervening, it was near three o'clock in the afternoon before he could get over the river Wermitz, which runs by Donawert, with our artillery. The attack was at length begun with an unparalleled intrepidity by the English and Dutch, before the Imperialists could come up. The enemy on their side made a most vigorous defence; but after an engagement of about an hour and an half, in which time the Imperialists came up, the entrenchments were forced, and the allies made a terrible slaughter of the enemy, who, as soon as they saw us in possession of their works, ran away in great confusion towards Donawert and the Danube; but being closely pursued by our horse and dragoons, the greatest part followed the example of count d'Arco and the rest of their generals, who flung themselves into that river and swam over it. Few actions were more bloody than this for the time it lasted. As the attack was begun by a battalion of the English foot-guards, and the regiments of Orkney and Ingoldsby, they suffered more than any others. Upon the whole, we lost about six thousand men, including many gallant officers. The loss of the enemy was computed at about eight thousand. We took sixteen pieces of cannon, and thirteen colours and standards. The duke gained great honour by the action; but he was once in imminent danger of being routed, had not prince Lewis of Baden arrived with his Imperialists in the critical moment to his assistance, in which piece of service he was wounded. The day after this action, the army marched towards Donawert, of which the duke took possession, the Bavarian garrison quitting it upon his approach, after breaking down all the bridges; but they had not time to destroy the ammunition and provisions, as they were ordered to do. The elector of Bavaria hearing of the defeat of his troops, repassed the Danube with the utmost precipitation, in order to march to the river Leche, lest the victors should cut off his retreat to his own country. On the fifth of July the confederate army passed the Danube over several bridges of pontoons near Donawert, and encamped at Mertingen, in the elector of Bavaria's country, and the sixth was observed as a thanksgiving in the army for their success. Marlborough, not to give the enemy time to recover from their consternation, immediately ordered his troops to pass the Leche; whereupon the garrison of Neuburg abandoned that place, and retired to Ingoldstadt. Neuburg was immediately secured by the confederates; and the enemy having left a small party in Rain *, the siege of that town was immediately formed. The elector of Bavaria encamped under the cannon of Augsburg †.

On the thirteenth of July the count de Vehlen, general of the Palatine horse, arrived in the confederate army from prince Eugene, with advice that the marshals Villeroy and Tallard, with forty-five thousand men, had passed the Rhine above fort Kehl, in order to join the elector of Bavaria; and therefore his highness desired a reinforcement of horse to observe the enemy's motions. Thereupon prince Maximilian of Hanover was detached with 30 squadrons of Imperialists as a reinforcement for Eugene. On the 16th the garrison of Rain capitulated, and were conducted by a party of horse to the elector of Bavaria's camp; and orders were given for providing magazines at Neuburg and Rain for the subsistence of the confederate forces. The army then resumed its march, and on the twenty-third encamped with the right at Wolfurtzhausen, and the left at Oostmaring (the town of Friedberg being in the center of the line) within a league of Augsburg, whereby the elector of Bavaria saw all communication with his own country entirely cut off.

The duke of Marlborough having now reduced the elector to the last extremity, proposed very advantageous terms of peace, provided he would abandon the French interest and join the Imperialists in Italy. The elector seemed at first inclinable to accept the proposals, and even agreed to a negotiation, which was in a manner brought to a conclusion; but upon advice that marshal Tallard had passed the Black Forest, and was in full march to join him, he suddenly receded from the treaty, and declared, that since the French king made such powerful efforts to support him, he thought himself obliged in honour to remain firm to his alliance. His wretched subjects, however, paid dear for this temporizing conduct of their prince. The confederate generals so resented his procedure, that they detached thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons to plunder and burn the country of Bavaria, to the very walls of Munich, its capital.

In the mean time marshal Tallard, notwithstanding all the vigilance and precaution of prince Eugene, joined the elector of Bavaria at Biberach, near Ulm, with an army of twenty-two thousand men, about the end of July; of which the duke of Marlborough having received intelligence, decamped on the fourth of August from Friedberg, and marched that night to Kippach. The next morning the army continued its route, and went to Hokenwert, where it continued two days; during which time the duke of Marlborough, prince Lewis of Baden, and prince Eugene, held a council of war, in which it was agreed that prince Lewis should besiege Ingoldstadt, while the other two were to observe the elector of Bavaria. On the eighth the army decamped from Hokenwert, and marched to St. Sanditzell, and on the ninth to Axheim. The same day the duke of Marlborough received intelligence that the enemy had passed part of their army over the Danube at Dillingen, or Lavingen; upon which the duke gave orders to general Churchill to march with a strong detachment over the Danube at Sconevelt, to reinforce prince Eugene, who lay near Donawert. The whole army followed the next day, and joined the forces of prince Eugene at the camp of Munster; prince Lewis having by this time marched off towards Ingoldstadt, which he was to invest. On the twelfth of August the duke and the prince took a view of the enemy, whom they found advantageously posted on a hill near Hochstet ‡, their right being covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim §, their left by the village of Lutzingen, and their front by a rivulet, the banks of which were steep, and the bottom very marshy. Notwithstanding this advantageous position of the enemy, it was determined in a council of war to attack them before they could fortify themselves in this post, as advices had been received that Villeroy was to march into Wirtemberg to destroy that country, and to cut off the communication of the allies with the Rhine, which must have been attended with very fatal consequences to the latter. The same night therefore (the twelfth of August) the duke ordered all the baggage to be sent towards Donawert, and the army to be ready to march by break of day, which accordingly it did, in nine columns, the Imperialists being to the right, and the English and Dutch on the left. By six or seven o'clock in the morning of the ever-memorable thirteenth of August, the allies appeared in sight of the enemy's camp, where every thing was in profound silence, neither Tallard nor Marfin having once § Blenheim (or Plentheim) is a village in Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, upon the confines of Suabia. It stands on the north side of the Danube, and has on the north-east side of it a very small rivulet called the Meul-Weyer. imagined that the confederates would have dared to attack them in such a position. The appearance of our troops threw them into great confusion: they fired two pieces of cannon to recall their foraging parties, and also set fire to several small villages that lay between the confederate army and theirs. The cannonading began about nine in the morning, and was maintained on both sides till one in the afternoon.

The French army, including the Bavarians, consisted of eighty-two battalions, and one hundred and sixty squadrons; in all, near sixty thousand men. Marshal Tallard commanded the right wing, and the elector, with Marfin, the left. The number of the confederates did not exceed fifty thousand: their right was led by prince Eugene; their left by the lord Cutts and Orkney, the generals Churchill, Lumley, and Ingoldsby; and the duke of Marlborough took his station in the center, as commander of the whole. Tallard, according to M. de Voltaire, had all the impetuous and sprightly courage of a Frenchman, with an active and penetrating understanding, and a genius fruitful in expedients and resources; but he laboured under a malady of very dangerous consequence to a general: his sight was so weak, that he could not distinguish objects at the distance of twenty paces from him; and it has been asserted by those who knew him well, that his fiery courage, quite the reverse of the duke of Marlborough's, growing still warmer in the heat of action, deprived him sometimes of the necessary presence of mind. This was the first time that marshal Marfin had commanded in chief: with a great deal of wit, and a good understanding, he was thought to have had rather the experience of a good officer than that of a general. As to the elector of Bavaria, he was looked upon not only as a great general, but as a valiant and amiable prince; but then he had a greater share of magnanimity than application.

This battle, which proved so bloody, and decided the fate of the elector of Bavaria, by the loss of all his country, began between twelve and one in the afternoon. The allies had a rivulet to cross before they could attack the enemy, who had guarded it only by three squadrons of horse, under M de Zurlauben, a Bavarian general, who attacked our troops with great vigour and resolution, and obliged them to give back three times; but this handful of French not being properly supported, they were soon overpowered by numbers, and obliged to retreat in their turn. The French generals were accused of a number of errors in this day's action; one in particular was, their not having taken care to send a sufficient force to dispute the passage of this rivulet against the confederates; a mistake they could never after retrieve. Their artillery, indeed, played very hotly upon our troops, but with very little execution; so that, by the help of pontoons and fascines, they effected their passage in the face of the enemy. General Wilkes, at the head of nine battalions of English and Dutch, attacked the village of Blenheim, to the left of the enemy, and was repulsed, after three successive attempts. Mean while the troops in the center, and part of our right wing, having crossed the rivulet in several places, formed on the other side, without any interruption from the enemy, who remained quiet on the hills of which they were possessed. Marlborough then attacked Tallard's cavalry: that general, a little before, had rode towards the left wing, to observe its disposition. It was no small disadvantage to Tallard's corps, from the beginning, to be obliged to fight without its general at its head. The corps commanded by the elector and Marfin, had not yet been attacked by prince Eugene: Marlborough began upon the enemy's right wing near an hour before Eugene could come up to the left. As soon as marshal Tallard heard that Marlborough had attacked the wing which he commanded, he immediately posted thither, where he found a furious action begun. The French cavalry, however, had behaved with such resolution, that they had put our troops in disorder, and even obliged part of them to repass the rivulet; but a reinforcement of dragoons coming up, the French were broke in their turn, and forced to recoil. The marshal then went to the village of Blenheim, where he had posted twenty-seven battalions and twelve squadrons; and this formed a little detached army, which kept a continual fire on Marlborough's corps, during the whole time he was engaged with Tallard's wing, who, after he had given his orders in this village, hastened back to the place of action, where the duke, with a body of horse, and some battalions of foot between the squadrons, was driving the French cavalry before him.

The cavalry of the left wing of the confederates being now completely formed, ascended the hill of Lutzingen with amazing intrepidity, charging the enemy's horse so hotly, that, though they rallied several times, they were at length put to flight. The victorious Marlborough now forced his way between the two bodies of the French army, on one side, while on the other his general officers got between the village of Blenheim and Tallard's division, which was also separated from the little army in that village. In this desperate situation, marshal Tallard flew to rally some of his broken squadrons; but the badness of his sight made him mistake a squadron of the enemy for one of his own, and he was taken prisoner by the Hessian troops in English pay, together with the marquis de Montperoux, general of horse, the majors general de Sepperville, de Silly, de la Valiere, messieurs de la Melissiere, St. Pouange, de Legendais, and many other officers of distinction.

While these things were transacting in one part of the field, Marfin's quarters, at the village of Oberklau, in the centre, were attacked by ten battalions, under the prince of Holstein Beck; but before he could form his men on the other side, he was overpowered by numbers, desperately wounded, and taken prisoner. His battalions, however, being supported by some Danish and Hanoverian cavalry, returned to the charge, and were again repulsed. At length the duke of Marlborough in person advanced to their relief with some fresh squadrons from the corps de reserve, and obliged the enemy to retire.

Prince Eugene had attempted the passage of the rivulet at a place where the banks of the stream were very steep, and the bottom very rough and uneven: the least opposition on the part of the enemy must have rendered his efforts fruitless, and have obliged him to go back; but they made none;

so that, being got on the other side, he attacked the left wing, commanded by the elector and Marfin, with great vigour. But the imperial horse behaved on this occasion in a very bad manner; they were so intimidated by the furious fire the French made upon them, that they could not be brought to advance within musket-shot: the Danish and Prussian troops also gave back in the same manner; however, at length, being animated by the example of their officers, they took heart, returned to the charge, and exerted themselves with such vigour, that they at length put the enemy to the rout; and the elector and Marfin, finding it in vain to make farther resistance, abandoned Oberk-lau and Lutzingen, and were pursued as far as the villages of Morselingen and Geissenhoven, from whence they retired to Dillingen and Lavingen. The rout now became general throughout the French army; every one fled with the greatest precipitation; and so extreme was the terror and confusion, that officers and soldiers ran headlong into the Danube, without knowing whither they were going.

The count du Bourg (afterwards marshal of France), saved a small part of the infantry, by retreating over the marshes of Hochstet; but neither he, Marfin, nor any one else thought of the little army which still remained in Blenheim, waiting for orders. It consisted of twenty-seven battalions and twelve squadrons, making about eleven thousand effective men, all the best troops of France; and the confederates, being now masters of the field of battle, surrounded Blenheim. It was impossible for the French to get out of the narrow streets of a village, and range themselves in order of battle, in the face of a victorious army, that would have overwhelmed them at once with a superior front, and blown them to atoms with their own artillery, which was all fallen into the hands of the victors. The general officer who commanded these troops was the marquis de Clerambault, son to the marshal of that name. On the first news of the defeat of the cavalry, and that Tallard was taken prisoner, he abandoned his men, and endeavoured to save himself by swimming across the Danube, but perished in the attempt. Marshal Blansac then took the command; but, upon the approach of our victorious troops, his courage failed him: he found it was impossible to maintain his troops, and thought proper to capitulate; and, about eight o'clock in the evening, signed the articles, in consequence of which the French troops in the village laid down their arms, delivered their colours and standards, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on condition that the officers should not be rifled.

Thus ended this famous action, which in France is known by the name of the Battle of Hochstet, and by the English and Germans called the Battle of Blenheim, and was one of the most glorious and complete victories that ever was gained in any war, or by any general. The French army was almost entirely cut to pieces; of sixty thousand men, who had been so long accustomed to victory, not above twenty thousand could be gathered together after the battle. Ten thousand French and Bavarians were killed upon the spot; the greater part of thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons were drowned in the Danube; thirteen thousand were made prisoners, including twelve hundred officers; one hundred pieces of cannon were taken, with twenty-four mortars, one hundred and twenty-nine colours, one hundred and seventy-one standards, seventeen pair of kettle-drums, three thousand six hundred tents, thirty-four coaches, three hundred laden mules, two bridges of boats, fifteen pontoons, twenty-four barrels and eight casks of silver. The loss of the allies amounted to about five thousand killed, and eight thousand wounded and taken prisoners*.

The emperor was no sooner informed of this signal victory, which had saved his family from impending ruin, than he wrote a letter to the duke of Marlborough, expressing his obligations to him, and offering to create him a prince of the empire. The duke declined the honour till he had obtained the consent of the queen; and this being procured, he was immediately advanced to that high dignity, and Mindelheim was bestowed on him as his principality; but he was never known by that title, the name of Marlborough being now the most noble he could bear.

By the dispersion of the French army, an open passage was left to the allies from the Danube to the Rhine: it was therefore thought most advisable by the confederate generals, to join all their forces, and drive the enemy entirely out of Germany. Accordingly, prince Lewis of Baden abandoned the siege of Ingoldstadt, and on the 26th day of August all the forces of the allies began their march under the conduct of the duke of Marlborough, with the princes Eugene and Lewis, by different routes, to the general rendezvous at Bruschal, near Philipsburg, having first left twenty-three battalions and some squadrons to carry on the siege of Ulm† under general Thungen. The duke also took care to send marshal Tallard under a guard of dragoons to Franckfort, and disposed of all the other prisoners of distinction in the adjacent places. He also ordered a detachment to take possession of Augsburg, which the French garrison had evacuated. After a few days spent at Bruschal in order to refresh the troops, it was determined in a council of war, that prince Lewis of Baden should undertake the siege of Landau, in order to secure the circle of Suabia from the incursions of that garrison. This is said to have been a measure proposed and warmly insisted on by the prince of Baden, who was jealous of the glory Marlborough might acquire should he, pursuing the advantage he had already gained, drive the enemy again before him. Marlborough, gistrates, who are all Lutherans, as are most of the inhabitants. It is a large populous city, with regular fortifications and deep ditches, but not able to sustain a long siege; is a place of good trade, and its artists excel in clock-work and hard-ware. It lies thirty-six miles west of Augsburg.

though sensible that nothing could be more impolitic than this measure, which gave the foe time for recollection and recruiting their forces, consented to the proposal, and even submitted to cover the siege while prince Lewis carried it on; for which purpose he and prince Eugene encamped at Croon Weissenburg, in the neighbourhood of Landau, which was invested about the middle of September; by which time news arrived in the camp that Ulm had surrendered to Thungen, on the first appearance of that general before its walls. In the place were found two hundred and twenty-two pieces of brass cannon, twenty-two brass mortars, one thousand two hundred barrels of powder, with a considerable quantity of provisions; all of which were extremely serviceable to those employed in the siege of Landau. While the duke of Marlborough lay covering the operations of prince Lewis with his army, marechal Villeroy approached with his army as if he intended to attack the confederates in their entrenchments; but this proved to be a mere bravado; for after having lain a few days in sight, he thought proper to retire without making the least attempt to relieve the place, which continued to make a most obstinate resistance, till the twenty-third day of November, when the besiegers, having made some advantageous lodgments, and the breaches being rendered practicable, the garrison capitulated, in order to prevent the fatal consequences of a general assault, and were indulged with honourable terms. Joseph, king of the Romans, the emperor's eldest son, had arrived some time before in the camp of the confederates, that he might have the credit of taking the place; but his behaviour was not such as to give any favourable impression either of his courage or understanding. He was seldom seen in any post of danger, and was continually surrounded by his priests and confessors, who seemed to have engrossed his whole confidence and affection. He was, however, commendable in bestowing the government of the place on the count de Frize, who had before defended it with great courage and ability*.

After the precipitate retreat of Villeroy, the duke of Marlborough having nothing to apprehend from that quarter, and the siege of Landau being drawn out to a great length, his grace, without waiting for the end of it, advanced with a part of the army to the Saar, surprized Treves, possessed himself of other proper posts for erecting magazines, and opening the next campaign with the siege of Saar-Louis; after which he caused Traerbach to be invested by the prince of Hesse-Cassel; and though the place was strongly fortified and well defended, the attacks were carried on with such vigour and resolution, that in about six weeks the garrison surrendered on honourable terms. On the tenth of November the king of the Romans concluded a treaty with the electress of Bavaria, whereby she was to surrender all the towns in Bavaria to his imperial majesty, her electoral highness being permitted to remain in Munich with a guard of four hundred men, and to be allowed a yearly pension out of the revenue of the electorate, for the support of her court and family. The operations of this year's campaign in Germany being concluded by the surrender of Landau, the duke of Marlborough repaired to Berlin, where he contracted for a reinforcement of eight thousand Prussians, to serve under prince Eugene in Italy during the ensuing campaign. Thence he proceeded to the court of Hanover, and so on to the Hague, where he was congratulated by the States-general on his victories at Schellenberg and Blenheim, and treated with as much consideration and respect as if he had been actually the stadtholder. In December he embarked for England, where he was received by all ranks of people with those demonstrations of joy and gratitude which his important services so well deserved†.

In Flanders very little passed worthy notice this campaign, except the bombardment of Bruges and Namur by baron Spaar with nine thousand Dutch troops, and two attacks upon the French lines by M. d'Auverquerque, who actually forced them, though he was not able to maintain the footing he had gained. The elector of Bavaria, who after his defeat had retired to Brussels, assembled all his forces, with a view to surprize the Dutch general; but he was dissuaded from this hazardous enterprize by marechal Villeroy, who represented in the strongest terms the fatal consequences that would inevitably ensue in case of a repulse.

In Italy the French were greatly superior to the duke of Savoy, who was obliged to be inactive, and see Vendosme reduce Vercelli and Ivrea. The French afterwards made themselves masters of the valley of Aosta, whereby his royal highness's communication with Germany by the way of Switzerland was entirely cut off; and on the fourteenth of October the duke of Vendosme laid siege to Verrua, a strong fortress, situated on the other side of the Po, between Casal and Turin. It held out five months against all the efforts of the French general, the duke of Savoy having posted his little army on the other side of the Po at Crescentino, where he had a bridge of communication, by which he supplied the place occasionally with fresh provisions; but at length the communication being cut off, the duke of Savoy retired to Chivas, and Verrua surrendered to the enemy. The duke of Savoy complained greatly of having been abandoned by his allies on this occasion; and indeed the emperor had greatly neglected Italy, that he might act with more vigour against Ragotski and the Hungarian malcontents, over whom he had gained several advantages; notwithstanding which, they continued very formidable. In the summer of this year a treaty had been set on foot between Leopold and them, under the mediation of the English and Dutch, who sent their ministers into Hungary for that purpose; but after much time had been spent in treaties, the war was renewed on that side; and the troops which had been promised to the duke of Savoy, to assist him against the French, were ordered into Hungary, and the burthen of the war in Italy thrown upon the English and Dutch‡.

I shall now proceed to take a view of the measures prosecuted by our court in support of the interests of the archduke of Austria, whom the allies had determined to set upon the throne of Spain, in opposition to the French king, who had already placed his grandson the duke of Anjou in that soverignty, by the name of Philip V. The reader may remember that I left the archduke, whom we must now call Charles III. (for by that title he was recognized by the confederates) at the Hague, concerting with the Dutch and the duke of Marlborough the most suitable steps to be taken for asserting his claim. On the twenty-third of December of the preceding year, his catholic majesty arrived at Spithead, and the next day the duke of Somerset, master of the horse to the queen, waited on him on ship-board with a letter of compliment from her majesty, and acquainted him that she expected to see him at Windsor. The next day Charles landed and went to Petworth, a seat of the duke of Somerset in Sussex, where the prince of Denmark was come to receive him, and they were both splendidly entertained there by the duke that evening. On December 29, his Catholic majesty and the prince set out for Windsor, where they arrived about seven at night. His majesty was received by the queen at the head of the grand stair-case. Having made his compliments, he thanked the queen for her generous assistance; and having led her majesty into her chamber, she presented several ladies of the first quality to him, who had each of them the honour of a kiss from his royal lips; then the prince waited on his majesty to the apartment prepared for him. His majesty supped that night with the queen and prince, the queen giving him the right hand at table, and the prince sitting at the end. While the king was at Windsor, the Spanish merchants attended him to wish him success, desired his protection, and were graciously received by him.

His Catholic majesty being very desirous of prosecuting his voyage to Lisbon, set out on the thirty-first of December for Portsmouth, and the next day went on board admiral Rooke in the Royal Catherine at Spithead. The Dutch Squadron arriving in that road on the fifth of January, 1704, the combined fleet set sail for Portugal, having on board a body of land forces under the duke of Schomberg. When admiral Rooke had almost reached Cape Finisterre, he was driven back by a storm to Spithead, where he was obliged to remain till the middle of February; then being favoured with a fair wind, he happily performed the voyage to Lisbon, arriving there on the twenty-fifth of February; and after ten days had been spent in adjusting the ceremonial, the king of Portugal came on board the English admiral in person, with most of the royal family, to conduct his Catholic majesty to shore, where he was received with great splendor, though the court of Portugal was then overspread with sorrow for the death of the Infanta, whom the king of Spain intended to espouse. Among other debates in relation to the ceremony of receiving the king of Spain, there was one which deserves particular notice, and that was in relation to our flag, which I shall transcribe from the account published by authority. The king of Portugal desired, that upon his coming on board the admiral's ship in his vessel of state, and striking his standard, the English flag might be struck at the same time; and that when his Catholic majesty, with himself, should go off from the ship, his standard should be hoisted, and the admiral's flag continue struck till they were on shore. This proposition was made from the king of Portugal by the king of Spain. To which the admiral replied, that his majesty, so long as he should be on board, might command the flag to be struck when he pleased; but that whenever he left the ship, he himself was admiral, and obliged to execute his commission, by immediately hoisting his flag. This, and some other reasons, satisfied the king of Spain, as well as his Portuguese majesty, so that the flag of England was no longer struck than the standard of Portugal.

Notwithstanding the exterior civility and friendship which the court of Portugal affected to display towards king Charles, that prince soon found little or no preparations to support his interest, or to open the campaign with vigour. The Portuguese ministry were secretly friends to the French; the people being led entirely by their priests, had an invincible aversion to those they called heretics. Another misfortune was, that the duke of Schomberg was on ill terms with Fagel, the Dutch general, and both of them were envied by the Portuguese officers, who had prevailed on their king not to suffer the English and Dutch to command their own forces, or act in a body, but to distribute them into his little paltry towns that were not tenable. The king of Portugal had promised to enter Spain with Charles by the middle of May, but he was not ready till the middle of June, when they reached Santareno. Here they published their respective manifestos, Charles displaying his title to the crown of Spain, and offering his pardon to all his subjects who should in three months join his army and the king of Portugal, declaring that his sole intention in taking up arms was to restore the liberty of the Spanish nation, oppressed by the power of France, and to assert the right of his Catholic majesty Charles III. to that monarchy, unjustly usurped from him by the duke of Anjou. The duke of Anjou, however, the present possessor, took care in the mean time to anticipate the designs of his competitor, and the powers who supported him.

The duke of Berwick, who had engaged in the service of Philip, and soon distinguished himself as an able general (tho' he had passed elsewhere for a man of a very middling military genius) entered Portugal in the beginning of May, and took the town of Segura by surprize, and so intimidated the governor of Salvaterra, that he delivered up that place without making any defence. Cebreros was next reduced, with very little opposition. Zebredo was quitted by its inhabitants, and the town of Ithana la Viella was taken by storm. At the same time the marquis de Jeoffreville, prince Tserclaes de Tilly, and the marquis de Villadarias, were sent with three separate bodies of troops, to invade Portugal in as many different quarters, while the duke of Berwick laid siege to Sovreira Formosa, defended by two battalions of Dutch, who were compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war. The duke then passed the Tagus*, and joined prince Tserclaes. King Philip arriving soon after in

in the army, laid siege to Portalegre, and the garrison, including an English regiment of foot, commanded by colonel Stanhope, were taken in the place. Philip next proceeded to invest Castel-Davide, which gave him very little trouble in the reduction. On the other hand, the marquis das Minas, the Portuguese general, penetrated into Spain with fifteen thousand men, and took Fuente Grimaldo in Castile by storm, routed a body of French and Spaniards commanded by Don Ronquillo, and made himself master of Manseinto. It being now the latter end of June, and the weather growing exceedingly sultry, Philip sent his troops into quarters of refreshment; and not thinking it possible to preserve all his conquests, ordered his troops to abandon them, except Marvan and Salvaterra, and to raze the walls of Portalegre, Castel Davide, and some other towns. The allies followed the example of Philip, by putting their troops under covert from the prevailing heats.

The success of the enemy gave no small uneasiness to the English court; and duke Schomberg finding his advice disregarded by the Portuguese, and foreseeing very little honour or success from the service in which he was engaged, desired leave to resign his commission, which was granted, and the earl of Galway was sent over to succeed him, with a reinforcement of eight thousand Dutch, who arrived at Lisbon in the beginning of August. About a month after, the earl having reviewed the Portuguese and auxiliary forces, marched them over the river Coa, and encamped near Almeyda. Thither king Charles and his Portuguese majesty repaired on the twentieth of September, with a design to penetrate into Castile; but they found the river Agueda so strongly defended by the enemy, that the passage was not to be effected: they therefore returned back into Portugal, and in the beginning of October sent the army into winter-quarters. The Spaniards on their side were now so weakened by sending off detachments to the succour of Gibraltar, invested by the allies this summer, that they were not in a capacity to undertake any thing of importance during the remaining part of the campaign *.

In Poland the war was still carried on between young Charles of Sweden and Augustus, with unremitting fury and animosity. Charles, whose army lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Dantzick, had found means to engage cardinal Radzoufski, archbishop of Gnesna, and primate of Poland, in his interest. By the intrigues of this prelate a diet was assembled at Warsaw, which solemnly deposed Augustus, and declared the throne vacant. The intention of Charles and the primate was to have set the crown on the head of young Sobieski, son of their late monarch. This prince was then at Breslau in Silesia, waiting with impatience for this event. While he was one day hunting, a few leagues from the place of his residence, in company with prince Constantine, one of his brothers, thirty Saxon horsemen, sent privately by king Augustus, issued suddenly from a neighbouring wood, surrounded the two princes, and carried them off without resistance to Dresden, where they were committed to close custody. By this stroke Augustus disconcerted the measures of Charles, the cardinal, and the assembly of Warsaw. Fortune, who delights alike to sport with crowned heads as with the humblest of her subjects, exposed Augustus almost at the same time to the danger of being taken himself. He was at table three leagues from Cracow (the capital of Poland) relying upon an advanced guard which was posted at some distance, when all on a sudden Renschild, one of Charles's generals, appeared with a strong party, after having surprized the guard. The king of Poland had but just time to get on horseback, with eight or ten of his officers. General Renschild, who pursued him for four days, was upon the point of seizing him every moment; and it was only by good fortune that he escaped †.

Our operations at sea during the course of this year next demand our attention; and we shall see, that the English arms in that element fell very little short of the success with which they had been crowned by land. Sir George Rooke, after having landed king Charles at Lisbon, cruized for some time with the confederate fleet on the coast of Portugal, and then returned into the Tagus, where he was pressed by king Charles to execute a design upon Barcelona, projected by the prince of Hesse d'Armitadt, who declared his opinion that the Catalonians would declare for the house of Austria, as soon as they should be assured of proper protection and support. The admiral accordingly took the prince on board, with whom he sailed on the twentieth of August to Barcelona. In the mean time, the English ministry received advice that the French were very busy in fitting out a great squadron at Brest, which alarmed us much; and it was resolved to equip, with the utmost expedition, a good fleet, which was put under the command of sir Cloudesley Shovel, admiral of the white, who had under him sir Stafford Fairborne, vice-admiral of the red, and George Byng, esq. then rear-admiral of the same squadron. Sir Cloudesley was directed, if he found the Brest squadron already sailed, to call a council of war, in order to judge what strength might be necessary to send to sir George Rooke; and if it amounted to twenty-two ships, then he was to sail with them himself, that our fleet might at all events be superior to that of the enemy. Sir Cloudesley executed his instructions punctually; and finding that a great strength was necessary in the Mediterranean to oppose the French, he sailed thither about the latter end of May ‡.

On the eighteenth of that month sir George Rooke appeared before the city of Barcelona, when a priest, and some others of the inhabitants, came on board, and informed the prince of Hesse and the admiral, that if some few forces were landed, and a few bombs thrown into the town, the Catalonians would declare for Charles III. and open their gates to him. Upon this some Dutch ketches were ordered close in shore, who during the whole night threw shells into the place, and the next morning early the prince of Hesse landed his troops, to the number of about two thousand men, who remained ashore all that day and the ensuing night; but the prince finding no disposition in the inhabitants to stir in his favour, notwithstanding the bombs had done considerable execution on the town, his highness thought proper to reembark the men, from an apprehension of their being attacked by a superior force. On the twenty-first of May the fleet left Barcelona, and steered for the isles of Hieres. In their passage they descried a large French Squadron, which was sailing towards Toulon, and was no other than that which had been dispatched from Brest. Sir George Rooke immediately gave chase; but their ships being cleaner than ours, outailed us, and got safe into Toulon; upon which the admiral proceeded for Lisbon, in order to wait for a reinforcement. On the fourteenth of June our fleet sailed through the Straights mouth, and two days after was joined by sir Cloudesley Shovel with his Squadron off Lagos. A council of war was then called, in order to consider what service should be proceeded on, when it was resolved to steer up the Mediterranean in quest of the French fleet. After cruising for near a month, without seeing any thing of them, on the seventeenth of July the admiral called a council of war in the road of Tetuan*, wherein it was resolved to make a sudden attempt upon Gibraltar†, which was known to be but slenderly provided with a garrison.

Aranjuez, Toledo, and Alcantara; and then crossing Portugal with the same course, forms the harbour of Lisbon, where it is about three miles wide, and falls into the Atlantic Ocean at Cascaes, eight or ten miles below that city.

Thither the fleet accordingly bent its course, and on the twenty-first got into that bay. At three o'clock in the afternoon the mariners, English and Dutch, to the number of one thousand eight hundred, with the prince of Hesse at the head of them, were put on shore on the neck of land to the northward of the town, to cut off all communication with the country. Having taken post there, his highness sent a summons to the governor to surrender the place; who answered, that he would defend it to the last extremity. Next day the admiral gave the signal for cannonading the town, which was performed with such vigour, that fifteen thousand shot were expended in five hours. In the mean time, to amuse the enemy, captain Whitaker was sent in with some boats, who burnt a French privateer of twelve guns in the old mole-head. By this time the admiral perceiving that the enemy were driven from their fortifications at the south mole-head by the fire from our ships; and considering that if we could possess ourselves of these works, the town must be taken of course; he ordered all the boats of the fleet to be manned and armed, and gave the command of them to captain Whitaker, with orders to attempt to make himself master of these works: but while Whitaker was preparing to execute these orders, captain Hicks of the Yarmouth, and captain Jumper, who lay next the mole, pushed on shore in their pinnaces, and some other boats; whereupon the Spaniards immediately sprung a mine, which blew up all the fortifications upon the mole, killed two lieutenants, with about forty men, and wounded about sixty. Nevertheless the seamen kept possession of the great platform till captain Whitaker landed with the rest of the boats, who, with the seamen under his command, quickly made himself master of a redoubt between the mole and the town, and turned the cannon he found therein against the enemy. The admiral then sent a letter to the governor, and at the same time a messenger to the prince of Hesse, desiring that general to send a peremptory summons, which his highness accordingly did; in consequence of which, on the twenty-fourth in the morning, the governor capitulated, and the prince of Hesse took possession of the place. Upon this occasion it is but doing justice to our brave seamen to observe, that as this design was entirely contrived by the admiral, so it was executed entirely by the sailors, and therefore the whole honour is due to them. After having left as many men with the prince of Hesse as could be spared for the defence of this conquest, the fleet sailed to Tetuan, in order to take in wood and water.

This account of the taking of Gibraltar is inserted from that published by the government. Bishop Burnet in his History has indeed given a different turn to the affair, in which, with a partiality inexcusable in any writer, and still more in a divine, and that divine giving in his history upon oath, he has endeavoured to make our enterprize, undertaken on the most mature advice, and conducted with the greatest skill and bravery, together with the success that attended it, to be the effect of pure chance. Rooke, says he, fell in upon Gibraltar; from which no one would imagine that a council of war had actually been called on board the admiral's own ship at Tetuan harbour, and a resolution taken there by the general officers of both nations to attack the place, as the fact really was. In short, according to this right reverend historian, every thing succeeded by accident. The reader however is to be informed, that Rooke was a Tory, and the bishop had taken an utter aversion to all of that party‡. But to return:

* Tetuan is a walled town of Habat, in the empire of Morocco in Africa, situated on the Cus, just within the Straights of Gibraltar, and about three miles from the sea.

† Gibraltar is a celebrated town and fortress of Andalusia in Spain, by the Moors called Gebel Tarif, i. e. Mount Tarif, a Moorish general who, in the eighth century, landed here with three African princes, whence its present name seems to be compounded. It lies on the strait between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean, to which it gives its name. The town, which is neither large nor beautiful, stands at the foot of Mount Calpe, one of Hercules's pillars, and about sixteen miles north of Ceuta, the other, in Africa. On account of its fortifications, it is looked upon as the key of Spain, and is furnished with all the necessary artillery for its defence. It is built on a rock in a peninsula, and accessible only on the land side, by a narrow passage between the rock and the sea, across which the Spaniards have drawn a fortified line, in order to prevent the garrison of Gibraltar from having any intercourse with the country; yet they carry on a clandestine trade. The harbour is formed by a bulwark properly fortified. The strait of Gibraltar is twenty-four miles in length, and fifteen in breadth, and through it sets a strong current from the Atlantic and the Mediterranean; for stemming of which a brisk gale is required. The garrison is confined within very narrow limits, the ground of which hardly produces any thing; so that they have all their provisions from England and Ceuta, on the Barbary coast. The road is not safe either against enemies or storms. Since several notorious oppressions have been committed by the governors of Gibraltar, this town has been erected into a body corporate, and the civil power lodged in its magistrates. It lies forty miles south-west of Cadiz, and eighty south of Seville. Busching.

‡ His lordship in his account is pleased to introduce the following circumstance; That after the admiral had bombarded the town to very little purpose, and with little hopes of success, some bold men ventured to go ashore in a place where it was not thought possible to climb up the rocks; and yet they succeeded in it; and when they had got up, they saw that all the women of the town were come out according to their superstition, to a chapel, there to implore the Virgin's protection. They seized on them, and that contributed not a little to dispose those in the town to surrender.

The fleet being supplied with provisions, sailed again into the Mediterranean, and on the eleventh of August got sight of the French fleet, which sir George pursued with all the sail he could make. On the thirteenth, which was Sunday, he came within three leagues of them, to the westward of Cape Malaga, where they brought to, formed their line, and lay ready to receive him. Their line consisted of fifty-two ships, and twenty-four galleys: they were very strong in the center, and weaker in the van and rear: to supply which, most of the galleys were divided into those quarters. In the center was the count de Thoulouse, with the white squadron; in the van, the white and blue; and in the rear, the blue: each admiral had his vice and rear-admiral. Our line consisted of fifty-three ships, the admiral sir George Rooke, with the rear-admirals Byng and Dilkes, being in the centre. Sir Cloudesley Shovel and sir John Leake led the van, and the Dutch formed the rear.

The action began about ten in the morning, when the van and rear, commanded by Shovel and the Dutch admiral Callembergh, immediately pressed forward to a close engagement, and soon compelled that part of the French line with which they were engaged to give way; but the center of the French bore extremely hard upon Rooke's division: the fight however was maintained with great obstinacy till night, when the French bore away to leeward, their disabled ships being taken in tow by the galleys. The wind shifting in the night, the enemy got the weather-gage; but their fleet and ours lay by all day within three leagues of each other, repairing their defects, and at night they again made sail to the northward. Sir George Rooke endeavoured the two next days to renew the fight, but the French as earnestly evaded it, and at last made all the sail they could, and fairly ran for it. This plainly shews that the victory was ours, notwithstanding that the French, according to their old custom, claimed the honour of the day; and Lewis XIV. wrote a letter to the archbishop of Paris affirming this, and directing Te Deum to be sung on the occasion: and however Burnet and other writers, to answer purposes, have affected to treat this action as of very little consequence, and not to be mentioned with the other successes gained by the duke of Marlborough; yet if we consider the great disadvantages under which the admiral engaged the French fleet, and that they were so beaten, that their grand fleet durst not venture a battle in that element during the remainder of the war, it certainly may be said; without exaggeration, that the battle of Malaga decided the empire of the sea, and left to us and the Dutch the indisputable claim to the title of MARITIME POWERS *. The loss sustained by each side in this action may be found at the bottom of the page †.

After the battle sir George Rooke sailed to Gibraltar to refit; and leaving a squadron of eighteen ships under sir John Leake, set sail for England, where he arrived in the month of September, when her majesty, to shew the true sense she had of the service performed by the fleet under his command this summer, thought proper that his royal highness prince George, lord high-admiral, should introduce to her majesty such of the officers who had most distinguished themselves, when she was pleased to confer the honour of knighthood on George Byng and Thomas Dilkes, esqrs. rear-admirals, and captain John Jennings, commander of the St. George, a second-rate.

As soon as the news of the loss of Gibraltar reached the court of Spain, Philip, the reigning king, sent the marquis of Villadarias with an army to release it. He invested the place on the twenty-fourth of October. The siege lasted four months; during which the prince of Hesse displayed many shining proofs of courage, conduct, and capacity, in its defence. The garrison was supplied with men and provisions from the squadron under sir John Leake; but that admiral being obliged to sail to Lisbon for fresh succours, monsieur de Pointis, the French admiral, came out of Cadiz with thirteen men of war, and blocked up Gibraltar on the side next the sea, whereby the town was reduced to the last extremity until sir John, returning thither again, surprised de Pointis with his squadron in the bay, of whom he took three, and ran two of the largest ships on shore, which the enemy quitted after having set fire to them; and the besiegers, after having lost the best part of their army by sickness and the sword, thought fit to raise the siege on the tenth of March, leaving only a detachment of their forces at some distance to block up the place ‡.

* Campbell's Lives of Admirals, who thus enumerates the advantages the French fleet had over ours: first, Their ships were bigger; they had seventeen three-deck ships, and we had but seven. Secondly, they had a great advantage in their weight of metal, for they had six hundred guns more than we. Thirdly, they were clean ships; just come out of port, whereas ours had been long at sea, and had done hard service. Fourthly, they had the assistance of their galleys; and how great an advantage this was will appear from hence, that about the middle of the fight the French admiral ordered a seventy gun ship to board the Monk, a sixty gun ship of ours, commanded by captain Mighells, which she did, and was beat off three times; and after every repulse, she had her wounded men taken off, and her complement restored by the galleys. Fifthly, the French fleet was thoroughly provided with ammunition, which was so much wanted in ours, that several ships were towed out of the line, because they had not powder nor ball sufficient for a single broad-side. Campbell. Burchet.

† Of the English were killed and wounded two thousand three hundred and fifty-eight, and of the Dutch four hundred. Sir Andrew Leake, captain of the Grafton; captain Coe of the Ranelagh; lieutenant Jennings of the St. George; the third lieutenant of the Shrewsbury, and the first lieutenant of the Lenox, were all the officers of their rank that were killed. Captain Myngs, captain Baker, captain Kirton, captain Jumper, captain Myghels, lieutenant Edisburg, and lieutenant Lestock, were wounded; as were two lieutenants of the Barfleur, and the chaplain; seven or eight lieutenants more, three masters, and about as many boatswains and carpenters.

On the French side were killed the Bailey of Lorraine, commodore of a squadron, and the count de Thoulouse's second; five captains, of which three were knights; a commissary of marines, six lieutenants, and five sea-ensigns. Among the latter, the marshal de Chateaurenault's son, and the sieur de Bollem Villers, the count de Thoulouse's gentleman: the count himself was wounded in the forehead, shoulder, and thigh: the count de Relingues had his leg shot off: the marquis de Herhault, intendant of the fleet; monsieur du Casse, commodore of a squadron; monsieur de Chateaurenault, the count de Phelipaux, the count de Cominges, monsieur de Valincourt, the count de Thoulouse's secretary, seven captains, eight lieutenants, and about one hundred and fifty other officers, were wounded.

After this view of foreign transactions, it is time to return to domestic occurrences.

On the twenty-fourth of October the parliament met, and the session was opened with a speech from the throne, in which her majesty observed, that the great and remarkable success with which God had blessed her arms, produced unanimous joy and satisfaction through all parts of the kingdom; and that a timely improvement of the present advantages would enable her to procure a lasting foundation of security for England, as well as a firm support for the liberty of Europe: she declared, that her intention was to be kind and indulgent to all her subjects; she expressed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loss of this opportunity, and that there would be no contention among them, but who should do most for the public welfare: "Such a temper as this (added she) in all your proceedings, cannot fail of securing your reputation both at home and abroad: this would make me an happy queen, whose endeavours shall never be wanting to make you a happy and flourishing people."

The next day the lords attended her majesty with an address of thanks for her speech, in which they congratulated her on the great and glorious success of her arms, under the command of the duke of Marlborough, without taking any notice of sir George Rooke.

The commons, in their address presented the same day, congratulated her majesty "as well upon the victory obtained by sir George Rooke, as upon that obtained by the duke of Marlborough." The different spirit of the two houses may be gathered from the different wording of their addresses. They also assured her, they came disposed to do every thing that was necessary for the effectual prosecution of the war, and that they would give such a speedy dispatch to the public business as might enable her majesty to pursue the advantages she had obtained over the common enemy; that they would use their utmost endeavours, by all proper measures, to prevent all divisions among themselves, and dispute only who should most contribute to the welfare of the nation, both in church and state †.

The commons taking into consideration the services of the army and navy, by an unanimous vote, on the second of November, desired the queen, in an address, "to bestow her bounty upon the seamen and land-forces who had behaved themselves so gallantly:" upon which her majesty gave directions accordingly, for distributing a bounty amongst them. After this they deliberated upon the different articles of national expence, and shewed such zeal and application in supporting the war by necessary supplies, that before the end of November the supplies requisite for maintaining both the army and navy were voted; and on the ninth of December the bill for the same received the royal assent, when the queen, in a short speech, thanked the commons for their dispatch, which, she said, she considered as a sure pledge of their affection ‡.

The high-church party, who had still the passing the occasional-conformity bill greatly at heart, now caused it to be revived and brought into the house of commons, on a new model, by Mr. William Bromley, who made a long speech in support of it, wherein he urged, that the practice of occasional conformity was such a scandalous hypocrisy, as was not to be excused by any pretence; that the employing persons of a different religion from that established by law, had never been practised by any wise government, and was not allowed even in Holland, the country of universal toleration; and observed, that this law, so necessary, having been twice refused in the house of lords, the only way to have it pass, was to tack it to the money-bill, and therefore he made a motion in form for so doing, which occasioned a warm debate; however, upon better consideration, the commons sent it up singly, on the fourteenth of November, when it would hardly have excited a debate, had not the queen been present, and desirous of hearing what could be said on both sides of the question. For the information and satisfaction of her majesty, the subject was again discussed, and all the arguments for and against being repeated, the bill was rejected by a majority of 21 voices, the majority increasing nine this year beyond the last: this was thought to have been owing to the too indiscreet behaviour and speeches of the nonjurors and Roman catholics while the bill was depending in the lower house.

By this time the lords were engaged in an affair which made no less noise than the conformity bill, I mean the debates on the late conduct in the Scot-

† Proceedings of the House of Commons, iii. 392.

‡ The sums granted for the above purposes were as follow: For maintaining forty thousand seamen, including eight thousand marines, four pounds per man a month, for thirteen months, amounting to two hundred and eighty thousand pounds. For the ordinary of the navy one hundred thousand pounds, and forty thousand pounds for ordnance stores for the sea-service, over and above the proportion of four pounds a man. For making a wharf and store-house at Portsmouth, ten thousand pounds. For forty thousand landmen to act in conjunction with the allies, eight hundred eighty-five thousand one hundred and ninety-three pounds. For ten thousand additional forces for the same service, one hundred seventy-seven thousand five hundred and eleven pounds. For maintaining ten thousand men to act in conjunction with the Portuguese, two hundred twenty-two thousand three hundred and seventy-nine pounds. For her majesty's proportion of subsidies to her allies, three hundred and seventy thousand one hundred and nineteen pounds. For her majesty's subsidy to the duke of Savoy, from October 3, to December 25, 1703, forty thousand pounds. For levy-money for recruiting the horses of the English horse and dragoons lost at Schellenberg and Blenheim, six thousand seven hundred and twenty-five pounds. For recruiting the men and horses of the foreigners in her majesty's pay in the same battles, twenty-four thousand six hundred sixty-five pounds. For an additional regiment on the Portuguese establishment, five thousand one hundred and thirty-six pounds. For surgeons in the hospital in Portugal for the year 1704, two hundred and forty-four pounds. For expences in the Portugal war last year not provided for by parliament, sixty eight thousand five hundred and forty-six pounds. For guards and garrisons in England, three hundred and fifty-seven thousand pounds. For the ordnance of the land-service, one hundred and twenty thousand pounds. For transports, sixty thousand pounds. For circulating Exchequer-bills, four thousand pounds. And for five thousand additional forces to be raised in conjunction with our allies to serve with the fleet, for their levy-money, eleven thousand two hundred and forty-four pounds: for their pay for one year, eighty-seven thousand one hundred and twenty-five pounds. In all, four millions six hundred and seventy thousand four hundred and eighty-six pounds. Towards the raising whereof was granted a land-tax of four shillings in the pound, which produced about two millions; the duty upon malt, which might raise about eight hundred thousand pounds, and three thousand seven hundred pounds a week out of the Excise; eight hundred seventy-seven thousand nine hundred and thirty pounds by sale of annuities for ninety-nine years, at fifteen years purchase; a subsidy on wines and merchandizes for four years, as a fund for raising six hundred forty-six thousand nine hundred and fifty-seven pounds for the use of the navy; and the duty on low wines continued.

tish parliament. The lord Haversham having acquainted the peers, that he had matters of great importance to lay before them, but that he desired it should be in a full house; all the lords in town and in the neighbourhood thereof, were summoned to attend three days after, when his lordship made a set speech, wherein having congratulated the lords on the duke of Marlborough's victories, and upon sir George Rooke's deliverance as he called it, he took notice of a squadron of Dutch ships being called away, just before the battle of Malaga ||, to be a convoy to their merchants, while neither the English trade or coast were protected, but the enemy insulted us even in the Channel, while we vainly boasted of being mistress of the seas. He also mentioned as a grievance, the exportation of our corn; but the chief purport of his speech was to fix an odium upon the ministry for suffering the act of security to pass in Scotland.

He observed on this subject, "that the settlement of the succession of Scotland had been postponed, partly because the ministry for that kingdom were weak and divided, partly from a received opinion, that the succession was never seriously and cordially intended by those who managed the affairs of Scotland in the cabinet-council: he expatiated on the bad consequences that might attend the act of security, which he styled a Bill of Exclusion; for, said he, can any reasonable man believe, that those who promoted that bill, could ever be really friends to the succession as settled by the English parliament? He particularly mentioned that clause by which the heritors and burghs were ordered to exercise their fencible men every month: he said, the nobility and gentry of Scotland were as learned and brave as any nation in Europe, and that these were generally discontented; the common people, he said, were very numerous, very stout, and very poor; and asked, who was the man that could tell what such a multitude, so armed and so disciplined, might do under such leaders, should they find opportunities suitable to their intention? Besides, added this noble peer, I look upon it as of the last consequence to England, that there should not be the least shadow or pretence of a necessity to keep up a regular standing army in this kingdom, in time of peace. He then recommended these circumstances to the consideration of the house, and concluded with these words of lord Bacon, "Let men beware how they neglect or suffer matter of trouble to be prepared, for no man can forbid the sparks that may set all on fire §."

These matters were afterwards debated with some warmth in both houses, and a majority in each seemed to fall in with lord Haversham's sentiments. The queen began this winter to come to the house of peers upon any important debates, as well for the sake of her own instruction as to restrain the too great heat of the different parties by her presence. The earl of Nottingham, in a speech he made upon this subject, cast such severe reflections on the memory of king William, that he would have been sent to the Tower, had not the lords declined such a step out of respect to her majesty. After much declamation, in which the ministry were very severely handled, and as warmly defended, the lords came to the following resolutions: "That, to prevent the inconveniences that might happen by the late act passed in Scotland, the queen might be enabled, on the part of England, to name commissioners to treat about an entire union with Scotland, provided that those powers be not put in execution till commissioners should be first named on the part of Scotland, by the parliament there*: that no Scotsman should enjoy the privileges of an Englishman, except such as were settled in England, Ireland, and the Plantations, and such as were or might be in the sea or land service, until an union could be effected, or the succession settled as in England †: that the traffic of cattle from Scotland to England should be stopped ‡: that orders should be issued for seizing such vessels as should be found trading from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her majesty's enemies; and that cruisers be appointed for that end ||; and that the exportation of English wool into Scotland be prohibited §." On these resolutions a bill was formed for an entire union, and passed the upper house on the twentieth of December. In the mean time the lords presented an address to the queen, requesting that her majesty would be pleased to give orders for the fortifying Newcastle, Tinmouth, Berwick, Carlisle, and Hull; that the militia of the four northern counties might be disciplined and provided with arms; that a competent number of regular troops might be kept in the northern borders of England, and in the north of Ireland; and that the laws for disarming the papists might be put in execution. The queen, in her answer, promised that a survey should be made of the places mentioned, and laid before the parliament, and that she would give the necessary directions upon other articles of the address ¶.

Complaints being daily made of the mismanagement both at the board of the prince of Denmark's council, as lord high-admiral, and at sea, their lordships proceeded to take the same under their consideration; and, having made the proper enquiries, presented an address to her majesty, setting forth, that less money had been paid to the service of the navy than had been provided for that purpose, whereby the navy-debt was increased a million of money and upwards, since the year 1702; that more than fifteen hundred men were wanting of the last year's complement of seamen provided for by parliament; that too large salaries were given to the prince's council and other officers. Hereupon his highness's council laid before her majesty an answer to all these objections, shewing particularly that the funds given for the navy had fallen short near one million two hundred thousand pounds, which was the cause of the increase of that debt. Here I cannot forbear making an observation on the public spirit of parliaments in this queen's reign: if they gave in one session, they enquired in the next; and it is impossible to mention any remarkable expedition within the first six years, which was not examined and cleared up by such enquiries; by this means the people saw and knew what they were doing, which encouraged them to pay chearfully, at the same time that it put them upon endeavouring to acquire by industry, what might maintain them happily, notwithstanding these large but necessary expences. To proceed.

The commons having, in a grand committee, considered the state of the nation with regard to Scotland, resolved, on the eleventh of January, "that a bill be brought in, to enable her majesty to appoint commissioners to treat of an union with Scotland; that the natives of Scotland, not already settled, and continually residing in the dominions of England, shall be reputed aliens, unless Scotland shall come into the protestant succession in the house of Hanover; that more effectual provision be made for preventing the exportation of wool into Scotland †; that a stop be put to the importation of Scotch linen; that immediate provision be made to prevent the conveying horses, arms, and ammunition, from England and Ireland into Scotland:" pursuant to which resolutions a bill was brought in, and passed both houses in a few days.

The duke of Marlborough being now returned home, he had the thanks both of the lords and commons for his great services; and the lower house presented an address to the queen, intreating her to consider of some proper means to perpetuate the memory of such noble actions. In a few days, viz. on the seventeenth of January, 1705, the queen returned an answer by the chancellor of the Exchequer, in which she acquainted the house, that she was inclined to grant the interest of the crown in the honour and manor of Woodstock and hundred of Wooton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and that as the lieutenancy and rangerhip of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds, were already granted for two lives, she judged it proper to remove that incumbrance, and desired the assistance of the house therein. In consequence of this intimation a bill was prepared, enabling her majesty to bestow these honours and manors on the duke and his heirs, and desiring her to advance the money to clear the incumbrances. The queen not only complied with this address, but also ordered the comptroller of the board of works to build, in Woodstock park, a magnificent palace for the duke, to be distinguished by the name of Blenheim House, where the famous battle, from whence it takes its name, is represented in most curious paintings and tapestry: the structure, which was the design of sir John Vanbrugh, is thought, by most judges of architecture, to have more of grandeur and solidity, than of propriety and elegance.

Such were the honours and rewards heaped upon the duke of Marlborough, all which the world were satisfied he had justly merited; but his grace's glory and influence were now arrived to such a pitch, that the bare mentioning the merit of another was held a sufficient reason to lay that man aside. The university of Oxford had sent an address to her majesty, congratulating the success of her arms in Germany, under the admirable conduct and invincible courage of the duke of Marlborough; and at sea under the most brave and faithful admiral sir George Rooke. The latter part of this address gave umbrage to the queen, as it seemed to raise the admiral upon a level with the general, whose great victories had captivated her admiration, and whose wife had alienated her affection from the Tories; her majesty therefore returned a cool answer to the address, and soon after sir George Rooke, without the least demerit on his side, was dismissed from his command, and permitted to retire to his seat in Kent, without any reward for a long series of eminent services. The command of the fleet was bestowed on sir Cloudesley Shovel, declared rear-admiral of England; sir John Leake was appointed vice-admiral of the white; sir George Byng, vice-admiral of the blue; sir Thomas Dilkes, rear-admiral of the red; William Whetstone, esq. rear-admiral of the white; and sir John Jennings was made an admiral in the room of sir James Wishart, rear-admiral of the blue, who laid down his commission at that time.

The duke of Marlborough having brought over with him marshal Tallard, with the other French generals and officers taken at Hochstet ‡, they were immediately conveyed to Nottingham and Litchfield, where they were attended by a detachment of the royal regiment of horse-guards, were treated with great respect, and allowed the privilege of riding ten miles round the places of their confinement.

On the eighth of February the house of commons took into consideration the treaty which the duke of Marlborough had concluded with the king of Prussia, for taking eight thousand of his troops into English pay to serve in Savoy; and unanimously resolved, that an humble address be presented to her majesty, returning the thanks of the house to her majesty for concluding the said treaty, which was so seasonable a support to the duke of Savoy, and so great an advantage to the common cause; and also to assure her majesty, that they would effectually enable her to make good the said treaty. They also farther addressed her to continue her endeavours for an accommodation between the emperor and his subjects, now in arms in Hungary, in order for the better and more effectual carrying on the present and most necessary war: they likewise took notice, how very deficient the allies were in furnishing their respective quotas towards the

In a few days, viz. on the seventeenth of January, 1705, the queen returned an answer by the chancellor of the Exchequer, in which she acquainted the house, that she was inclined to grant the interest of the crown in the honour and manor of Woodstock and hundred of Wooton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and that as the lieutenancy and rangerhip of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds, were already granted for two lives, she judged it proper to remove that incumbrance, and desired the assistance of the house therein. In consequence of this intimation a bill was prepared, enabling her majesty to bestow these honours and manors on the duke and his heirs, and desiring her to advance the money to clear the incumbrances. The queen not only complied with this address, but also ordered the comptroller of the board of works to build, in Woodstock park, a magnificent palace for the duke, to be distinguished by the name of Blenheim House, where the famous battle, from whence it takes its name, is represented in most curious paintings and tapestry: the structure, which was the design of sir John Vanbrugh, is thought, by most judges of architecture, to have more of grandeur and solidity, than of propriety and elegance.

Such were the honours and rewards heaped upon the duke of Marlborough, all which the world were satisfied he had justly merited; but his grace's glory and influence were now arrived to such a pitch, that the bare mentioning the merit of another was held a sufficient reason to lay that man aside. The university of Oxford had sent an address to her majesty, congratulating the success of her arms in Germany, under the admirable conduct and invincible courage of the duke of Marlborough; and at sea under the most brave and faithful admiral sir George Rooke. The latter part of this address gave umbrage to the queen, as it seemed to raise the admiral upon a level with the general, whose great victories had captivated her admiration, and whose wife had alienated her affection from the Tories; her majesty therefore returned a cool answer to the address, and soon after sir George Rooke, without the least demerit on his side, was dismissed from his command, and permitted to retire to his seat in Kent, without any reward for a long series of eminent services. The command of the fleet was bestowed on sir Cloudesley Shovel, declared rear-admiral of England; sir John Leake was appointed vice-admiral of the white; sir George Byng, vice-admiral of the blue; sir Thomas Dilkes, rear-admiral of the red; William Whetstone, esq. rear-admiral of the white; and sir John Jennings was made an admiral in the room of sir James Wishart, rear-admiral of the blue, who laid down his commission at that time.

The duke of Marlborough having brought over with him marshal Tallard, with the other French generals and officers taken at Hochstet‡, they were immediately conveyed to Nottingham and Litchfield, where they were attended by a detachment of the royal regiment of horse-guards, were treated with great respect, and allowed the privilege of riding ten miles round the places of their confinement.

On the eighth of February the house of commons took into consideration the treaty which the duke of Marlborough had concluded with the king of Prussia, for taking eight thousand of his troops into English pay to serve in Savoy; and unanimously resolved, that an humble address be presented to her majesty, returning the thanks of the house to her majesty for concluding the said treaty, which was so seasonable a support to the duke of Savoy, and so great an advantage to the common cause; and also to assure her majesty, that they would effectually enable her to make good the said treaty. They also farther addressed her to continue her endeavours for an accommodation between the emperor and his subjects, now in arms in Hungary, in order for the better and more effectual carrying on the present and most necessary war: they likewise took notice, how very deficient the allies were in furnishing their respective quotas towards the

† The Scottish parliament had passed an act for exporting their wool the last session, only to spoil the woollen manufacture, which our ministry had weakly or treacherously suffered to receive the royal assent, as well as the act of security.

‡ There were, besides the marshal, the marquis de Montpeux, general of the horse; the count de Blanzac, lieutenant-general; the marquis de Hauteville, general of dragoons; the marquis de Vallesame, the marquis de Sapperville, the marquis de Silly, the chevalier de Croissy, the marquis de la Valiere, major-generals; monsieur de St. Second, brigadier; war, as well by sea as land; and besought her majesty to use her interest with them, that they might next year furnish their complete proportion, according to their respective treaties: to all which the queen returned complying answers.

the marquis de Vasse, colonel of dragoons; the marquis de Marivaux, lieutenant-general; monsieur de la Messiliere, monsieur Jolly, monsieur d'Amigny, brigadiers; monsieur de St. Maurice, the count de Lionne, the marquis de Lasley, the baron d'Elst, monsieur de Balincourt, monsieur de Saalveboeuf, monsieur de Montenay, monsieur de Gallort, monsieur de Cressey, colonels of foot; monsieur de Ligondais, the baron de Heyder, colonels of horse; monsieur de Prisc, and monsieur d'Aurival, colonels of dragoons.

The remaining part of this session was consumed in disputes and altercations between the two houses on the Aylesbury affair, which was now brought on the carpet again. John Petty, John Ovrat, John Paton, Henry Bais, and Daniel Horn, inhabitants of that borough, encouraged by the countenance the house of peers had given Ashby to sue White, and the rest of the constables of Aylesbury, for refusing his vote, ventured also to lay their several actions against the said constables on the latter account; whereupon the five complainants were committed to Newgate, by order of the house of commons, for prosecuting their action at common law contrary to the declaration of that house formerly made. The prisoners moved for an habeas corpus in the court of Queen's bench, but that court refused to take cognizance of the affair. Two of them now endeavoured to bring their writs of error returnable in parliament, which occasioned great heats between the two houses, and several representations to her majesty; the lords addressing that the writs of error in that court might be granted, and the commons insisting they might not. The principal matter in dispute was the same as in Ashby's case, viz. Whether an elector's vote being refused by the proper officer empowered to take the poll, he might not bring an action at law against such offender? or, Whether such elector's right to vote could be determined any where but in the house of commons? I shall not detain the reader by a repetition of the arguments used by each side in support of their different opinions, as I have already touched upon this matter in my account of the transactions of last session; but shall content myself with observing, that the lords first had a conference, and then a free conference with the commons, about the principal points in this affair; but neither side being willing to recede in any part from the principles they had adopted, and the disputes beginning to threaten serious consequences, the queen thought it most adviseable to put a stop to the contention between the two houses, by immediately closing the session. Accordingly, repairing to the house of peers on the fourteenth of March, the deputy usher of the black rod was sent to summon the commons to attend her majesty in the upper house, where she passed the bills that were ready for the royal assent; and then having in a short speech thanked the parliament for the zeal and dispatch with which they had provided for the exigences of government, and warned them to avoid the fatal effects of animosity and dissension, she commanded the lord keeper to prorogue the parliament to Thursday the first of May; but on the fifth of April it was dissolved by proclamation, and another was published for calling a new parliament, this being upon the point of expiring according to the triennial act.

Besides the acts already mentioned, the following bills received the royal assent this session:

I. An act to prevent the exportation of Irish linen to the plantations, and to prohibit the importation of Scotch linen into Ireland. By the statute of the fifteenth of Charles II. "For the encouragement of trade, stiled by way of eminence, The Act of Navigation, it was enacted, That no merchandize of any part of Europe shall be imported into any part of Asia, Africa, or America belonging to his majesty but what shall be laden from England, except as therein excepted." The act before us so far repeals the same, as to permit the exportation of Irish linen cloth to the English plantations in English built shipping, navigated according to law; "forasmuch, saith the preamble, as the protestant interest in Ireland ought to be supported by giving the utmost encouragement to the linen manufactures of that kingdom."* The linen manufacture of Ireland was then, and in a great measure since is principally carried on in the province of Ulster, and parts adjacent, where the Protestants are by far the majority of the people; but in most other parts of that kingdom it is well known to be otherwise.

II. An act for giving remedy on promissory notes, making them assignable by endorsement, in like sort as was enacted on inland bills of exchange, Anno 1698, ninth of king William. And whereas in the said act of the ninth of king William there is no provision made for protesting inland bills of exchange, in case the party on whom such bill, or bills, shall be drawn refuses to accept the same, it was now hereby enacted, "That inland bills of exchange shall be underwritten for acceptance, and protested for non-acceptance, as well as for non-payment, in like sort as foreign bills of exchange."† It is somewhat strange that two such salutary and important regulations as this law hath made in promissory notes, and inland bills of exchange, were not sooner enacted in a country of such considerable mercantile transactions as England has long been famed for. But to say the truth, which many have remarked, our national slowness in reforming abuses and defects, seems but too well grounded. This law was made perpetual by the seventh of queen Anne, cap. xxv.

III. An act "for encouraging the importation of naval stores from her majesty's plantations in America." The necessity which all maritime trading nations, and especially England, lie under of being supplied with naval stores, has often put it in the power of the northern crowns to distress such nations who had none of their own. This evidently appeared in the year 1703 from the tar company of Sweden, who absolutely refused to let us have any pitch or tar, (although ready money was always paid for it) unless we would permit it all to be brought in Swedish shipping, and at their own price, and likewise only in such quantities as that company should think proper. This dis-appointment put the government and parliament on the method of allowing bounties for raising of pitch and tar, hemp and flax, and ship-timber in our own North American colonies, particularly in Carolina, and gave rise to this act, whereby it is enacted, "that whoever shall in ships, and with sailors qualified as by the Act of Navigation, import from the English plantations in America the under-mentioned naval stores, shall be entitled to the following bounties, viz. for tar and pitch per ton, of eight barrels, four pounds sterling; for rozin and turpentine per ton three pounds; for hemp per ton, of twenty hundred weight, six pounds; for all masts, yards, and bowsprits, per ton, of forty feet each ton, one pound. This act to be in force for nine years, from the first of January 1705, old style.*" The good consequence of which reasonable law was soon after felt, and still continues to be every day more manifest, for the said colonies do at this time import into England great quantities of merchantable pitch and tar fit for most uses in the navy, and which may in time be probably brought to serve for all uses, so as to render us absolutely independent on Sweden for such two most necessary articles. Of late also good hemp and flax are raised in these colonies, where there are immense tracts of proper and excellent lands for raising those commodities, of which, according to Mr. Gee (in his ingenious book of the Trade and Navigation of Great Britain considered) Russia did, so late as the year 1729, export annually to Britain and other nations to the value of one million sterling.

IV. An act to prohibit all trade and commerce with France. It is somewhat remarkable that, notwithstanding the several addresses and representations of the lords and commons to the throne against the Dutch for trading with France during the war, that people had such interest with our ministry at this time (probably through the friendly offices of the duke of Marlborough), that they obtained an order of council, by which the ships of the States, that had proper passes, should not be molested by the commanders of her majesty's ships in their trade with France, and this at the very time that all trade and commerce with that country was strictly forbidden to our own subjects! It was indeed alleged in defence of this measure, that as we were then about to open a free trade with Spain, this would be an equivalent in our favour; but it will clearly appear that this was no more than a specious pretence for conniving at the Dutch, for we never proposed to trade to any place that was not under the dominion of king Charles, and he was not then possessed of a foot of land in Spain, except Gibraltar. Besides, when we had a trade in those ports that were afterwards in king Charles's possession, the Dutch had the same privilege of trading thither as ourselves; nor does there appear any reason why they should have been indulged in the French trade on account of our trading with Spain.

V. An act to prevent all correspondence with her majesty's enemies. By this act "whoever had passed into France after the fourth of May, in the first year of the queen, or had borne arms in the French service, and should return into the queen's dominions after the twenty-fifth of March 1705, without licence, was declared guilty of high-treason †."

I need not, I believe, apologize to my readers for the particular notice I have taken of the above acts, which, on account of their importance to the commercial interests of this kingdom, deserve some degree of attention. I shall now proceed in the track of my history.

The queen, upon the dissolution of the late parliament, wherein Toryism prevailed in the house of commons, made several promotions and changes in favour of the Whigs; this was brought about chiefly by the influence of the duchess of Marlborough and of the duke her husband, who had now mutually abandoned the Tory interest. The duke of Newcastle was made lord privy-seal, in the room of the duke of Buckingham; and Charles earl of Peterborough, and Hugh lord Cholmondeley, were sworn of the privy-council; the earl of Montague was made duke of that name; lord Cutts was appointed commander of her majesty's forces in Ireland, under the duke of Ormond; and the following promotion of general officers took place, viz. brigadier Frederick Hamilton, the lord Windsor, the lord Raby, and brigadier Ravensworth, were made major-generals; and the honourable colonel Mordaunt, colonel Brood, and colonel Stanhope, were made brigadier-generals.

The queen about this time went to Newmarket, where she was attended by the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, Dr. Ellis, and the heads of that university, who gave her majesty an invitation to Cambridge, which she was graciously pleased to accept, and was magnificently entertained on the sixteenth of June, at the charge of the university, in Trinity-college. On this occasion her majesty bestowed the honour of knighthood on Mr. James Montagu, council for the university, and the famous Mr. Isaac Newton, mathematical professor. In the mean time, the whole nation was in a ferment, on account of the elections for the new parliament, both parties exerting their utmost efforts to dispose the minds of the people in their favour. On the other hand, several counties and corporations thought fit to give instructions to their new representatives as to their behaviour in the ensuing parliament, which generally ran in the Whig strain, and were thought to have been procured by the ministry.

In the beginning of May this year count Gallas, envoy-extraordinary from the imperial court, received advice of the death of his master the emperor Leopold V. who died on the fifth of May, and was succeeded by Joseph, king of the Romans, his eldest son. The envoy had orders to assure her majesty, that the new emperor would not only observe all the treaties concluded with his predecessor, but would omit nothing that might render those alliances more firm. Some time after the earl of Sunderland was sent envoy-extraordinary from her majesty to the emperor Joseph, with compliments of condolence on the death of his father, and of congratulation on his imperial majesty's accession to the throne, with orders to signify at the same time her majesty's resolution to abide invariably by the league subsisting between the Imperial and British courts.

Before I proceed to relate the progress of the war in the year 1705, I shall take a short survey of the proceedings of the parliaments in Ireland and Scotland, beginning in order of time.

The Irish parliament met at Dublin on the fifth day of March, 1704 5, according to the ridiculous style then in use, when the heats which had for some time subsisted among the protestants there, and had been connived at by the ministry, were revived; and some of the high-church clergy, who had been preferred to benefices in that kingdom from England, were very busy in raising the same fury against the dissenters that had prevailed on this side the water. Soon after the opening of the session, a dispute arose between the commons and the lower house of convocation, occasioned by the latter offering a memorial against the passing a bill for the improvement of the hempen and flaxen manufactures of the kingdom, wherein was a clause to ascertain the tythes of hemp and flax. After some altercation, in which the convocation justified their memorial, the commons came to the following warm resolutions: That the convocation were guilty of a contempt and breach of privilege of the house; that all matters relating to the memorial should be razed out of the Journals and books of convocation; and that the person who presented the said memorial was guilty of a breach of privilege, and should be taken into custody. The commons proceeding still farther, came to some resolutions that reflected obliquely on the convocation, as enemies to her majesty's government and the protestant succession: whereupon the clergy in convocation passed some resolves, which contain a short, but strong, apology for their body against the insinuations of their adversaries. The substance of these resolutions was as follows, viz.

"That the church and nation had been happily delivered from popery and tyranny by his late majesty king William III. of blessed memory, by means of the Revolution.

"That the continuance of these blessings were due, under God, to the auspicious reign and happy government of her majesty queen Anne.

"That if any clergyman should, by word or writing, declare any thing in opposition to these resolutions, they should look upon him as a sower of divisions among the protestants, and an enemy to the constitution.

"That to teach or preach against the doctrine, government, rites, or ceremonies of the church; or to maintain schools or seminaries for the education of youth in principles contrary to those of the established church, was a contempt of the ecclesiastical laws of the kingdom, of pernicious consequence, and served only to continue and widen the unhappy schisms and divisions in the nation." This resolve was plainly levelled against the presbyterians.

These feuds, however, did not prevent the due dispatch of the public supplies: one hundred and fifty thousand pounds were voted for the support of the necessary branches of the establishment; and several bills being ready for the royal assent, the duke of Ormond went to the house of lords with the usual solemnity, on the sixteenth of June, and passed them, after which the parliament was prorogued for one year; and his grace having visited several of the fortified towns with able engineers, and given orders for such repairs and additional works as were wanted, embarked for England, leaving the administration of the government of Ireland in the hands of sir Richard Cox, lord-chancellor, and of the lord Cutts, commander in chief of her majesty's forces in that kingdom, who were appointed lords-justices during his grace's absence*.

The Irish session being thus finished, the Scottish parliament met a few days after, viz. on the twenty-eighth of June. The ministry of that kingdom had by this time undergone a great change: the English ministry finding how much they had been censured upon account of the act of security which they had connived at, resolved to pursue such measures as might reinstate them in the favour of the public, and with that view set all their powers to work to get the protestant succession settled in Scotland, or to procure an union of the two kingdoms. The marquis of Tweeddale and secretary Johnson were now laid aside, and the management of affairs again intrusted to the duke of Queensberry, under the title of lord privy-seal; and the office of high-commissioner was conferred upon the young duke of Argyll, who succeeded to his father's influence among the presbyterians, with instructions to bring about the points proposed by the English ministry.

At the opening of the session the members were divided into three parties, namely, the Cavaliers or Jacobites, the Revolutionists, and the Squadron Volante, or Flying Squadron: this latter consisted of discarded courtiers, who disclaimed all connection with the other two parties, and pretended to hold the balance between them. The marquis of Tweeddale was at the head of this faction, and had with him the earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, Haddington, and Marchmont. Bishop Burnet tells us, that they were in great credit with the people of Scotland, on account of their pretending to act from dictates of conscience only. Their number, he says, was between twenty and thirty †. The Cavaliers, or Antirevolutionists, were headed by duke Hamilton; Queensberry, Argyll, Annandale, and their friends, headed the Revolutionists, or zealous presbyterians.

Many members being absent at the opening of the session, the lord-commissioner adjourned the parliament to the third of July, when being met again, the queen's letter was read to the assembly, wherein her majesty expressed herself to the following purport: That at their last meeting she recommended to them, with the greatest earnestness, the settling of the succession of that her ancient kingdom in the protestant line; and several things having since happened which shewed the great inconveniency of that matter continuing in suspense, she could not but at present most seriously renew the recommendation of that settlement, as being convinced of the growing necessity thereof, both for the preservation of the protestant religion, and the peace and safety of all her dominions, and for defeating the designs and attempts of all her enemies; and to prevent any objections to the said settlement, that could be suggested from the views or fears of future inconveniencies that might happen to that her kingdom from thence, she should be ready to give the royal assent to such provisions and restrictions as should be found necessary and reasonable in such a case; and therefore she must still leave it upon them, as most necessary for all the ends already mentioned, that they go to the settlement of the succession before all other business.

"She was fully satisfied, she said, and doubted not but they were, that great benefits would arise to all her subjects, by an union of Scotland and England, and that nothing would contribute more to the composing of differences, and extinguishing the heats that were unhappily raised and fomented by the enemies of both nations, than the promoting of every thing that tended to the procuring of the same; therefore she heartily recommended them to pass an act for a commission to set a treaty on foot between the kingdoms, as the parliament of England had done, for effectuating what was so desirable, and for such other matters and things as might be judged proper for her honour, and the good and advantage of both kingdoms for ever, in which she should most heartily give her best assistance." The rest being matter of form, I shall pass it over. This letter was backed by a speech of the duke of Argyll, the high-commissioner, and by another from the lord-chancellor.

Many matters of considerable moment were taken into consideration by this parliament, such as the state of the commerce and coin of the kingdom, the establishing a paper-credit, by circulating of bills, &c. but they all came to nothing. The affair of nominating a successor being taken into deliberation, duke Hamilton proposed, that the parliament should not proceed upon that matter until the treaty with England should be discussed, and the limitations be settled: upon which it was put to the vote, Whether to go first upon the considerations of a treaty of union with England, or upon limitations? but it was carried for limitations. At length, however, the draught of an address to her majesty, setting forth the reasons why the parliament could not proceed to an act for a treaty with England, was offered by Mr. Fletcher of Saltoun, and was to this effect: "That the act lately passed in the parliament of England containing a proposal for a treaty of union of the two kingdoms, is made in such injurious terms to the honour and interest of the Scottish nation, that the parliament could by no means comply with it: but that out of the great sense they had of the duty they owed to her majesty, they declared that they should always be ready to comply with any such proposal from the parliament of England, whenever it shall be made in terms as are no ways dishonourable or disadvantageous to the nation or people of Scotland."

A very hot debate ensued hereupon; but at length the parliament proceeded to the act for a treaty with England, when the duke of Hamilton, to the surprize of his whole party, moved that the nomination of the commissioners should be left to the queen. This gave rise to a still more vehement altercation; but at length the question being put, Whether the nomination should be left to the queen, or the parliament? the duke's motion was approved by a small majority, and an act for treating about the union was passed; but it was provided, that they should not commence such treaty until the clause in the English act, declaring the subjects of Scotland aliens, should be rescinded; so that nothing was effectually to be done for uniting the two kingdoms till the English parliament sat and made the repeal above-mentioned. On this occasion the duke of Athol entered a rigorous protest, to which the greater part of the cavaliers, and all the squadron, adhered, comprehending twenty-four peers, thirty-seven barons, and eighteen boroughs. On the twentieth of December the house was adjourned, after having granted a supply of fifty thousand pounds. Not long after the adjournment, the earl of Marr, who during the whole session had stuck fast by the court, was declared secretary of state, in the room of the marquis of Annandale, who was appointed president of the council*.

It is now time to turn from the consideration of civil affairs to the progress of the war in 1705. The duke of Marlborough had long been revolving a scheme for improving the victory he had gained at Blenheim; and, after the most mature deliberation, no one appeared so rational as that of making an impression on the frontiers of France. The Moselle † was therefore pitched upon as the scene of action, and large magazines of all sorts were formed at Triers. On the thirtieth of March the duke left England, and repaired to the Hague, where he soon persuaded their High Mightinesses to approve of his project, and even to contribute their troops towards its execution. This point settled, he departed for Maestricht in order to assemble his army; in which he used such diligence, that by the latter end of May the troops passed the Maese, and bent their march towards the Moselle, under the command of the duke's brother, general Churchill; while his grace set out for Rastadt, to visit prince Lewis of Baden, where, after a long consultation, they resolved that a sufficient number of German troops should be left for securing the limits of Lauterburg and Stolhoffen, under the command of general Thungen; and that prince Lewis should advance with a large detachment towards the Saar, to act in concert with the duke of Marlborough in forming the siege of Saar-Louis (a fortress of Lorraine, situate on the Saar) the taking of which would have opened a gap into the very bowels of France.

The duke with his troops passed the Saar in the beginning of June, and encamped at Elst, in sight of marshal Villars, who was encamped in that neighbourhood with a numerous army; but upon the approach of the allies, retreated to Coningsmacheren. As the time was very precious, on account of the great scarcity of forage, for want of which the English and Dutch army could not long subsist between the Moselle and the Saar, he sent frequent expresses to quicken the march of the Imperialists; but neither his remonstrances, nor those of the deputies of the States, had any effect. It is true, some few imperial troops were detached from Lauterburg for the Moselle; but they would march their own way, that is, so slowly, that instead of being on the banks of the Saar on the ninth or tenth of June at the farthest, they did not arrive till the twentieth, and there were neither horses nor artillery provided. Prince Lewis of Baden, who had promised to join the duke in person, came indeed as far as Creutznach; but then, under a pretence of being taken ill, he went to the baths at Swalbach, leaving the command of the imperial troops to the count de Frize. The prince was strongly suspected of treachery; but it is more probable that the motives of his conduct proceeded from envy of the duke, whose military reputation had now eclipsed that of all the other commanders.

While our general met with such a mortifying disappointment on the Moselle, the French did not fail to avail themselves of their superiority in the Netherlands, where monsieur d'Auverquerque was in no condition to oppose their progress; they invested Huy, and carried on their attacks with such vigour, that in less than fourteen days the garrison was obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war. Flushed with success, and encouraged by the absence of the duke of Marlborough, the elector of Bavaria and marshal Villeroy undertook the reduction of Liege, and actually began to raise batteries before the citadel. When this disagreeable news reached the allied army, the deputies of the States represented to the duke of Marlborough, "that it was impossible to subsist them any longer where they then were; that the Germans having, by their delays, rendered the besieging of Saar Louis impracticable, and defeated all the projects for a campaign on the Moselle, it was to no purpose to continue any longer in those parts, when their forces might be better employed in the Netherlands for stopping the progress of the enemy." The duke was but too sensible of the truth of this representation, but being willing to remain till the last extremity, he did not decamp till the seventeenth of June, by which time he found all his hopes vanished; he then marched for the Netherlands by the shortest way, and the imperial troops, the Prussians, and the Wirtembergers, moved towards the Upper Rhine. Marshal Villars having now no enemy to dread, sent a detachment to reinforce the elector of Bavaria, and another for the army of marshal Marsin in Alsace, and advanced with the rest towards Triers, which the Palatine general abandoned in a most dishonourable manner to the enemy. After which, Villars marched to join monsieur Marsin, and both together drove the Imperialists from the lines of Croon Weissenburg; and general Thungen could with difficulty maintain himself in the lines of Lauterburg.

In the mean while, the duke of Marlborough prosecuted his march with so much expedition, that he saved Liege; for the enemy, upon the advice of his approach, sent back their artillery to Namur, and retired in great precipitation to Tongeren. On the other hand, the duke pushing his success, retook Huy, and soon made the enemy retire behind their lines, which the duke resolved to force. The French were posted along their lines, with near one hundred battalions, and one hundred and forty-six squadrons. The force of the allies was nearly equal, they having ninety-five battalions, and one hundred and fifty-nine squadrons. In order to divide the enemy, it was resolved to make a false motion; and accordingly the army under monsieur d'Auverquerque decamped from Vignamont on the seventeenth of July, in the morning, and marched towards Burdine on the other side the Mehaigne. Marlborough at the same time made a motion as if he intended to support Auverquerque in the attack of the lines about Messelin, which was the weakest part of them. This feint had the desired success; for the French sent off large detachments to those parts where they apprehended the greatest danger; by which they left those on which the duke had a real design in a very weak condition. The duke saw with pleasure the enemy give so readily into the snare he had prepared for them, and the same night put his army in march, which was joined by that of M. d'Auverquerque, his army having repassed the Mehaigne; and both proceeded with all possible expedition to support a detachment which was ordered to attack the enemy's lines about Heylishem. The design was so secret, and so sudden in the execution, that the enemy knew nothing of it; and this being the strongest part of their lines, was less suspected than any other.

The confederate troops passed the lines with very little opposition, but were afterwards attacked by twenty-four squadrons of Bavarian horse, and twenty battalions. This occasioned a sharp dispute; but the horse and dragoons of the right wing defeated them, and the enemy at length fairly betook themselves to flight, leaving their standards, colours, and cannon, behind them. All the troops behaved to admiration; and amongst the horse the regiment of brigadier Cadogan distinguished themselves, having had the honour to charge first: they defeated four squadrons of Bavarian guards, drove them through two battalions of their own foot, and took four standards. In this action the confederates took the marquis d'Alegre, and the count de Horne, lieutenant-generals, prisoners; with one major-general, two brigadier-generals, and seventy-four other officers. The army marched the same day before noon to Tirlemont, the French decamping in our sight, and passed the Geete, breaking down their bridges with such precipitation, that they left fourteen or fifteen hundred men on this side, who were taken prisoners, with the battalion of Montluc in Tirlemont. There was little of moment performed the rest of the campaign in the Netherlands, the Dutch deputies refusing to concur with a proposal made by the duke of Marlborough and monsieur Auverquerque, to pass the river Ysch and attack the French, who had possessed themselves of the strong camp of Parck, extending their army in such manner as to cover Brussels and Louvain. The duke was not a little chagrined at this timid conduct in the deputies, and wrote an expostulatory letter to the States-general on the subject, which being made public, occasioned great uneasiness among our own people at home, who foresaw that such dilatory proceedings would infallibly spin out the war to a great length.

About the latter end of October the duke of Marlborough, in consequence of an invitation from the new emperor Joseph, set out for Vienna, where he

he was treated with great respect, and concerted with his imperial majesty the operations of the ensuing campaign. After visiting the courts of Berlin and Hanover he repaired to the Hague, where the States-general, in order to compensate for the disgust their deputies had given him by their over-caution, agreed to furnish an additional number of ten thousand men, as a reinforcement to the army of prince Eugene in Italy. After this his grace took his leave of their High Mightinesses, and embarking for England, arrived at St. James's on the thirtieth of December *.

With regard to the proceedings of the army on the Upper Rhine, the Imperialists did not take the field till August, when prince Lewis of Baden, now recovered from his indisposition, arrived in the camp at Stollhoffen. Marshal Villars had a little before passed the Rhine at Strasburg, which obliged general Thungen to do the like with the Imperialists. Prince Lewis having taken a review of the army, resolved to advance and attack Villars, but the latter thought proper to retreat; and the French abandoned Haguenau, and some other places of no great importance. After which the Germans formed the blockade of Fort Lewis, and thus the campaign ended on that side, without any considerable action.

In Italy prince Eugene made several attempts to join the duke of Savoy this campaign, but was not able to effect it, through the vigilance and attention of the duke of Vendosme. At length his royal highness, understanding that the duke of Savoy was reduced to the greatest distress, having now but a small army of twelve thousand men, and no considerable territories left, and that even Turin, his capital city, was threatened with a siege, resolved to make a bold push to get to his assistance. Accordingly, he tried to divide the French army, by sending a strong detachment towards the Adda: the scheme took. The duke of Vendosme immediately marched with good part of his troops to watch the motions of this detachment, while prince Eugene in the mean time advanced to attack the body commanded by the grand prior; but Vendosme having notice of his design before he had marched to too great a distance, returned and joined his brother; whereupon there happened a sharp engagement near Cassano, on the sixteenth of August, in which great numbers were killed and wounded on both sides, and both sides sung Te Deum for the victory. The French boasted they had gained their point in hindering the conjunction of prince Eugene with the duke of Savoy; and prince Eugene thought he had great reason to be satisfied for having prevented the siege of Turin this campaign; and having left the command of the army to count Raventlau, he returned to Vienna to solicit further reinforcements †.

Things in Portugal were but badly managed last year. This year the confederates under the earl of Galway had some success, but not equal to what was expected. The Portuguese, with their allies the English and Dutch, marched to the frontiers of Spain; and meeting with no enemy in the field on that side (the vigorous defence of Gibraltar by the prince of Hesse, of which I have already taken notice, having obliged the French and Spaniards to draw most of their forces that way) they laid siege in the beginning of May to the town of Valencia d'Alcantara, in the province of Alentejo, which in a short time they carried by storm. The garrison of Albuquerque, another town of no great strength, fearing the same fate, surrendered on the twenty-second of the same month, on articles. Several councils were afterwards held to settle the operations for the rest of the campaign, when the earl of Galway and general Fagel proposed laying siege to Bajadox; but that being a town better fortified than either of the former, and having a garrison of nine or ten battalions to defend it, and the Portuguese moreover declaring they wanted the necessary requisites for forming the siege, that design was laid aside for the present, and about the latter end of June the army was sent into quarters of refreshment.

In the mean time, however, the marquis das Minas, who commanded a separate army of Portuguese in the province of Beyra, attacked the town of Salvaterra, in which was a garrison of three hundred and sixty men, who surrendered, prisoners at discretion. The marquis afterwards plundered and burnt Sarca; but receiving intelligence that a strong body of French and Spaniards were in full march towards him, he thought proper to retire to Penamacos. As soon as the summer heats were pretty well abated, the earl of Galway again renewed his instances to form the siege of Bajadox, which after much delay, and many frivolous excuses, on the part of the Portuguese (who from the beginning never appeared to act heartily in the cause of the allies) was agreed to, and about the latter end of September the army marched towards that place, and opened the trenches on the fourth of October; and the siege was carried on with such vigour, that the reduction of the town was looked upon as certain: but the enterprize miscarried by an unforeseen accident. The earl of Galway being one day in the trenches, busied in giving the necessary orders, a cannon-ball carried away his right arm, and he was obliged to be moved off the field; so that the conduct of the siege was left to general Fagel, who is said not to have carried it on with that vigour which the English general had done, and by that means gave time to the marquis de Theffe to throw a relief of one thousand men into Bajadox; and then the confederates abandoned the enterprize, and marched their troops into winter-quarters. The earl of Galway had the consolation to receive letters from the queen his mistress, and from the king of Portugal, condoling with him on his misfortune, and expressing their entire satisfaction in his conduct previous to that unhappy accident ‡.

The disappointment the arms of the allies sustained in Portugal was, however, in some measure, made up by king Charles's success in Catalonia, and the reduction of Barcelona by the celebrated earl of Peterborough and sir Cloudesley Shovel, who in the latter end of May sailed for St. Helen's with the English fleet, having on board a body of five thousand land-forces; and on the twentieth day of June arrived in Lisbon harbour, where they were reinforced by sir John Leake from the Mediterranean, and the Dutch admirals Allemonde and Vanderdussen. King Charles having received assurances that the inhabitants of Catalonia and Valencia were well affected to his interest, resolved to repair into those quarters, and undertake some actions of importance. Accordingly, having sent to the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt to get the garrison of Gibraltar in readiness to embark, he went on board the English admiral's ship, with the earl of Peterborough and other officers of distinction; and the fleet sailed on the twenty-eighth day of July, the earl of Galway having supplied them with two regiments of English dragoons, and in a few days arrived in the bay of Gibraltar, the ruins of which place presented a melancholy, but uncontrovertible proof of the great courage, industry, and indefatigable care, where-with the gallant prince of d'Armstadt, and the brave officers and soldiers under him, had defended it against the united forces of France and Castile; a defence so glorious and honourable, as hardly to be paralleled either in antient or modern history! Here the prince of Hesse came on board, and with him the English guards and three old regiments; in lieu of which two new-raised battalions were left in the garrison.

On the eleventh of August the fleet put into the bay of Altea* to water, when the earl of Peterborough published a manifesto, importing, "That he was not come to take possession of any place in the name of her Britannic majesty or of the States-general, but to maintain the just right of the house of Austria to the Spanish crown; to defend the good and loyal subjects of that monarchy; and to free them from the insupportable yoke of foreign masters †." Encouraged by this declaration, the inhabitants flocked from all quarters, acknowledging Charles III. as their lawful sovereign, and seized the town of Denia, not far from Altea, for his service, whither his Catholic majesty immediately sent a garrison of four hundred Portuguese, under the command of general Ramos. The fleet then sailed from Altea bay about the middle of August, and arrived in the bay of Barcelona on the twenty-second of the same month, about nine o'clock in the morning.

This city, the capital of Catalonia, is one of the most antient in Spain, having been a colony of the Carthaginians, built by them to stop the impetuous torrent of the Romans who came from Italy, and after they had subjected Gallia Narbonensis, were endeavouring to make themselves masters of Spain. It is situated in a plain near the sea, having a mole within, which only galleys and small ships can enter. The entrance into it has a platform with some guns mounted for its defence, and a light-house, being a tower built in the form of a pyramid, with a lanthorn at the top. It is fortified round with ten bulwarks and some old towers. Its ditch in some parts is not very deep, and the covered way is not quite finished. The castle and citadel, which is called Montjuic, is built upon a hill on the west side. It commands the city, without being commanded itself by any ground thereabouts. The country along that coast is level, very fruitful, and well cultivated, being watered by many rivers and rills, which run down from the neighbouring mountains; for at about a league's distance from the sea the land begins to rise, and shapes itself into several hills and mountains, one above another, in the form of a theatre, all full of villages and towns, vineyards and country seats, which make a very agreeable prospect all along the sea-coast for a great way together.

As soon as the fleet had anchored, the enemy began to fire from the mole and a battery near the sea, upon some of the transport ships which stood in for the shore; but this firing had but very little effect, and the transports all anchored in such a manner as they found most commodious for the landing of the forces aboard them. The wind however blew so hard, and made so great a sea, that notwithstanding all the diligence that could be used, it was impossible for them to get on shore that day. The day following, however, the wind and sea being down, the debarkation of the troops began, about three quarters of a league from the city, near a river called Bassoz, which lies on the east side, between the town and a place called Badalona. By the twenty-eighth the landing was completed, and the troops possessed of a strong camp, being extremely well received by the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages, who were strongly attached to the house of Austria.

Upon the arrival of the fleet, Don Francisco de Velasco, viceroy of Catalonia, gave orders for burning all the straw and forage in the country and villages for a league round Barcelona: but notwithstanding all his precaution, there remained enough for all the horse the fleet had brought. The prince of Hesse having been dispatched with two frigates to enquire into the posture of affairs on the coast, and of the strength of the city, his highness put into Mataro, four leagues distant from Barcelona, where having informed himself of what he judged necessary, and advised the people thereabouts, who had declared for king Charles, to come down, he returned to the fleet, with information that the inhabitants of Barcelona were warmly in the interest of his Catholic majesty; but that they were overawed by a garrison of five thousand men, commanded by Velasco, the duke of Popoli, and other officers who had espoused the cause of Philip.

On the twenty-seventh a council of war was held on board the admiral, and his Catholic majesty resolved to go on shore the day following, to encourage the expedition by his presence. Accordingly his majesty landed on the twenty-eighth, amidst the acclamations of an infinite multitude from Vich, and other parts of the adjacent country, who, with repeated cries of "Long live the King!" came to the water-side, threw them-selfes at his majesty's feet, and kissed his hand, with a thousand demonstrations of joy; infomuch that Charles found it a difficult matter to disengage himself from their boisterous loyalty; but having at length mounted on horseback, he rode to the camp, where the forces were all drawn up in a line to receive him; and when his majesty arrived at his quarters, he was saluted with a treble discharge of cannon and small arms.

Some days after his Catholic majesty had landed, an express arrived from England, directing the earl of Peterborough, the general, to proceed to Italy, and endeavour to join the duke of Savoy with his troops, or to make an attempt upon Naples and Sicily, as should be found most advisable, in order to drive the French out of Italy, and set his royal highness at liberty to employ his forces another way. These orders gave inexpressible uneasiness to king Charles: he pressed lord Peterborough in the most earnest manner not to abandon him, when there appeared such a prospect of success in carrying on the war in Spain; adding at the same time with great warmth, that if his lordship (who seemed disposed to comply with the orders he had received) should persist in his resolution to go away, his majesty, finding that his crown and good subjects were to be thus sacrificed, was resolved to stay with them, and share the event of his good or evil fortune. Upon this several councils of war were called, wherein it was deliberated, whether or not to proceed to the siege of Barcelona. The opinions of the members were various: lord Peterborough did indeed twice give his vote for the undertaking; but from the minutes of those councils it appeared to be only out of the extreme inclination he had to comply with the king of Spain's desires, and not out of any confidence he had of succeeding. At length the prince of Hesse proposed to the earl the scheme of surprizing the fort of Montjuic, and desired that his lordship would give him only one thousand men for that purpose, offering himself to conduct and command them. The earl having taken a view of that fort, and of the town on that side; and having maturely weighed his highness's reasons, and considered the manner in which he intended to proceed in the attack; not only concurred with the prince and readily granted him the one thousand men he desired, but likewise resolved to support his highness with one thousand more, and some dragoons*.

Accordingly a detachment of two thousand men, supported by the dragoons, and furnished with scaling-ladders, and all other materials for a sudden assault, began their march the fourteenth of September, at six in the evening, led by the brave prince of Hesse; but being obliged to go a considerable way about, and the roads they had to pass through being very bad, they did not arrive at the foot of the hill on which fort Montjuic is situated, till day had began to break; whereupon the alarm was given to those in the castle and town, who received our troops with a general discharge of their artillery and small arms: notwithstanding which the prince pressed forward, and the troops entered the covered way and ditch sword in hand, some of them getting upon the out-works that were unfinished, and, maugre the continual fire of the enemy, possessed themselves of the bastion of a new fortification, beat the Spaniards out of it, and obliged them to retire into the castle: but the prince of Hesse exposing his person too much, in order to make himself master of a post that would cut off the communication between the town and the fort, was unfortunately shot through the thigh with a musket-ball that tore an artery, by which he lost a great quantity of blood; and after marching about fifty paces, animating the men, as if he had known nothing of his being wounded, he fell down through weakness, and was carried to a little house that stood near the place; but before the surgeons, who were immediately called, could come to look at his wound, he expired, to the inexpressible grief of every one who had a true sense of his great military abilities. The soldiers, who had a kind of enthusiastical confidence in the prince, were struck with an insurmountable damp upon the news of his untimely fall. Their despondency was still farther encreased upon seeing the marquis of Risburg march out of Barcelona, at the head of a large body of troops, to succour the line of communication, and reinforce the citadel. All was now upon the point of falling into confusion on our side, when lord Peterborough, hearing of the prince's death, advanced, and took upon him the command (for hitherto he had only served as a volunteer in this enterprize) and by his presence re-animated the drooping spirits of the soldiers, and persuaded them to maintain their ground; and being reinforced with fresh bodies of troops, the earl attacked the fort, tho' with no great prospect of success; the governor, a Neapolitan gentleman, named Don Carlos Caracholi, continuing to defend it very resolutely, till the seventeenth of September, when a bomb from one of our batteries falling into the magazine of powder, blew it up, by which the governor and some of the best officers, and a number of men, were killed. This struck the rest with such consternation, that they were unable to make any farther resistance. The earl of Peterborough advancing to storm the place, through a breach made in part of the wall and gate by the explosion, they surrendered at discretion.

This post of Montjuic was of the utmost importance, for it commanded the city, being upon an eminence; and besides, the fortifications of the town on that side were weakest. This induced the earl to make immediate dispositions for bombarding Barcelona; the trenches were accordingly opened before it on the 19th of September, and the batteries erected, with the help of the Miquelets or militia of Catalonia and our own seamen; and the fleet from the road thundered with such fury upon the town, and did such terrible execution, that in a few days the governor, despairing of relief, thought fit to capitulate, and surrendered on the fourth of October. The next day the earl of Peterborough ordered a detachment of the army to take possession of one of the gates. The same day Gironne declared for king Charles, as did all the rest of Catalonia, except Roses*.

The king of Spain having made his entry into Barcelona, and received the oath of fidelity from his subjects, a council of war was assembled a few days afterwards, wherein it was resolved that fir Cloudefley Shovel should proceed for England with the best part of the fleet: that sir John Leake, with a strong squadron, should be left in the Mediterranean: that six ships should remain with the earl of Peterborough; two more be stationed at Gibraltar; and a third and fourth-rate be employed, at the request of his Portuguese majesty, in cruising for the homeward-bound Brazil fleet. In pursuance of those resolutions, sir Cloudefley Shovel, with 19 ships of the line, and part of the Dutch fleet, sailed through the Streights, and arrived at Spithead on the sixteenth of November*.

The garrison of Barcelona, all but one thousand men, who, with Velasco the late governor, were conveyed to Malaga, enlisted in the service of Charles, who formed from among them a body of guards, and six other regiments were raised by the states of Catalonia. The Condé di Cifuentes, at the head of the Miquelets and Catalonians who were in the interest of the house of Austria, secured Tarragona, Tortosa, Lerida, San Mattheo, and other places. At the same time Don Raphael Nebat, a Catalonian general, who had already three brothers in the service of Charles, deserted Philip, with his whole regiment of five hundred horse; and joining general Ramos at Denia, they made themselves masters of Xabia, Oliva, Gandia, and Alsira, in Valencia. Encouraged by such great successes, they advanced to the capital of that kingdom, which bears the same name †: this they took by the assistance of the inhabitants, and in it the marquis de Villa Garcia, the viceroy, and the archbishop; and thereupon the whole kingdom of Valencia, except Alicant and Persinsola, revolted to king Charles, who appointed the conde di Cifuentes his viceroy of that province; and had the Portuguese made any diversion, as they promised, or but permitted their allies, the English and Dutch, to have advanced to the Spanish frontiers at this time, it is not improbable but all Spain had submitted to Charles; but their unaccountable dilatoriness, not to give it a worse term, furnished the enemy with an opportunity to send a body of six thousand men into the kingdom of Valencia, under the command of the conde de las Torres, who forthwith invested San Mattheo, guarded by colonel Jones, at the head of five hundred Miquelets only. This being a place of great importance on account of its situation, the earl of Peterborough marched thither with one thousand infantry and two hundred dragoons, and by means of feigned intelligence artfully conveyed to the conde, induced that general to abandon the siege with precipitation, in the apprehension of being suddenly attacked by a considerable army. The earl having so effectually achieved this important enterprize, possessed himself of Nules and Molviedro (the ancient Saguntum), and then having nothing to interrupt his progress, he marched to Valencia, where he was received by the inhabitants in general as their guardian angel and deliverer. Indeed the generous behaviour of the earl to the natives, his care to protect them, and the strict discipline he kept among his troops had so conciliated the minds of the Spaniards to the English, that the disorders at Port St. Mary's were entirely forgot, and they appeared ready to join the allies, and run all hazards with them, to drive the French and their adherents out of the kingdom.

Our affairs at sea were more prosperous this year than they had been formerly. Besides the great things done in the Mediterranean in the beginning of the season by admiral Leake, who defeated monsieur de Pointis' squadron, and thereby relieved Gibraltar; Sir George Byng, sent with a small squadron into the Soundings, took a French ship of forty guns, together with twelve privateers, and seven rich West India ships. Our other cruisers also picked up so many of the French privateers, that we had some thousands of their seamen in our prisons; and such a good look-out was kept off Brest, that the French fleet did not think fit to venture forth. By this means our navigation was rendered much more safe, and our trade consequently more prosperous; but as it would be unpardonable in an historian who makes claim to impartiality not to mention our losses as well as our successes, I must not pass by unnoticed a misfortune that attended the English arms by sea in the course of this year, I mean the capture of the Baltic fleet homeward-bound, with their convoy of three ships of war, which were taken by the Dunkirk squadron, commanded by the count de St. Paul, though he himself was killed in the engagement.

The endeavours used by the English and Dutch envoys at the court of Vienna, to accommodate matters between the emperor and his rebellious subjects in Hungary, having had no effect, that kingdom continued to be a scene of confusion and plunder.

Poland was in no better condition. Charles XII. of Sweden, who still maintained his army by contributions in that country, had presented to the diet at Warsaw young Stanislaus Leczinski, palatine of Posnania, as a person proper to be their king: the intimation of a conqueror has the force of a law. The diet, unable to resist, acquiesced in his proposal. Stanislaus was elected and proclaimed king, and recognized by Charles; while Augustus, unable to maintain his footing in Poland, retreated into his Saxon dominions, which he impoverished in order to raise a great army to return into Poland. The pope espoused the cause of Augustus, and cited the cardinal-primate to appear at Rome, to give an account of the share he had in the Polish troubles. The old cardinal however refused to go to Rome: he owned Stanislaus, but died before his coronation; and that ceremony was performed by the bishop of Cujavia, in the presence of Charles, on the fourth of October, 1705, in the city of Warsaw, notwithstanding the usual custom of the Poles crowning their kings at Cracow.

† Valencia is the capital of the province of the same name, on the river Turio. It stands in a very fruitful country, abounding with corn, wine, oil, fruits, &c. The inhabitants amount to fifteen thousand families. It is the see of an archbishop, and has an university. The city is abundantly supplied with water, not only from the river which runs along it, but by an incredible number of deep wells, dug almost in every house. Trade and manufactures flourish here; the principal of the latter is that of silk, which the women and children spin before their houses. They export large quantities of wine, oil, and fruit; and the inhabitants have an easy and agreeable conversation, without any of that stiffness observable in the rest of Spain. It lies one hundred and eighty miles south-east of Madrid.

While Charles was thus intent upon the ruin of Augustus, he neglected the preservation of his own dominions. Peter, czar of Muscovy, was every day becoming more formidable. Though he had given but little assistance to Augustus in Poland, he had nevertheless made powerful diversions elsewhere. He now began to grow not only a good soldier himself, but likewise instructed his soldiery in the art of war: discipline was established among his troops, and he understood the great secret of subsisting his armies. He had besides formed a respectable navy, capable of making head against the Swedes in the Baltic. Strengthened by these advantages, and by the absence of the king of Sweden, he took Narva by assault, ravaged all Livonia, and made incursions even into Sweden ||.

Peter, however, aspired to a nobler character than that of a destroyer of towns: he employed himself in laying the foundation of a great city in the midst of his military toils: this was the city of Petersburg, which he afterwards made the place of his residence, and the center of his kingdom's trade. It is situated between Finland and Ingria, in a marshy island, round which the river Neva throws several branches before it falls into the Gulph of Finland. He himself drew the plan of the city, the fortress, and the harbour, with the quays which embellish it, and the forts that defend its entrance. This desert and uncultivated island, which, during the short summer in these climates, was only a heap of mud, and in winter a frozen pool, into which there was no entry by land but through pathless forests and deep morasses, and which had hitherto been the haunt of wolves and bears, was, by an amazing perseverance, made habitable, amidst the obstacles which nature, the genius of the people, and an unsuccessful war, conspired to raise against it. Petersburg was become a reputable city in 1705, and its harbour was filled with ships. The emperor, by a proper distribution of favours, drew many foreigners thither, bestowing lands upon some, houses upon others, and encouraging all the artists that came, to civilize this barbarous climate. Above all, he rendered it proof against the utmost efforts of his enemies. The Swedish generals, who frequently beat his troops in every other quarter, were never able to hurt his infant colony. It enjoyed a profound tranquillity in the midst of the war with which it was surrounded §.

I shall now return to England, where the Whigs carried all before them, and got possession of all places and preferments. On the 13th of October the seals were taken from sir Nathan Wright, and William Cowper, esq. a great patron of the dissenters, was made lord-keeper in his room, and was soon after made lord-chancellor. It must be acknowledged, that lord Cowper was so eminent for his abilities and integrity, that he brought a new credit to the Whig party in the nation. The earl of Abingdon was about the same time removed from his place of constable of the Tower and lord-lieutenant of Oxfordshire. Some other changes of less note were also made, all of them having the same tendency.

On the twenty-fifth of October the new parliament met, when a violent contest arose about the choice of another speaker. The candidates were Mr. Bromley and Mr. Smith; the former supported by the Tories, the latter by the Whigs, who carried their point by a majority of forty voices; upon which Mr. Smith was presented to, and approved by her majesty on the twenty-seventh, when she made a speech to both houses, in which she represented the necessity of acting vigorously against France, as the common enemy to the liberties of Europe. She recommended the fortitude of the duke of Savoy, which, she said, was without example, and merited all their endeavours to encourage him to persevere in the same conduct. She acquainted them, that she had an intention to expedite commissions for treating of an union with Scotland: she earnestly recommended unanimity and brotherly affection among her people: she observed, that some persons had endeavoured to foment animosities, and even suggested in print that the established church was in danger. Such people, she said, were enemies to her and to the kingdom, and meant only to cover designs which they durst not publicly avow, by endeavouring to distract the nation with unmeasurable and groundless distrusts and jealousies. She declared, she would always affectionately support and countenance the church of England, as by law established; that she would inviolably maintain the toleration; that she would promote religion and virtue, encourage trade, and every thing else that might make them a happy and a flourishing people; "And they who shall concur zealously with me (concluded she) in carrying on these good designs, shall be sure of my kindness and favour."

This speech, which was a very long one, and supposed to be drawn up by the new lord-keeper, was extremely pleasing to the majority of the parliament, and both houses presented addresses fraught with the warmest expressions of duty and affection; and the commons in particular presented a second on the thirteenth of November, in which they return her thanks for her great care and endeavours to settle the succession to the Scottish crown in the house of Hanover, and promoting the union of the two kingdoms, assuring her no endeavours should be wanting on their part to assist her in perfecting so salutary a work. They at the same time request that her majesty will be pleased to direct that the whole of the proceedings of the late session of parliament in Scotland, relating to the union and the succession, might be laid before the house. The lords had made the like request the day before: the queen answered both houses, that she would comply with what they desired ¶.

The lower house having discussed and decided some controverted elections (which is the first business the commons generally enter upon) proceeded to examine the estimate for the service of the ensuing year, and readily voted the necessary supplies.

The most important debates in this session began in the house of lords, her majesty being present at all of them. On the fifteenth of November, while that house was upon the state of the nation, the lord Haversham, an active man among the Tories, made a long speech, in which he reflected with great freedom on the conduct of the duke of Marlborough, both on the Moselle and in Brabant; as also on the behaviour of the Dutch, who prevented the duke's engaging the French after he had forced their lines. Having occasion to speak of the decay of our trade, he said, "There was a word we were very fond of, which we called the Balance of Power: but the Dutch, who were a very wise people, had a double view, and took as much care of the balance of trade as they did of the balance of power, and were as much afraid of our power by sea as the power of France by land." Trade, he observed, begets wealth, and wealth begets power; and he thought it was very hard for England, that while the Dutch lived at peace under the protection of our arms, we, if we would have any part of trade with them, must have it under the protection of French passes: that the Dutch indeed complained they were very poor, but he did not see how they had been any thing out of pocket since the war; for they had more by remittances from England than all the money that went out of their country to Portugal, Savoy, and the German princes †.

But the principal design of this speech appears to be the inviting over the princess Sophia; and therefore he concluded with a motion, That an address might be presented to her majesty, to invite over the presumptive heir of the crown to reside here. This motion was strongly supported by the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Rochester, Nottingham, and Aylesbury, who urged, that there was no method could be more effectual for securing the succession than that of the successor being upon the spot, ready to assume and maintain his right against any pretender whatsoever, as it appeared, from the whole course of the English history, that when the throne became vacant, the first comer had always succeeded in his pretensions. This proposal, however, was warmly opposed by the Whigs, who knew it was so disagreeable to the queen, that she would never give her consent. In fine, the question being put, Whether to approve of the motion? it was carried in the negative by a great majority: however, the lords thought fit, on the motion of lord Wharton, to bring in a bill for the further security of the Hanover succession, and the peace of the kingdom, in case of her majesty's decease. This bill provided that a regency should be appointed, to be composed of the seven persons who should possess for the time being the offices of archbishop of Canterbury, lord-chancellor or lord-keeper, lord-treasurer, lord-president, lord privy-seal, lord high-admiral, and lord chief-justice of the Queen's-Bench: that their business should be to proclaim the next successor through the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and join with a certain number of persons named as regents by the successor, in three lists to be sealed up and deposited with the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-keeper, and minister residentary of Hanover: that these joint regents should conduct the administration, till the successor should arrive or send further orders: and that the last parliament, even though dissolved, should re-assemble, and continue sitting for six months after the death of her majesty.

The bill met with a warm opposition from the Tories in the lower house, and several of the upper house entered their protests against it: nor were there wanting some of the Whig party in the house of commons who endeavoured to obstruct it, from a persuasion that the princess Sophia was really desirous to reside in England. Great exceptions were taken to that clause in the bill, enacting that the last parliament should be reassembled. The Tories observed hereupon that this was a plain contradiction to part of the act by which the succession was originally settled; for, among other limitations, the parliament had provided, that when the crown should devolve to the house of Hanover, no one who had either place or pension should be capable of sitting in the house of commons. After long and puzzling debates, it was at last agreed that a certain number of offices should be particularly specified as non-admissible into the house of commons on any condition. This self-denying clause, and some other amendments, produced conferences between the two houses, and at length the bill passed by their mutual assent, under the title of an Act of Regency; but it was not till the 19th of February; so industrious had the Tory party been in throwing obstructions in the way, in order, if possible, to carry their point of bringing over the next successor. The principal managers for the Tories on this occasion were Mr. Bromley and sir Thomas Hanmer. While this matter was in debate, the queen gave the royal assent to an act for exhibiting a bill to naturalize the princess Sophia and the issue of her body ‡.

The Tories tried their strength in another point, in which however they found themselves equally disappointed. The duke of Marlborough had incurred the hatred of that party by deserting them (who had certainly been the instruments of his first promotion) and joining with the Whigs: they resolved therefore to set on foot a strict enquiry into his conduct, in hopes of discovering some particulars that would be sufficient to fix a stain upon his character, and effect his ruin. With this view a motion was made in the upper house || by the lord Haversham, That the miscarriages of the last campaign should be enquired into, and that an address should immediately be presented to her majesty, requesting her to acquaint the house with whatever she knew concerning those transactions §. Fired with indignation at this concealed attack upon their darling general, the Whigs mustered all their force, and the motion was rejected by a great majority. And now more effectually to triumph over their adversaries, the two houses presented an address to her majesty, importing, that being justly alarmed by the many artifices lately employed by the emissaries of France, in order to raise jealousies and misunderstandings between the allies, they most earnestly besought her majesty to use all possible endeavours to preserve a good correspondence among the confederates, and in a particular manner to maintain and cultivate a strict friendship with the States-general. However, as if conscious of the great deficiencies of the allies in furnishing their respective quotas, and properly concurring with us in the operations of the war; they at the same time desired, that as her majesty had set them a noble example, she would use all proper means to excite the whole confederacy to make early and effectual preparations, and to exert their utmost efforts in the prosecution of the war. The commons in the mean while proceeded with great unanimity in providing proper funds for the supplies; and the question being proposed, Whether it should be referred to the committee of ways and means to consider, that in the clause for adding ten thousand men to act in conjunction with the troops of the States-general, it should be provided, That the Dutch be obliged to leave off trading with France? it was carried in the negative by a majority of one hundred and eighty-four against one hundred and seventeen. I have already animadverted upon the strange partiality shewn in favour of the Dutch by the Whig party.

The Scottish parliament having declared that they would enter into no treaty of union with England, till the act by which they were declared aliens should be finally rescinded; in order to remove this obstruction, the two houses now concurred in repealing that act, as well as the taking off the several prohibitions and restrictions which had been laid upon the trade between the two nations.

On the twenty-fifth of November captain Norris, in the Britannia, with the lord Shannon and brigadier Stanhope, arrived at St. James's, with news of the success of the allies in Catalonia. The queen hereupon went to the house of peers on the twenty-seventh, and in a speech communicated to the lords and commons these good tidings; with which the commons were so pleased, that they forthwith granted two hundred and fifty thousand pounds "for her majesty's proportion in the expence of prosecuting the advantages already gained by king Charles III. for the recovery of the monarchy of Spain to the house of Austria *".

On the first of September this year a pamphlet called, The Memorial of the Church of England, had been presented at the Old Bailey, and ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. It was a Tory production, and the design of it was to shew that the Whig ministry were contriving the destruction of the church of England, and countenanced its greatest enemies. This pamphlet had been much read; and being wrote in a style well adapted to captivate the minds of the people, it had raised a great clamour that the church was exposed to the most imminent danger: it was therefore resolved by the ministry that an enquiry should be made into the real foundation of this uneasiness; and accordingly the lord Halifax moved that a day might be appointed to enquire into "the danger of the church." Upon this the sixth of December was appointed for that purpose: and on that day the queen repaired to the house of peers, in order to hear the reasonings on this important subject.

The debate was opened by the earl of Rochester †, who, among other things, urged, That there was danger to be apprehended to the established church, from these three causes: First, the act of security in Scotland: Secondly, the heir of the house of Hanover not being sent for over: Thirdly, the not passing the bill to prevent occasional conformity. Upon the first, he said, the presbyterian church in Scotland was fully established, without a toleration: that to arm that people was to give them a power to invade England, where they had a powerful party, who never wanted the will to destroy the church: that he thought the heir to the crown ought to be present amongst us, in order to be fully acquainted with us and our constitution, and thereby enabled to prevent any evil designs upon the church and state: with respect to the occasional conformity-bill, he observed, that by rejecting that bill, which was in itself so reasonable, and the church's request in it so small, the greatest enemies to the church might qualify themselves to hold offices of trust and authority in church and state, to the ruin of both.

The substance of this speech was repeated and enlarged upon by several other peers of the same party, particularly the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Nottingham, the duke of Leeds, Compton bishop of London, the archbishop of York, and the bishop of St. Asaph. These were answered by lord Halifax, lord Wharton, Burnet bishop of Salisbury, the bishop of Norwich, and others. The substance of their argument was, that the church was safer now than it ever had been. At the Revolution provision was made, that our king must be of the Reformed Religion: nor was this all; by the late act of succession he was restricted to be of the communion of the church of England. In regard to the occasional conformity-bill, it was answered, that the rejecting that bill could not with any propriety be brought as a matter of objection and blame, inasmuch as it was done by a majority of the house, to whose decision the lesser number were bound to submit. It was asked, If we had not all our laws left to us not only entire, but strengthened by late additions and explanations; so that we were safer in these than we had been at any time formerly? As to the dissenters, it was said, they gained no new strength: on the contrary, they were visibly decreasing; the toleration had conciliated their minds towards us, and they had given many recent instances of their care and zeal to preserve the government. In respect to our clergy, the queen was taking all possible care to relieve them from the depressions of poverty, and a spirit of zeal and piety appeared in our churches, and at sacrament, beyond the example of former times. In one respect, it was acknowledged that the church was in danger, and that was from an evil spirit and a virulent temper spread among the clergy, many of whom had raised factions in dioceses against their bishops: these, it was said, were dangers created by the very men who now filled the nation with imaginary perils, while their own conduct produced real and threatening ones ‡.

Lord Somers recapitulated all the arguments which had been advanced on both sides of the question, and declared his own opinion to be, that the nation was happy under a wise and just administration; and that for men to raise groundless jealousies at that juncture, could mean no less than an intention to embroil the people at home, and defeat the glorious designs of the allies to humble the arrogance of that restless enemy of this nation, Lewis of France.

In fine, the question being put, Whether the church of England was in danger? it was carried in the negative by sixty-one against thirty. Then the house resolved, "That the church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extremest danger by king William III. of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing; under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and whoever goes about to suggest and insinuate that the church is in danger under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom *."

This resolution was opposed by many lords, who entered their reasons for dissenting from it; but being communicated to the commons, that house, after some short debates, concurred with the determination of the peers, and also joined with them in an address to her majesty to take effectual measures for making the joint resolution of the two houses public; as also for bringing to condign punishment the authors and spreaders of the seditious and scandalous report of the church being in danger. Her majesty returned for answer, that she would readily comply with their request, and was very well pleased to find them so forward in assisting her to put a stop to those groundless and malicious reports. Accordingly, on the twentieth of December she issued a proclamation, notifying the resolution of the two houses, and offering a reward for discovering the author of the Memorial of the Church of England, and for apprehending David Edwards, charged upon oath as the printer and publisher of that libel. The next day, December 21, her majesty came to the house of peers, and, among other bills, gave the royal assent to one for naturalizing the princess Sophia, electress and duchess-dowager of Hanover, and the issue of her body. She then made a speech to both houses, applauding the unanimity of their proceedings, and the good disposition they had shewn towards an union with Scotland. After this the commons adjourned themselves to the seventh day of January.

In the mean time Edwards, the printer of the Memorial, finding himself abandoned by the party who had employed him, surrendered himself, on a promise of his pardon if he would discover the author. He named three gentlemen of the house of commons; sir Humphry Mackworth, Mr. Pooley, and Mr. Ward; but as he was not able to make out the charge, the copy having been brought him by a third hand, the matter slept. Edwards was continued in custody a long time, in expectation perhaps that he would make a fuller discovery; but he was at length discharged, and the real authors of the Memorial are to this day unknown.

The first thing the commons did after their next meeting (January 1706) was to present the thanks of the house to the duke of Marlborough (lately returned from abroad) for his great services to the queen and the nation in the last campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with her allies: to which his grace returned a respectful and grateful answer. The credit of this nobleman was extremely high with the nation at this juncture, insomuch that having proposed a loan of five hundred thousand pounds to the emperor on a branch of his revenue in Silesia, the whole sum was suddenly subscribed by the merchants of London, and other monied persons †. Indeed public credit at this time was very high; the kingdom was blessed with plenty; the forces were well paid, notwithstanding the great quantities of coin exported for the maintenance of the war; the paper-currency supplied the deficiency so well, that there were very few murmurs heard.

All the funds being now established, one in particular, for two millions and a half, by way of annuities for ninety-nine years, at six and an half per cent. her majesty came to the house of peers on the nineteenth of March; and having given the royal assent to such bills as were ready, she made a speech to both houses, in which she expressed her acknowledgements for the unanimity and dispatch with which they had conducted the public business, and the zeal and affection they had shewn for her service: after which, by her majesty's order, the parliament was prorogued to the first of May following §. For the several public bills that received the royal assent this session, I refer the reader to the notes ¶, but cannot close this account of parliamentary affairs without taking particular no-

¶ An act for naturalizing the princess Sophia, and the issue of her body, by which the usual qualifications required of persons to be naturalized (viz. receiving the sacrament, and taking the oaths) were dispensed with. An act for 4 s. in the pound upon land. An act for repealing several clauses in the act made for the security of the kingdom of England, against several acts passed in Scotland, particularly that part of it which made the Scots aliens. An act for continuing the duties on malt, &c. An act to prevent frauds committed by bankrupts: by this act it was enacted, That such bankrupts who shall remove, carry away, or embezzle, any part of their effects, shall suffer as felons; a bankrupt shall not be discharged, unless his certificate be first signed by four fifths in number and value of his creditors; commissioners of bankrupts may appoint assignees, who may by the majority of the creditors be afterwards removed—No commission of bankruptcy shall be issued by the application of any creditor, unless his single debt shall amount to one hundred pounds; or of two of the creditors so petitioning, to one hundred and fifty pounds; or of three or more creditors, to two hundred pounds. See statut. 5 Annæ, cap. xxii. An act also passed during this session, by the procurement of the lord Somers, for abridging and reforming some proceedings in the common law and in chancery, which were both dilatory and very chargeable: besides these, and some other acts, to the number of seventeen, the royal assent was given to fifty-three, private ones.

And here I cannot pass over unnoticed a very extraordinary example of public spirit and integrity in the lord-keeper Cowper. On the first day of the year it was a custom for all those who practised in chancery, to offer a new year's gift to the lord-chancellor or keeper of the great-seal. These grew to be so considerable, that they amounted to fifteen hundred pounds a year. On the new year's-day of this year, which was his first, he signified to all those who, according to custom, were to come with their presents, that he would receive none. He thought it looked like bespeaking the favour of the court; and that if it was not bribery, yet it came too near it, and looked too like it. Tindal's Continuation of Rapin, vol. iv. p. 220.

tice of two acts, viz. "An act for the better security of her majesty's person and government, and of the crown of England in the protestant line;" and "An act for the encouragement and increase of seamen, and the speedier manning of the fleet."

By the first of these, commonly called the Act of Regency, the act of succession received very material alterations, particularly in the appointing a regency after the demise of her majesty. And whereas it was provided by the former act of settlement, that all matters relating to the government should be transacted in the privy-council, and signed by the members of that board, this clause was repealed by the present act, as well as that other important clause, that no person in office should be a member of parliament. I have already taken notice that this last alteration met with great opposition in the house of commons, and at length the matter was compromised in the following manner, viz. That after the dissolution of the then parliament, no person in any new office to be created by the crown, or any commissioner, secretary, or receiver of prizes, comptroller of accounts of the army, commissioner of transports for sick or wounded, agents of regiments, governors of plantations, commissioners of the navy, of the out-ports, or any having pensions from the crown during pleasure, should be capable of being chosen members of the commons: and that if any person chosen a member should afterwards accept any place of profit from the crown, his election should be void; but that the same person might be re-chosen for that or any other county or borough. And it was further provided, that there should be no more commissioners appointed for the execution of any office than there had been before that session: and lastly, it was enacted, That if any person declared incapable of being elected by this act should presume to sit or vote in the house, he should forfeit five hundred pounds to him that should sue for the same.

By the bill for the encouragement and increase of seamen, a reward was offered for every person who should discover and take up such seamen as should not be already in her majesty's service, and a penalty denounced against every one who should harbour or conceal such seamen. Conduct-money was to be allowed for conveying and subsisting such seamen, according to the usage of the navy: and as an encouragement to seamen and sea-faring persons, every seaman who shall be turned over from one ship to another shall be paid the wages due to him from the ship in which he is turned over, before that ship to which he shall be turned over go to sea, either in money, or by a ticket, which shall entitle him to an immediate payment. A clause was also inserted for discharging of such seamen, and other insolvent persons, as are in prison for debt, and delivering them into her majesty's service on board the fleet *.

The new convocation met at the same time with the new parliament; but instead of imitating the union and harmony of the parliament, they revived the divisions by which the former had been distracted, and the two houses seemed to act with more determined rancour against each other. The lower house being determined to make choice of a prolocutor, chose Dr. Binks, dean of Litchfield: then the upper house proceeded to draw up an address to the queen, wherein they express much resentment against those who suggested the church to be in danger, and sent it to the lower house for their concurrence, which was refused, without any reason being assigned for such dissent. They prepared another in a different strain, which was rejected by the archbishop. Then the lower house came to several resolutions, asserting their right of having what they offered to the upper house received by his grace and their lordships. This paper being presented to their lordships, and read, they still refused to receive the address of the lower house, by which a stop was put to all addressing, and to all farther communication between the two houses, and the convocation was prorogued in the beginning of March. The queen, apprehending these disputes would rise to a greater height if the two houses were suffered to meet suddenly, sent a letter to the archbishop, wherein she signified her resolution to maintain her supremacy, and the due subordination of presbyters to bishops: she expressed her hope that he and his suffragans would act conformably to her resolution, in which case she assured them of her favour and protection; and concluded with directing them to adjourn the convocation to such farther time as should appear convenient †.

Her majesty, after having done every thing in her power to preserve peace and unity at home, was no less attentive to do the same among her neighbours and allies abroad. The bishopric of Lubeck in Germany becoming vacant the preceding year, the duke administrator of Holstein, brother to the late duke of that name, and nephew of the late bishop, and prince Charles brother to the king of Denmark, who were both chosen coadjutors to that prelate by different parties, now laid claim to the vacant see. The duke of Holstein first took possession of it, but was soon after ejected by some Danish troops. The king of Sweden seemed resolute to maintain the right of the duke of Holstein; the king of Denmark, that of his brother; and the emperor, whose prerogative it is to confirm the election of all protestant bishoprics, being fearful of disobliging either party in this critical juncture of affairs, chose rather to leave the controversy to the arbitration of the queen of England and the States-general. Their High Mightinesses referring the same to her Britannic majesty, the queen decreed, That the administrator of Holstein should be restored to the civil possession of the bishopric, until the dispute was finally determined either by the aulic chamber or a friendly accommodation, which should be left to the king of Denmark's choice. The parties concerned acquiesced with this provisional decision; and about the middle of April this year (1706) the king of Denmark ordered his troops to evacuate the bishopric of Lubeck, and to deliver up the town and castle of Eutin to Mr. Wick, the English resident at Hamburg ‡.

The attention of the public was now engrossed by the most important transaction that ever happened in this island, which was finally and legally concluded at the close of the year 1706: I mean, a consolidating union of the two Britannie kingdoms of England and Scotland, after their crowns had been united one hundred and four years before in the person of king James I. This great and happy union had been several times before attempted in different reigns, but had been as often obstructed by the starting of various objections; to remove which, no serious or steady endeavours had ever been pursued. Nothing certainly could be more obvious than that it was the interest of two nations, inhabiting and possessing the same island, perfectly to unite for their common defence against all attacks from the continent. While they remained disjointed, they had their different, and consequently their contrary interests to pursue, not only in matters of trade and commerce, product, and manufactures, but even in friendship and affection with regard to different nations on the continent. Religion too (or rather indeed the mere external mode of it) contributed its share in keeping up the difference; and what had perhaps the greatest influence of all, ancient ill-judged national prejudices on both sides, still remained too strong easily to be conquered. Finally, the great hereditary officers of Scotland, and the possessors of many other lucrative posts in that state, which must be necessarily sunk upon such an incorporating union with England, had hitherto no small influence in obstructing it; but happily a more moderate way of thinking than formerly, in the ministry of both kingdoms, at length got the better of all obstructions; and the parliament of each kingdom having passed an act, empowering the queen to appoint commissioners to treat upon this subject, her majesty was pleased, on the part of England, to nominate the following noblemen and gentlemen:

Thomas, lord archbishop of Canterbury.
 William Cowper, esq. lord-keeper of the great-seal.

The English commissioners named Mr. George Doddington, and the Scots, sir David Nairn, to be their secretaries.

The commissioners of both kingdoms met, for the first time, on Tuesday the sixteenth of April, 1706, at the council-chamber of the Cockpit, near Whitehall, the place appointed for their conferences; and their commissions being opened and read by the respective secretaries, and introductory speeches delivered by the lord-keeper of England and the lord-chancellor of Scotland, it was agreed that copies of the several commissions should be prepared and signed by the secretaries, and interchanged; and then the commissioners adjourned to the Monday following (April 22) when, being again assembled, the lord-keeper Cowper, in the name of the lords-commissioners for England, delivered to the board four preliminary articles, which were read, and were in substance as follows: That all proposals made by either side should be in writing; and every point, when agreed, reduced into writing: That no point, though agreed upon, should be obligatory, till all matters should be adjusted in such a manner as would be proper to be laid before the queen and the parliament of each nation, for their approbation: That a committee should be appointed from each commission, to revise revise the minutes which might pass, before they should be inserted in the books by the respective secretaries: and, lastly, That all the proceedings during the treaty should be kept secret.

The Scots proposed a foederal union, in the nature of that subsisting between the Dutch United Provinces, or the cantons of Switzerland; but the English would hear of nothing less than an incorporating union, so as effectually to take from any future Scottish parliament, the power of repealing the articles of this treaty. Accordingly, on the twenty-fourth of April, the lord-keeper of England proposed that the two kingdoms of England and Scotland should be for ever united into one nation, by the name of GREAT-BRITAIN; that it should be represented by one and the same parliament; and that the succession to this monarchy, in failure of heirs of her majesty's body, should be subject to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the twelfth and thirteenth year of the reign of the late king William III. entitled, "An act for the farther limitation of the crown, &c."

To these preliminaries the commissioners for Scotland agreed, with this proviso only, "That all the subjects of the united kingdom of Great Britain should have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation, to or from any part or place within the said united kingdoms, and plantations thereunto belonging, and that there may be a communication of all other privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the subjects of either kingdom." This the commissioners of England acquiesced in, under such terms as, in the further progress of this treaty, should be found for the common advantage of both kingdoms. These general preliminaries being agreed upon, the commissioners proceeded to particulars; and during their conferences the queen made them several visits to quicken their progress. I shall not trouble the reader with the several proposals and answers on every head, which may be found at large in the Proceedings of the Lords-Commissioners for the Union, published by authority; but give him the substance of the articles as they were agreed to and ratified by both parliaments, though not without great opposition on the part of that of Scotland, as will hereafter appear.

ARTICLES of UNION between ENGLAND and SCOTLAND. *

I. That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland shall, from the first of May, 1707, be united into one kingdom, by the name of GREAT-BRITAIN; and that the ensigns-armorial of the said united kingdoms be such as her majesty shall appoint; and the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George be conjoined in such manner as her majesty shall think fit, and used in all flags, banners, standards, and ensigns, both by sea and land.

II. That the succession to the united monarchy of Great Britain shall be to the princess Sophia and her heirs; and that all papists, or persons that marry papists, shall be for ever excluded from inheriting the imperial crown of Great Britain, agreeable to the provision for the descent of the crown of England, made in the first year of the reign of their late majesties king William and queen Mary, entitled, "An act declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, &c."

III. That the united kingdoms of Great Britain shall be represented by one and the same parliament, to be stiled the parliament of GREAT-BRITAIN.

IV. That the subjects of the united kingdoms shall have freedom of trade and navigation to all places within the same, and plantations belonging to it; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges, and advantages, except where it is otherwise expressly agreed in these articles.

V. That all ships or vessels belonging to the Scots [at the time of ratifying the treaty of union of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland] shall be deemed British built, the owners making oath that [at the time of ratifying the treaty of union in the parliament of Scotland] the same did [in the whole or in part] belong to them.

VI. All parts of the united kingdom to be under the same regulations of trade, and liable to the same customs and duties [excepting and reserving the duties upon export and import of such particular commodities, from which any persons, the subjects of either kingdom, are especially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which after the union are to remain safe and entire to them in all respects as before the same; and that from and after the union, no Scots cattle carried into England shall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private accounts, than those duties to which the cattle of England are or shall be liable within the said kingdom: and seeing by the laws of England there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded are not expressed, that from and after the union, when oats shall be sold for fifteen shillings sterling per quarter, or under, there shall be paid two shillings and six-pence sterling for every quarter of the oatmeal exported, in the terms of the law, whereby, and so long as rewards are granted for the exportation of other grains; and that the beer of Scotland have the same rewards as barley: and in respect the importation of victual into Scotland would prove a discouragement to tillage; therefore, that the prohibition, as now in force by the law of Scotland, against importation of victual from Ireland, or any other place beyond sea, into Scotland, do after the union remain in the same force as now it is, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great Britain for the discouraging the importation of the said victual from beyond sea.]

VII. That all parts of the united kingdom be liable to the same excises upon all excisable liquors [excepting only that the thirty-four gallons English barrel of beer or ale, amounting to twelve gallons Scots present measure, sold in Scotland by the brewer at nine shillings and sixpence sterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailer's profit, at two-pence the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not after the union liable, on account of the present excise upon excisable liquors in England, to any higher imposition than two shillings sterling upon the aforesaid thirty-four gallons English barrel, being twelve gallons the present Scots measure.]

VIII. Foreign salt in England shall pay the same duty as in Scotland: [but in regard the duties of great quantities of foreign salt imported may be very heavy upon the merchants importers; that therefore all foreign salt imported into Scotland shall be cellared and locked up under the care of the merchant importer, and the officers employed for levying the duties upon salt: and that the merchant may have what quantities thereof his occasions may require, not under a weight of forty bushels at a time, upon his giving security for the duty of what quantities he receives payable in six months.] By this article it was also provided, that salt made in Scotland should be exempted for seven years from the English duty; but from the expiration of the said seven years, shall be subject to the same duties as salt made in England: [but Scotland shall, after the said seven years, remain exempted from the duty of two shillings and fourpence per bushel on home salt, imposed by an act made in England in the ninth and tenth of king William III. of England: and if the parliament of Great Britain shall, at or before the expiring of the said seven years, substitute any other fund in the place of the said two shillings and fourpence of excise upon the bushel of home salt, Scotland shall, after the said seven years, bear a proportion of the said fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this treaty.] No salt whatsoever shall be brought from Scotland to England by land in any manner, under certain penalties denounced: and for establishing an equality in trade it was provided [that all flesh exported from Scotland to England, and shipped in Scotland to be exported beyond sea; and provisions for ships in Scotland, and foreign voyages, may be salted with Scots salt, paying the same duty for what salt is so employed, as the like quantity of such salt pays in England, and under the same penalties, forfeitures, and provisions, for preventing of frauds, as are mentioned in the laws of England.] And that for the encouragement of the herring fishery [there shall be allowed and paid to the subjects inhabitants of Great Britain, during the present allowances for other fishes, ten shillings and fivepence sterling for every barrel of white herring that shall be exported from Scotland; and that they shall be allowed five shillings sterling for every barrel of beef or pork salted with foreign salt, without mixture of British or Irish salts, and exported to sale from Scotland to parts beyond sea, alterable by the parliament of Great Britain.]

IX. That whenever the sum of one million nine hundred and ninety-seven thousand seven hundred and sixty-three pounds eight shillings and fourpence halfpenny shall be enacted by the parliament of Great Britain on land, that part of the united kingdom now called Scotland shall be charged with the additional sum of forty-eight thousand pounds, as the quota of Scotland for such tax, and so proportionably for any greater or lesser sum raised in England on land; the said quota to be assessed in the same manner as the cess now is in Scotland, but subject to such regulations as shall be made in the parliament of Great Britain.

X. That Scotland shall not be charged with the stamp-duties now in force in England.

XI. Nor with the duties payable in England on windows.

XII. Nor those on coals and culm.

XIII. Scotland shall not pay the malt-duty during its continuance in England (which was to expire the twenty-fourth of June 1707.)

XIV. Scotland shall not be charged with any other duties imposed by the parliament of England before the union, except those consented to in this treaty; and if the parliament of England, in their provision for the service of the year 1707, shall impose any farther customs, Scotland shall have an equivalent for the share thereof they may be liable to; [and Scotland shall not be charged with any imposition on malt made or consumed in that kingdom during this war.]

XV. Stipulates, That whereas, by the terms of this treaty, the subjects of Scotland, for preserving an equality of trade throughout the united kingdom, will be liable to several customs and excises now payable in England, which will be applicable towards payment of the debts of England contracted before the union, it is agreed [That an equivalent shall be answered to Scotland for such part of the English debts as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reason of the union, other than such for which appropriations have been made by parliament in England, of the customs and other duties on exports and imports, excises on all excisable liquors, in respect of which debts equivalent are herein before provided]; which equivalent is herein stipulated to be three hundred ninety-eight thousand eighty-five pounds ten shillings sterling, to be granted by the parliament of England in the manner as in this article is particularly and at large explained. The distinction of this equivalent is in the same article applied, [1st, For indemnifying of private persons for any losses they may sustain by reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of England. 2dly, For indemnifying the sufferers in the late African and Indian company of Scotland. 3dly, For discharging the public debts of Scotland. 4thly, For improving the manufacture of the coarse wool of Scotland: and, 5thly, For encouraging and promoting the fisheries, and such other manufactures and improvements in Scotland as may most conduce to the general good of the united kingdom: for which end commissioners were to be appointed, &c.] It seems the Scots in general were so inflamed, by the destruction of their Darien or African company by the government of England, that nothing but the absolute assurance of an equivalent for reimbursing of their whole capital employed on that affair, with interest, being two hundred and thirty-two thousand one hundred and sixty-two pounds sixteen shillings and elevenpence halfpenny, could have prepared their minds for this union; and they even insisted on the insertion of this clause, [That if the said stock-capital and interest shall not be paid in twelve months after the commencement of the union, that then the said company may from thenceforward trade, or give licence to trade, until the said whole capital stock and interest shall be paid.]

XVI. That

XVI. That the coin be of the same standard throughout the united kingdom as now in England, and a mint to be continued in Scotland, under the same rule as the mint in England, [and the present officers of that mint be continued.]

XVII. That the same weights and measures be used throughout the united kingdom as are now used in England; and standards shall be kept in the burghs, agreeable to the standard of the English Exchequer.

XVIII. That the laws for the regulation of trade, custom, and such excises which Scotland is to be liable to, shall be the same as those in England. Other laws in Scotland to remain as before the union, but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain. Laws which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be the same throughout the united kingdom, [but no alteration shall be made in the laws which concern private right, except for evident utility of the subjects of Scotland.]

XIX. The court of session and other courts shall remain in Scotland the same as before the union, subject nevertheless to such regulations, for the better administration of public justice, as shall be made by the parliament of Great Britain; [and that hereafter none shall be named by her majesty and her royal successors to be ordinary lords of session, but such who have served in the college of justice as advocates or principal clerks of session for the space of five years, or as writers to the signet for the space of ten years; with this provision, that no writer to the signet be capable to be admitted a lord of the session, unless he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law, before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the said office two years before he be named to be a lord of the session, yet so as the qualification made or to be made, for capacitating persons to be named ordinary lords of the session, may be altered by the parliament of Great Britain.] This is a very long article, and specifies the several regulations to which these courts may be subjected, which are not sufficiently interesting to claim a place here.

XX. That all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life, be reserved for the owners thereof as rights of property, in the same manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, this treaty in any wise notwithstanding.

XXI. The rights and privileges of the royal boroughs in Scotland, as they now are, shall remain entire after the union, and notwithstanding thereof.

XXII. That by virtue of this treaty, sixteen of the peers of Scotland, at the time of the union, shall sit and vote in the house of lords, and forty-five of the members of the representatives of Scotland in the house of commons of the parliament of Great Britain, the choice whereof to be according to the act passed in Scotland for that purpose; [which act is hereby declared to be as valid as if it were a part of, and engrossed in this treaty:] and in case her majesty shall, on the first of May 1707, declare this present parliament to be the first parliament of Great Britain, the present parliament of England may be so on the part of England, and the sixteen peers and the forty-five commoners for Scotland to sit with them; such parliament to continue no longer than the English parliament is by law allowed to continue.

XXIII. That the aforesaid sixteen peers of Scotland, mentioned in the last preceding article, to sit in the house of lords of the parliament of Great Britain, shall have all the privileges of parliament which the peers of England now have, and which they or any peers of Great Britain shall have after the union, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trials of peers; and that all peers of Scotland, and their successors to their honours and dignities, shall, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and have rank and precedence next and immediately after the peers of the orders and degrees in England at the time of the union, and before all peers of Great Britain of the like orders and degrees who may be created after the union.

XXIV. That from and after the union there shall be one great-seal for the united kingdom of Great Britain, which shall be different from the great-seal now used in either kingdom; and that the quarter of the arms [and the rank of the precedence of Lyon king at arms of the kingdom of Scotland] as may best suit the union, be left to her majesty; and that in the privy-seal, signet, casket, &c. now used in Scotland, be continued; but that the said-seals be altered and adapted to the union, as her majesty shall think fit: [that the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and registers whatsoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are, within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; and that they shall so remain in all time coming, notwithstanding of the union.]

XXV. That all laws and statutes in either kingdom, so far as they are contrary to, or inconsistent with the terms of these articles, or any of them, shall, from and after the union, close and become void, and shall be so declared to be by the respective parliaments of the said kingdoms.

There was no provision made in this treaty with respect to religion; for in the acts of parliament of both kingdoms, which empowered the queen to name commissioners for treating of an union, there was an express restriction that they should not treat of those matters.

The above articles being agreed to, they were signed by the respective commissioners on the twenty-second day of July 1706; and the next day the lords commissioners waited on the queen at St. James's with them, when the lord-keeper Cowper, in the name of the English commissioners, made a speech, congratulating her majesty on the conclusion of a treaty which so happily united the different parts of this island under the same monarchy. The earl of Seafeld, lord-chancellor of Scotland, did the same on the part of the commissioners for that kingdom: to which her majesty was pleased to return the following gracious answer:

" My lords,

" I give you many thanks for the great pains you have taken in this treaty, and am very well pleased to find your endeavours and applications have have brought it to so good a conclusion: the particulars of it seem so reasonable, that I hope they will meet with approbation in the parliaments of both kingdoms. I wish therefore my servants of Scotland may lose no time in going down to propose it to my subjects of that kingdom; and I shall always look upon it as a particular happiness if this union (which will be so great a security and advantage to both kingdoms) can be accomplished in my reign."

From domestic affairs let us now direct our attention towards the field, in which respect this year may be justly stiled the year of wonders!

Lewis XIV. had determined to exert his utmost efforts in the course of this campaign; and indeed at the beginning of it his armies were very formidable: he hoped, that by the reduction of Turin and Barcelona, he should put an end to the war in Italy and Catalonia: he knew that his forces on the Rhine were superior to any body of troops the prince of Baden could assemble; and he resolved to reinforce his army in Flanders, so as to be in a condition to act offensively against the duke of Marlborough.

That general left England in the beginning of April, and repaired to the Hague, where, having concerted the operations of the campaign with the States, he took the field about a fortnight afterwards. The French, who made great advantages last war by early campaigns, had this spring formed a design to surprize the duke of Marlborough before the Danes and Prussians (whom he had engaged as auxiliaries last year) should join him; and thereupon the elector of Bavaria and marshal Villeroy passed the Dyle * in the beginning of May, and advanced directly towards the confederate army. The duke, who was seldom surprized for want of intelligence of the enemy's motions, being apprised of their design, dispatched an express to the Danish troops to join him, and they arrived, under the duke of Wirtemberg their commander, within a league of the confederates camp (which was between Borchloen and Groes Waren) on the twenty-second of May, when the duke, on reviewing his army, found it amounted to seventy-four battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty-three squadrons of horse and dragoons, provided with an hundred pieces of cannon, twenty howitzers, and forty-two pontoons. About the same time that the Danes arrived in the confederate army, that of the French was joined by marshal Marfin's horse; so that their number amounted to seventy-six battalions, and one hundred and thirty-two squadrons: confiding therefore in their superiority, they came out of their lines, and encamped between Tirlemont and Judoigne.

Marlborough on his part was no less eager for a battle, relying on the goodness and known bravery of his troops. Accordingly, having consulted with monsieur d'Auverquerque the Dutch general, it was resolved to advance towards the enemy; and on Sunday the twelfth of May, (being Whitsunday) about three in the morning, the confederate army marched in eight columns towards Ramillies, a village where the Gheete takes its source, in order to avoid the inconvenience of passing that river. Being advanced near the said village, the enemy were perceived getting into the strong camp of Mont St. André, and placing their right towards the Mehaigne. This river flows about half a league from Ramillies †, the ground between them being upon a level. The Gheete runs from Ramillies to Anderkirk, through a marshy ground; and beyond Anderkirk the river grows wide, and the ground is impassable. Their left extended to Anderkirk, while a good number of battalions were posted in Offuz and Ramillies near their center. This precaution, though it might be prudent in the enemy, was a strong indication that their courage was rather cooled. His grace judging, by the situation of the ground, that the streis of the action would be on our left, ordered that, besides the number of horse belonging to that wing, the Danish squadrons, being twenty in number, should also be posted there.

About two in the afternoon the allied army was drawn up in order of battle, with the right wing near Foltz, on the brook of Yause, and the left by the village of Franquennes, which the enemy had occupied. The action was begun on the left of our army by four battalions, which pushed a brigade of foot from their post on the Mehaigne. Monsieur Auverquerque about the same time charged the troops of the French household with the horse of that wing. The success was doubtful for about half an hour, which the duke of Marlborough perceiving, ordered the rest of the horse of the right wing, except the English, who were seventeen squadrons, to support those on the left. While the duke was in person rallying some of the broken squadrons, in order to renew the charge, he was in very great danger of being either killed or taken prisoner, by falling from his horse; but was succoured in time by a party of our horse that came to his assistance. Colonel Bringfield, in re-mounting him, had his head struck off by a cannon-ball. The duke then ordered lieutenant-general Schultz, with twelve battalions, twenty pieces of cannon, and some howitzers, to attack the village of Ramillies, which was strongly fortified with artillery. The attack was made with great vigour and resolution: the enemy was beat quite out of the village, and in endeavouring to make good their retreat, were most of them either killed or taken prisoners.

By this time the enemy's right wing of horse being entirely defeated, the Dutch and Danish horse of the left wing of the allied army fell upon the foot on their right, cut in pieces no less than d'Auverquerque over the elector of Bavaria and marshal Villeroy, which was followed by the reduction of almost all the Netherlands in two months time. It lies at the head of the Gheet, about a mile and a half north from the side of the Mehaigne, that interval being the narrow aperture where that glorious battle was fought. It is eleven miles north from Namur.

twenty battalions, and made themselves masters of their colours and cannon. The rest of the enemy's infantry began to retreat in tolerable order, under cover of the cavalry of their left wing, which formed themselves in three lines, between Offuz and Anderkirk; but the English horse having found means to cross a rivulet which divided them from the enemy, attacked them so quick, and with so much bravery, that they entirely abandoned their foot; and our dragoons pushing into the village of Anderkirk, made a terrible slaughter of them. The enemy now gave way on all sides: the elector of Bavaria and marshal Villeroy saved themselves with the utmost difficulty. Several waggons of the enemy's vanguard breaking down in a narrow pass, so obstructed the way, that the baggage and artillery could not proceed, nor could their troops defile in order. The victorious horse hearing of this accident, pressed on them so vigorously, that the French king's own regiment of foot called for quarter, and delivered up their arms and colours. The allies continued the pursuit till two o'clock the next morning, by the way of Judoigne, as far as Melden, five leagues from the place of battle, and two leagues distant from Louvain.

In fine, never was victory more complete: all the enemy's cannon, a very few pieces excepted, fell into the hands of the confederates, with most of their baggage, about one hundred and twenty colours, and several pairs of kettle-drums. The French in this action, if we reckon the slain, wounded, and deserters, whose numbers were very great, lost forty thousand men; near half their army. The persons of note among the prisoners were, messieurs Palavicini and Mezieres, major-generals; the marquis de Bar, brigadier-general of horse; the marquis de Nonant, brigadier-general of foot; the marquis de la Baume, son of the marshal de Tallard; monsieur de Montmorency, nephew to the late duke of Luxemburgh; and several others. Thus did the army of the confederates, in the space of little more than an hour, defeat an army of eighty thousand men, while their own loss did not amount to much more than two thousand: of persons of note, prince Lewis of Hesse and M. Bentinck were the only slain, and none taken prisoners.

After this signal discomfiture of the French army, which is by all military writers agreed to have been owing to the injudicious manner in which marshal Villeroy drew up his army, the allies met with no further interruption in their conquests. Louvain *, Mechlin †, Brussels ‡, Antwerp ||, Ghent §, and Bruges ¶, all surrendered to the victors within a fortnight, without waiting for a siege. Ostend  indeed made some shew of a defence, but capitulated, after having been invested ten days only. Menin ††, reckoned the most finished fortification in Europe, and supplied with a garrison of six thousand men, received the conquerors within their gates in eighteen days after opening the trenches. Dendermonde †† sustained a blockade of some weeks, which the duke of Marlborough afterwards ordered to be turned into a regular siege, which terminated in the garrison's surrendering themselves prisoners of war. Aeth ||| was next invested, and submitted on the same terms, after twenty days resistance.

The conquest of all those places was compleated by the middle of September. Marshal Villeroy,

The city is built in the form of a crescent on the river, which is here twenty-two feet deep, and four hundred yards in breadth; so that vessels of burden can come up to the quay; and canals are cut through the town from the river, which bring up small vessels to their very doors. in despair, did not dare to acquaint the king with the defeat he had sustained at Ramillies: he continued five days without dispatching a courier. At length he wrote a confirmation of this news, which had already filled the court of France with consternation. Lewis, however, affected to bear his misfortunes with calmness and composure; but the effect they had on his mind sensibly displayed itself in the altered state of his health. He immediately sent for the duke of Vendosme out of Italy, where he thought his presence not so necessary, to replace Villeroy, and repair, if possible, the disgrace that had befallen the arms of France; but that general having fixed himself in a strong camp that could not be forced, did not think fit to give the duke of Marlborough any disturbance while he lay with the confederate army covering the sieges. With that of Aeth the allies finished their glorious campaign in Flanders, and soon after the army broke up and went into winter-quarters. The duke of Marlborough returned to the Hague, and M. Auverquerque being appointed to command in chief in the Netherlands, took up his residence at Brussels, while the states of Flanders, having assembled at Ghent, formally recognized for their sovereign Charles II. *

I have already observed, that Lewis XIV. had entertained strong hopes of making himself master of Turin, the capital of the duke of Savoy's dominions, and almost the only town that prince had left. The French indeed had met with some success in the beginning of this year's campaign in Italy; having attacked the Imperialists at Calcinato, in the absence of prince Eugene, drove them from their posts, and obliged them to quit the territories of Bresciano, with the loss of three thousand men killed or taken prisoners, besides their cannon and baggage. Upon this success the French king ordered the duke de la Feuillade to invest Turin †. Prince Eugene was at too great a distance to come to its relief: he was on the other side of the Adige ‡; and a long chain of entrenchments that lined the river on this side, seemed to make a passage impracticable. Fifty-six squadrons and one hundred battalions formed the siege of this great city, who began to batter the town and citadel on the eighth day of June, and on the fifteenth the besiegers fired red-hot bullets, many of which fell near the duke's palace; whereupon his royal highness sent the two duchesses (his wife and mother) with the young prince and princesses, to some distance from the town, and marched out himself on the seventeenth, leaving a numerous garrison, under the command of count Thaurin, general of the emperor's forces. His royal highness took this step in order to amuse the duke de la Feuillade. The latter immediately quitted the direction of the siege to pursue the prince, who being better acquainted with the ground, baffled his pursuit. Thus la Feuillade missed the duke, and the business of the siege suffered by it. At length, finding the duke of Savoy was not to be surprized, the French general returned to the camp before Turin, leaving the duke of Aubeterre with forty squadrons and five battalions to attend the duke of Savoy's motions.

The duke of Vendosme had been posted on the banks of the Adige, from the thirteenth of May to the twentieth of June, to cover this siege, and thought himself certain, with seventy battalions and sixty squadrons, to stop all the passages against prince Eugene; but that prince shewed himself a greater general than his adversary: he crossed the Adige, and even the Po, a river larger, and in some places more difficult of passage than the Rhine; and before Vendosme left Italy to take upon him the command of marshal Villeroy's scattered forces in Flanders, he saw prince Eugene in a condition to advance to the relief of Turin.

Upon the recalling of Vendosme, Lewis XIV. sent his nephew the duke of Orleans to command his army in Italy, who found the troops in as much disorder as if they had suffered a defeat. Eugene had passed the Po in sight of Vendosme; he now crossed the Tanaro in view of the duke of Orleans, took Carpi, Corregio, and Reggio; stole a march upon the French, and joined the duke of Savoy with his whole army, near Asti §, on Sept. 1.

The city of Turin was at this time reduced to great distress, most of the powder being spent, and the enemy having made a lodgment on the counterscarpe, and carried several other parts of the works: they were indeed beaten out again by the garrison; but it was thought impossible that the besieged could resist many more attacks. His royal highness and prince Eugene therefore found themselves under a necessity of marching immediately to the relief of the place. Accordingly, they passed the Doria on September 6, and encamped with their right on the banks of that river before Pionessa, and with the left on the banks of the Stura. The next day the army moved by break of day towards the enemy, who were intrenched very deep, having the Stura on their right, the Doria on their left, and the convent of Capuchines of our Lady de la Campagna in their center, besides Lusingua, and several other fortified castles which flanked their intrenchments. Never was a march more bold than that which the allied army made on this occasion, having a continual fire to sustain from forty pieces of cannon which the enemy had pointed to gall them. The duke of Orleans perceiving the intrepidity with which the duke and the prince advanced towards him, proposed to quit the intrenchments, and march directly to the enemy. In this advice he was joined by almost all the general officers in the army; but marshal Marsin producing an order from the French king, which left every thing to his decision in case of an action; and giving it as his opinion to remain in the lines, the duke was forced to acquiesce.

When the army of the confederates came within half cannon-shot of the French lines, it drew up in order of battle, and began to fire the great guns: the whole army then moved in a moment; the infantry marched up with their muskets to the foot of the intrenchments, and prince Eugene putting himself at the head of the left wing, began the attack, which was directed with such amazing vigour and intrepidity, that in less than two hours he forced the enemy's entrenchments. The duke of Savoy did the like in the center and the right near Lusingua. By noon the allies were masters of the French camp, and the defeat of the enemy was become general. The duke of Orleans behaved with great gallantry and courage, and received several wounds in the action. Marshal de Marfin was taken prisoner, after having his thigh shattered by a cannon-ball, and died in a few hours after under the amputation. The French lost in the action, near seven thousand men killed, with three hundred officers and about eight thousand private men taken prisoners; two hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, one hundred and eight mortars, seven thousand eight hundred bombs, thirty-two thousand hand-granades, forty-eight thousand cannon-balls, four thousand chests of musket-balls, eighty-six thousand barrels of gun-powder, all their tents and baggage, five thousand beasts of burden, ten thousand horses belonging to thirteen regiments of dragoons, and the mules of the commissary-general, all fell into the hands of the victors: the latter of these were so richly laden, that this part of the booty alone was valued at three millions of livres, near one hundred and thirty thousand pounds of our money. The loss of the confederates did not amount to three thousand men, killed, wounded, or disabled, in the attack, besides about two thousand of the garrison of Turin, who had fallen during the course of the siege.

The duke of Savoy now entered his capital in triumph, while the duke of Orleans, finding it impossible to procure subsistence for the troops he had with him, retired into Dauphiny with the shattered remains of his army.

While these great things were transacting at Turin, the count of Medavi-Grancei, who was at that time in the Mantuan with a body of troops, defeated the Imperialists at Castiglione, under the command of the prince of Hesse-Cassel, and obliged him to retreat to Adigi, with the loss of two thousand men: but this, though a complete, proved a fruitless victory; for the duchy of Milan, Mantua, Piedmont, and lastly, the kingdom of Naples, were recovered from the French within a very short time of one another*.

The affairs of France were as unsuccessful in Spain as in Germany, Flanders, and Italy. In the beginning of April this year king Philip and the marshal de Tesse, the French general, at the head of a numerous army, undertook the siege of Barcelona, which was defended by his rival Charles in person: it was at the same time blocked up by sea by the count de Thoulouse with a powerful squadron. The inhabitants, encouraged by the presence of king Charles, defended the town with great bravery; nevertheless, the enemy's army being composed of veteran troops, carried on the siege very vigorously, and on the twenty-fourth made themselves masters of Montjuic, taking above four hundred of the garrison, and most of the officers, prisoners. Lord Donnegal was slain in the attack, after having cut down several of the enemy's grenadiers with his own hand. About the same time the earl of Peterborough arrived in the neighbourhood of the place from Valencia with two thousand men; and though he found it impossible to enter the city, yet he kept his post upon the hills with admirable courage and activity, and alarmed the besiegers with frequent skirmishes. Barcelona, however, was at length so hard pressed, that it was thought impossible to hold out many days longer, when, on the eighth of May, the drooping spirits of the garrison were revived by observing the enemy's fleet getting under sail in a great hurry, and several of their ships standing out to sea, which gave the besieged assurance that an English fleet was coming to their relief.

This was really the fact: the confederate fleet, commanded by sir George Byng, arrived from England, and joined the squadron under sir John Leake on the first of May, in the bay of Altea, and were soon after farther reinforced by commodore Walker with several men of war; so that the fleet consisted of thirty-seven English, and thirteen Dutch ships; in all, fifty of the line of battle, besides eight frigates, fire-ships, &c. The seventh the fleet came off Tarragona, when the earl of Peterborough joined them with several barks, on board of which were fourteen hundred land forces. His excellency went on board the prince George, and hoisted the union flag at the main-top-mast head†. The eighth, in the morning, they came off Cape Montjoy. The French admiral, upon news of the approach of the confederate fleet, had retired the night before; and taking advantage of a fair wind, made the best of his way to Toulon. In the afternoon the confederate fleet anchored in the bay of Barcelona, to the inexpressible joy of the inhabitants of that place. The enemy however still made a shew of keeping up the siege; but on the twelfth of May, in the morning, king Philip marched off in a manner little expected, and in so great disorder, that he left all his tents behind him, together with his sick and wounded, whom the marshal de Tesse, by a letter, recommended to the earl of Peterborough's clemency, who behaved with the utmost tenderness and indulgence towards them. King Philip made all the haste he could to Perpignan, but his army was almost entirely ruined before he got thither‡.

† The earl of Peterborough was admiral of the fleet, as well as general of the land forces.

‡ There happened a total eclipse of the sun in those parts that morning the French raised the siege: this was looked upon as very ominous by the lower kind of people; and marshal Tesse was much blamed even by his superiors, for not having raised the siege a day sooner, and the rather as the French king had made the sun, with this motto, Nec pluribus impar, his device. History of Europe. Burnet. Naval Hist. &c.

To these disasters was added yet another, which seemed to give the finishing stroke to the hopes of the Bourbon family. The earl of Galway, who commanded the forces in Portugal, took almost every place he presented himself before; and had advanced even into the province of Estremadura; while the duke of Berwick, who headed the troops of France and Spain, in vain attempted to stop his progress: he now penetrated as far as the bridge of Almaraz. Philip V. uncertain of his fate, was in Perpignan: the court of Spain was filled with consternation, not in the least doubting but the victorious allies would immediately march to Madrid; but the oversight of the latter preserved the crown on Philip's head: the Portuguese, considering only their own safety, refused to proceed any farther till they should hear of the fate of Barcelona. In the interim, Philip's queen (a daughter of the duke of Savoy) who had gained the affections of the Spaniards by the pains she took to please them, and by an intrepidity and fortitude above her sex, summoned the grandes and magistrates of Madrid to attend her, when she made the following speech:

"I have sent for you, to acquaint you what distress the state is in; I cannot conceal it from you: while the king is exposing his life in your defence, heaven blesses his arms in Catalonia, and we hope that rebellious province will shortly be reduced; but affairs do not go so well in Estremadura: the Portuguese advance. Will you tamely see such enemies approach you? do you not think of exerting your utmost efforts to make them repent their audaciousness? The preservation of the monarchy is now the point in question. You ought, in this pressing necessity, to shew your loyalty and zeal, by sacrificing your all for the king, for me, and for yourselves. Powerful and speedy succours are necessary. I am the first queen who has appeared in this place on such an occasion. When I give you such extraordinary marks of my affection, I well deserve you should do something for me, and appear in my defence."

This pathetic discourse, however, produced very little effect: the Spaniards appeared struck with a panic that took from them all power of deliberating on the most proper means for opposing the victors, who proceeded in their march to Madrid. Philip hereupon posted through France, and arrived in that city on the sixth of June; but finding that most of the grandes were fled, and having no army he could trust to; and seeing moreover that the Portuguese and English were almost at the gates, he sent his queen to Burgos*, whither he followed her in a few days, having withdrawn the court and all the tribunals before the earl of Galway could reach the place; so that upon his arrival, about the latter end of June, he found Madrid an open village. But the troops having been extremely weakened by so long a march, and not being above four thousand horse, and eight or ten thousand foot, the Portuguese generals and those of the allies thought it highly necessary that

Charles should come to Madrid as soon as possible: for besides the advantage his presence might have been to his own affairs among the Spaniards, who retained all the pride, though they wanted the courage, of their ancestors, and thought it beneath them to make their submission to any but king Charles himself; it was of the last importance to the allies to be immediately joined by the forces under the king and the earl of Peterborough's command, not being strong enough without them to attack Philip, who had already received some succours from France, besides five thousand four hundred horse, and eight thousand foot, under the duke of Berwick and the Conde de las Torres. Express after express was sent to king Charles to hasten his march to his capital city, where the earl of Galway had caused him to be proclaimed on the twenty-eighth of June; but the province of Arragon declaring for Charles at the same time, he marched into Saragossa, where he unhappily spent so much time, that his rival Philip assembled an army superior to that of the allies, and marched to give the earl of Galway battle, who, conscious of his own inferiority, chose to quit Madrid and retire; so that Philip V. in less than six weeks after leaving Madrid like a fugitive, entered it again in triumph. The consequence of this turn of affairs was, that Toledo, Salamanca, and the rest of the towns in Castile which had declared for the house of Austria, submitted again to the yoke of the French.

At length, when it was too late, Charles joined the earl of Galway and the marquis das Minas, at Guadalaxara, in the beginning of August, with a small body of troops, and was followed by the earl of Peterborough at the head of five hundred dragoons. By this junction the army of the allies became nearly equal in number to that of the enemy, and the event of a battle might have been finally decisive; but as both sides expected to be reinforced, neither side would put any thing to the hazard. So soon as the armies were joined, the earl of Galway waited upon lord Peterborough, offering him the command of the English, and to serve under him till he could have the queen's leave to return home (for which he had applied); but the marquis das Minas refusing to do the like, the earl of Peterborough, who aspired to the chief command, chose not to stay with the army; and embarking in disgust on board an English ship, set sail for Genoa†.

The confederates had formed a design this year of making a descent upon the coast of France by way of diversion; and accordingly about eleven thousand men were embarked, under the command of the earl of Rivers, with a large train of artillery; and the combined fleet, consisting of one hundred and fifty sail, commanded by sir Cloudesley Shovel, set sail from Plymouth on the 30th of August. The scheme for invading France had been proposed by the marquis de Guiscard, who from a motive of disgust had abandoned his country, and engaged in the service of the allies. He obtained the rank of a lieutenant-general in the emperor's army, and afterwards coming over to London, insinuated himself into the good graces of Mr. Henry St. John, and other persons of distinction. His scheme of invading France was approved of by the ministry, and he was, by way of reward, promoted to the command of a regiment of dragoons, with which he embarked in the expedition. However, the fleet being driven into Torbay by contrary winds, where it was detained for a considerable time; in the interim a discovery was made that Guiscard's plan was altogether romantic, or at least built upon such a precarious basis as could not justify the attempting its execution; and letters having arrived from the earl of Galway, soliciting succours with the most earnest importunity, the expedition to France was postponed; and sir Cloudesley Shovel and the earl of Rivers, with the land forces on board, were ordered to make the best of their way to Lisbon, there to take such measures as the situation of affairs should indicate to be most expedient.

They arrived safe in the Tagus, on the 18th of October, when lord Rivers, finding the communication between Portugal and the allies was cut off, sailed round to Alicant in order to join the earl of Galway on that side; and having landed his troops, who were in a miserable condition by being kept so long on board, he returned to England, together with the earl of Essex and brigadier Gorges, who embarked with those troops in the first design, and sir Cloudesley sailed back with the fleet to Lisbon *.

As to that part of the English fleet which had relieved Barcelona, under the command of sir John Leake and sir George Byng, it continued all the summer in the Mediterranean, and cooped up the French navy in the harbour of Toulon. They secured Carthage, which had declared for king Charles, and took Alicant by assault. Sir John Leake next made the necessary disposition for a winter squadron, to be commanded by sir George Byng, and then proceeded to put in execution his last orders, which were to reduce the islands of Majorca † and Ivica ‡; both which surrendered, after little or no resistance; and the admiral having caused king Charles III. to be proclaimed in each, and left garrisons to secure his conquests, he sailed out of the Straights in the beginning of October, when he dispatched a squadron under sir John Jennings to the West Indies, and another under sir George Byng to lie at Lisbon: then prosecuting his voyage for England, he arrived safe at Spithead about the middle of the same month, with the rest of the fleet, which was soon after laid up for the winter season §.

Poland was this year delivered from the presence of that hot-headed conqueror the king of Sweden, who, observing that he should never be able effectually to dethrone king Augustus, unless he cut off the supplies which that monarch constantly received from Saxony, he marched through Silesia and Lusatia into Saxony, plundered the open country through its whole extent, and obliged the rich city of Leipsick, and other towns, to pay him contributions. King Augustus seeing his hereditary dominions in the hands of his enemy, soon found he could no longer maintain the war in Poland, and therefore agreed to a treaty in the month of September, by which he resigned the kingdom of Poland and the grand duchy of Lithuania, and acknowledged Stanislaus Leczinski as the true and rightful king of Poland, reserving to himself only the empty title of sovereign.

Charles of Sweden in the heart of Germany, was, however, an object of great discontent to the members of the grand alliance. Lewis XIV. who was redoubling all his efforts to retrieve his shattered affairs, spared no pains to solicit the young victor's alliance. Charles however rejected all offers of that nature. Lewis then implored his mediation for a peace: he replied, That he was very ready to interpose his good offices, whenever he should find the allies willing to accept the same. Baffled in this application, the French king had recourse to a method for bringing about a treaty, which could not but be very mortifying to one who aimed at universal monarchy. He employed the elector of Bavaria to write letters in his name to the duke of Marlborough and the deputies of the States-general (dated the twenty-first of October, soon after the battle of Ramillies) containing proposals for opening a congress. He likewise solicited the pope to interpose in his favour: he offered to cede to king Charles the greater part of the estates that compose the Spanish monarchy, or else the West Indies, or Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with a barrier for the Dutch, and a compensation to the duke of Savoy for the devastation committed in his territories. But these offers were rejected, and the allies resolved to prosecute the war with redoubled vigour.

It is not easy to assign a reason why the confederates would not listen at this time to the proposals of peace, since there is great room to believe that Lewis XIV. would have consented to almost any that could have been demanded. Their refusal was said to be owing to the great influence of the duke of Marlborough, both at home, and with the emperor and the Dutch. The war proved at once too honourable and too lucrative for him to desire so speedy an end to it. Most of the leading † Majorca, or Mallorca, is an island in the Mediterranean, belonging to Spain, and the principal of those anciently called Balears, or Insulæ Balearicæ, famous for their sponges, sixty miles in length, and forty five broad. Its four principal capes lying toward the four cardinal points, are Pedra, Grosier, Salinas, and Formentor. Its north and west parts are mountainous, but fruitful; and those to the east and south are level, producing corn, oil, wine, honey, saffron, great and small cattle, with fruit and wild game. The whole island is surrounded with towers, from which an enemy can be seen at some distance off. It has several good harbours, lies eighty-six miles south of the coast of Catalonia. Its capital is also named Majorca, anciently Palma, which contains six thousand houses, some of them large, and of stone; and the number of its inhabitants is reckoned at ten thousand.

‡ Ivica, anciently Ebusus, is a small island in the Mediterranean, fifty-six miles south-west of Majorca. It is about six miles long, and five broad, is mountainous, and its principal production is salt, of which large quantities are exported. Its capital has the same name, and is situated in a bay of the sea, on the south side of the island, very well fortified in the modern manner; but not so considerable now as it was in the time of the Carthaginians and Romans.

men here in England were his friends and relations, and had gained titles and estates by the war. In Holland the pensionary Heinsius, who did all things there, was entirely under the direction of the duke and prince Eugene. As for the emperor, he had all things to hope from the continuance of the war, and nothing either to fear or pay. Whatever degree of truth might be in those suggestions, it is certain they gained credit both at home and abroad, and occasioned some disturbances in Holland, and greater here *.

I shall close my account of the military transactions of this year with observing, that little or nothing was done upon the Rhine, both sides having drawn what troops they could from that quarter. Moreover, prince Lewis of Baden, from a very bad state of health, was incapable of action: he died on the fourth of January in the following year, with the character of a great general, though his reputation in the latter part of his life was by no means equal to the beginning, at least in success.

While almost every kingdom in Europe was a scene of war, rapine, and bloodshed, England and Scotland were engaged in treating of a union between the two kingdoms. I have already given the substance of this treaty as settled by the commissioners on each side in England; let us now see how the articles were received by our neighbours in the northern part of the island, by whom they were first taken into consideration.

The Scottish parliament met on the third of October, when the duke of Queensberry, as high-commissioner, produced the queen's letter, in which she acquainted them of the commissioners appointed to treat of an union having brought that business to a happy conclusion, expressing her hopes that the terms would prove acceptable to her subjects of Scotland. An entire and perfect union, she said, would be the solid foundation of a lasting peace; it would secure their religion, liberties, and property; remove the animosities that prevailed among themselves, and the jealousies that subsisted between the two nations: she expatiated on the other manifold advantages that would result therefrom: she renewed her assurance of maintaining the government of the church, and told them they had an opportunity of taking such steps as might be necessary for its security after the union: she desired the necessary supplies till the parliament of Great Britain could provide for those matters: she observed, that the great success with which it had pleased Almighty God to bless her arms, afforded the nearer prospect of a happy peace, with which they would enjoy the full advantages of this union: that they had no reason to doubt but the parliament of England would do all that should be necessary on their part to confirm the union; and she recommended calmness and unanimity in deliberating on this great and weighty affair, of such consequence to the whole island of Great Britain †.

The lord-commissioner and the lord-chancellor (the earl of Seafield) each of them enforced this letter in a separate speech, wherein they exerted all their talents in displaying the great advantages arising from the union of the two kingdoms: the treaty itself was then read, and ordered to be printed, with the proceedings of the lords commissioners of both kingdoms in relation thereto; after which the parliament was adjourned for a week.

No sooner were the particulars of the intended treaty between the two kingdoms divulged, than the greatest part of the Scottish nation kindled into a flame of resentment, and gave such intimations of a violent opposition, as convinced the queen's ministers that they would have unspeakable difficulties to encounter in bringing about an union; against which a powerful party was now formed, even in the parliament itself, headed by the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, the marquis of Annandale, the earls of Errol, Mareschal, and Buchan, the lord Belhaven, that staunch republican Mr. Fletcher of Saltoun, and some other noblemen and private gentlemen of great rank and influence. The Jacobites to a man declared against an union, well knowing that, should it take place, it would for ever extinguish all their hopes of restoring the abdicated family: even the presbyterians seemed averse to the measure, from an apprehension that their mode of worship would suffer a change, and be swallowed up in the church of England. On the other hand, a great part of the gentry of Scotland, who were personally acquainted with the constitution of the English government, and sensible of the protection every good subject there enjoys under an house of commons, which secures them the uninterrupted enjoyment of all their lawful rights and privileges, heartily concurred in furthering the completion of this work. This party was headed by the dukes of Queensberry and Argyle, the earl of Montrose, Seafield, and Stair, and many other persons of weight and abilities. Besides these two parties, there was a third class, which I have already made mention of by the name Squadron Volante, or Flying Squadron; the chief of which were, the marquis of Tweeddale, the earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, Haddington, and Marchmont, who kept aloof, disclaiming all connection with both parties, and refusing to discover any part of their sentiments in regard to this important affair; but as it was well known that they had many causes to be disgusted with the court, it was universally thought they would oppose any scheme which proceeded from that quarter.

Such was the disposition of minds and parties in Scotland, when the parliament resumed its session on the fifteenth of October, when the question being put, Whether to proceed immediately to the consideration of the articles of union, or refer the consideration thereof till the first sitting of the ensuing week? it was carried to proceed, one hundred and sixteen voices against fifty-two. Here the strength of the court party appeared; and indeed both sides exerted themselves with the utmost zeal in order to carry their favourite points; and the debates were agitated with all that warmth and eagerness which the importance of the subject naturally inspired.

† Lockhart. Burnet.

It was asserted by the opposers of an union, that the devolving the power of the Scottish parliament into the hands of a small number of lords, barons, and burgeses, allowed to sit and vote with all the lords and commons of England, in a parliament to be called The Parliament of Great Britain, was dishonourable and prejudicial to the kingdom of Scotland, tending to the destruction of their ancient constitution, and all their rights and privileges as a free people in general, and to every individual person and society within the kingdom: that they should entirely lose their sovereignty and independency, and give up the birth-right of their peers, and the privileges of the barons and burghs: that the rights and interests reserved to them by the articles of union were not in any degree secured, seeing that the plurality of voices in the parliament of Great Britain must determine whatever was brought before them; nor could it be expected that the members of Scotland in the British parliament would ever be able to carry any point that might be for the interest of Scotland, against so great a majority, who, though divided among themselves about party-disputes, would yet unite against the Scots, to whom they all bore a natural antipathy: that the being let into the trade of England would be of little or no advantage to them, under the regulations and restrictions the English trade was at present in the several companies. The presbyterian kirk was also represented to be in great danger, from the twenty-six bishops who were to sit in the British parliament, whereas the kirk would have none to represent them. Great objections were also made to the sacramental test, being the condition of access to all places of profit or trust. And it was represented as a farther grievance, that the sovereign was obliged to be of the communion of the church of England*.

In answer to these objections it was urged, that the small proportion which the Scottish would bear to the English members, could never be attended with those dreadful consequences which had been so artfully displayed: few points, if any, could occur, in which the interests of Scotland would interfere with those of England: their interests were already in a great measure the same; it was a principal intention of the union to render them invariably and for ever such; nor would ever any set of men go about to divide them, but those who had some sinister ends to answer, or who preferred their own private interests to those of their country; and if such persons suffered by the decisions of a British parliament, they had no reason to complain; they would have suffered, or at least they ought to have suffered, by the decisions of a Scottish parliament, as that kingdom was bound even more than Great Britain to punish the perfidy, treachery, or injustice of her own subjects: that to assert the English had a natural antipathy to the Scots was a cruel and invidious reflection, contrary to truth, refuted by daily experience, and could only be made with a view to excite animosities between the two nations, in order perhaps to attain some end which could not otherwise be accomplished: that the union, instead of abolishing the parliament of Scotland, would rather establish it upon a more solid foundation, by incorporating it with the parliament of England, which could not with any propriety be said to be substituted in its place, the British parliament being substituted in the place of both; and in this sense indeed the parliament of England, as well as that of Scotland, might be said to be abolished; that their fears therefore, with regard to the conduct of the British parliament, were entirely groundless, as it was not likely that assembly would ever take any step prejudicial to the rights and privileges of the people, which they had hitherto defended, nor infringe the articles of the union, which they would make it their care regularly to observe: that the union besides would be attended with many possible advantages; it would for ever destroy all difference of interest between the different parts of the island, which in the contest had always proved fatal to the Scots from the great superiority of the English, &c. &c. †.

These and many other arguments were used by both sides; but they had no farther effect than to display the learning or ingenuity of the speakers, each party having already formed its resolution; and as they were in point of strength nearly equal, it was not easy to determine for some time what would be the issue, when the Squadron Volante, already mentioned, suddenly declared themselves for the union, which immediately turned the balance, and decided the controversy.

The opposers of the union finding themselves thus overpowered, raised a most terrible clamour all over the nation; they procured addresses from a number of counties, boroughs, and parishes, protesting against the union. The assembly of the kirk also petitioned against the making the security of the church of England a fundamental article of the union; for hereby, they said, they would involve the whole nation in great guilt, by consenting to the establishment of the hierarchy and ceremonies of a church which they held to be sinful and abominable. The presbyterian preachers at the same time employed all their power and credit in waking the resentment of their hearers against the treaty, in which they laboured with such success, that the people were roused to transports of fury and revenge. At Dumfries the articles of union were publicly burnt; and the people declared that their commissioners must either be simple, ignorant, or treacherous, or all together; and that the ratification of the treaty would bring them and their posterity to be tributary and bond-slaves to their neighbours. Even in Edinburgh the mob grew mutinous, and assaulted the house of sir Patrick Johnston, provost of Edinburgh, and one of the commissioners of the union: nor did the person of the high-commissioner escape insult, the rabble throwing stones into the coach as he passed through the streets, though surrounded by his guards; and on the thirtieth of November a great number of the rioters entered the parliament-house, with loud outcries for rejecting the articles of union, which gave the ministry such apprehension, that it was thought convenient to march several regiments of horse and dragoons to the north of England, to be in readiness if there should be a necessity for their acting. The tumults nevertheless continuing, the duke of Queensberry wrote to the lord-treasurer Godolphin, representing the necessity of a short adjournment until he should be able to allay the ferment that prevailed among the people: but the treasurer, who foresaw that the measure would be entirely lost by delay, regardless of the difficulties the commissioner had to encounter, insisted upon his proceeding; and besides the precautions used to preserve the public tranquillity, and protect the friends of the court from the insults of the malecontents, it was thought proper to remit considerable sums of money to the Scots treasury, to be distributed to the best advantage. Those measures, together with the equal prudence and firmness shewn by the high-commissioner, and the other noblemen attached to the union, at length got the better of this national fury; and notwithstanding all the clamour and opposition within and without doors, an act for the ratification of the union passed on the sixteenth of January, 1707, by a majority of one hundred and ten voices, and was touched with the royal sceptre. An act passed at the same time for the security of the presbyterian kirk of Scotland, as a fundamental and essential condition of the union*.

The most considerable speakers for the union were the earls of Seafield, Stair†, Roxburgh, and Marchmont; and those against it, the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, and the marquis of Annandale.

As soon as the act for ratifying the treaty of union was passed, the parliament next proceeded to prepare an act for settling the manner of electing the sixteen peers and forty-five commons to represent Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain, and the proportion the shires and boroughs should have of the forty-five members; and it was agreed that thirty should be the number for the shires, and fifteen the number for the boroughs.

It was resolved that the borough of Edinburgh should have one representative by itself; and then a scheme for dividing the boroughs into fifteen districts, each of which was to have one representative, was read and approved. This act being touched with the sceptre, the three estates proceeded to elect their representatives‡.

The remaining part of the session was employed in making regulations concerning the coin, in examining the accounts of their African company, and providing for the due application of the equivalent. On the twenty-fifth day of March the commissioner adjourned the parliament, after having in a short speech taken notice of the honour they had acquired in concluding an affair of such importance to their country. His grace then set out for London, where he was received by the queen with great marks of pleasure and approbation; and indeed history hardly furnishes us with another instance of a ministry's having carried a point of such importance, against such a violent opposition, and contrary to the general sense and inclination of a whole people, exasperated to the highest degree by the apprehension of seeing their trade destroyed, their nation oppressed, and their country ruined by an union with their sister kingdom. The majority of both nations expected no otherwise than that the treaty would occasion the most violent convulsions, and at last prove ineffectual. The event, however, has happily demonstrated the fallacy of those apprehensions and predictions: the union took place quietly, and has fully answered the salutary purposes for which it was intended. After this account of the reception the treaty of union met with in Scotland, it remains to see what entertainment it found in the parliament of England.

The parliament of England, which had been successively prorogued to the third of December, assembled that day; and the queen, in her speech to both houses, congratulated them on the glorious success of the British army: she desired the commons would grant such supplies as might enable her to improve those successes: she told them that the treaty of union, as concluded by the commissioners of both kingdoms, was at that time under the consideration of the Scottish parliament; and she recommended dispatch in public affairs, as the surest method to convince our friends and enemies of the vigour and firmness of our proceedings.

This speech was highly pleasing to the parliament, and both houses answered it in very affectionate addresses: nor did they stop there; but as a convincing proof of the sincerity of their expressions, they proceeded to the consideration of the supply; and having examined the estimates, in less than a week they voted near six millions for the service of the ensuing year*; and when the speaker presented the money-bills to her majesty, he told her, that as the glorious victory obtained by the duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was fought before it could be supposed the armies were in the field, so the commons had granted supplies to her majesty before the enemy could well know that the parliament was sitting†.

Both houses voted the duke of Marlborough their thanks for the eminent services he had done her majesty and the kingdom the last campaign: nor did they content themselves with paying him this compliment; for the lords addressed her majesty on the sixteenth of December, that she would permit them to bring in a bill to settle the titles and honours of the duke of Marlborough, with his right of precedence, on his posterity, by act of parliament, in such manner as would be acceptable to her majesty‡. This was readily complied with on the part of her majesty; and an act accordingly passed to limit his titles and honours to his eldest daughter (married to the lord Godolphin's son) and her heirs-male, and then to all his other daughters successively, according to their priority of birth; and that the royal honour and manor of Woodstock, and the house of Blenheim, should always go along with the titles. The commons also soon after, to shew their gratitude to the duke for the signal services he had done his country, addressed her majesty for leave to bring in a bill for settling the five thousand pounds per annum which she had already granted the duke (during her life) out of the Post-office, upon him and his posterity, in like manner as his titles; and the honour and manor of Woodstock, and house of Blenheim, were already limited and settled, and a bill was brought in accordingly, which received the royal assent.

The city of London having addressed her majesty, that the colours taken at the battle of Ramillies might be put up at Guildhall, they were carried thither in great pomp, escorted by a detachment of the horse and foot guards, being in all sixty-three colours and twenty-four standards. The same day his grace the duke of Marlborough, with the dukes of Ormond and Somerset, and other great officers and ministers of state, went to an entertainment provided for them at Vintner's-Hall in the city, by the lord mayor and aldermen.

The lords and commons having adjourned themselves to the last day of December, the queen closed the year 1706 with triumphal processions, going in great state to St. Paul's, attended by the great officers, and both houses of parliament.

Her majesty was pleased in this month of December to make the following promotions of nobility, viz. Henry de Grey, earl of Kent, created viscount Gooderich, earl of Harold, and marquis of Kent; Robert Bertie, earl of Lindsey, was created marquis of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln; Evelin Pierpoint, earl of Kingston, marquis of Doncaster, in the county of Dorset; Thomas Wharton, lord Wharton, viscount Winchindon, in the county of Bucks, and earl of Wharton in the county of Westmoreland; John Poulet, lord Poulet, of Hinton St. George, viscount Hinton St. George, in the county of Somerset, and earl of Poulet; Sidney Godolphin, lord Godolphin, viscount Rialton, and earl of Godolphin, in the county of Cornwall; Hugh Cholmondley, lord Cholmondley, viscount Malpas, and earl of Cholmondley, in the county of Chester; Henry Howard, lord Walden, son and heir of the earl of Suffolk, baron of Chesterford, in the county of Essex, and earl of Bindon in the county of Dorset. The lord-keeper Cowper was created lord Cowper and baron of Wingham, in the county of Kent; and sir Thomas Pelham was made lord Pelham, and baron of Laughton, in the county of Sussex. Some time before, her majesty had been pleased to create the electoral prince of Hanover (afterwards king George I.) a peer of this kingdom, by the stile and title of baron of Tewksbury, viscount Northallerton, earl of Milford-Haven, and marquis and duke of Cambridge.

The parliament being re-assembled after their short adjournment, the queen came to the house of peers on the twenty-eighth day of January, 1707, when she told the parliament that the treaty of union, with some additions and alterations, was ratified by the Scottish parliament: that she had ordered it to be laid before them, and hoped it would meet with their approbation and concurrence: she desired the commons would provide for the payment of the equivalent, in case the treaty should take place: then addressing herself to both houses, she concluded thus:

"You have now an opportunity before you of putting the last hand to a happy union of the two kingdoms, which I hope will be a lasting blessing to the whole island, a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm security to the protestant religion.

"The advantages that will accrue to us all from an union are so apparent, that I will add no more, but that I shall look upon it as a particular happi-

* To raise this money the parliament gave a land-tax of four shillings in the pound, and the duty upon malt for one year; duties upon low wines, the stamp-duty, and that upon hawkers, which had been continued till 1710, were now continued for ninety-six years, to be a fund for one million one hundred and fifty-five thousand pounds, to be taken in for annuities at sixteen years purchase; the duty upon houses was continued for circulating Exchequer-bills, whereby one million five hundred thousand pounds were raised. The old tonnage and poundage, and several other duties at the custom-house, which were already continued to 1710, for paying off deficiencies, were now continued for two years more, for a loan of eight hundred and twenty-two thousand three hundred and eighty-one pounds, at six per cent. interest.

On the third of February the commons formed themselves into a committee of the whole house, to deliberate on the articles of the union, and the Scottish act of ratification. The Tory party in general were against the union, and therefore began without delay to open their batteries. Amongst many severe things said against this treaty and the promoters of it, sir John Packington observed, that this incorporating union was like marrying a woman against her consent: that it was an union carried on by corruption within doors, by force and violence without: that the promoters of it had basely betrayed their trust, in giving up the independency of their constitution; and he would leave it to the judgment of the house to consider, whether men of such principles were fit to be admitted into their house of representatives. Her majesty, he said, by the coronation-oath, was obliged to maintain the church of England, as by law established; and likewise bound by the same oath to defend the presbyterian kirk of Scotland in one and the same kingdom: Now (added he) after the union is in force, who shall administer this oath to her majesty? Not the Scots, certainly; for it is not their business: and besides, they are no well-wishers to the church of England. It rests then with the bishops; and can it be supposed that those reverend persons will or can act a thing so contrary to their own order and institution, as thus to promote the establishment of the presbyterian church government? He concluded with observing, that the church of England being established jure divino, and the Scots pretending that the kirk was also jure divino, he could not conceive how two nations that clashed in so essential a point, could unite; and therefore was for consulting the convocation on this critical matter.

He was answered by colonel Henry Mordaunt, (brother to the earl of Peterborough) who said, that for his part, he knew of no other jure divino than God Almighty's permission: that in this sense the church of England and the kirk of Scotland might both be said to be jure divino, because God had permitted that the former should prevail in England, the other in Scotland. The member who spoke last (said the colonel) may, if he pleases, consult the convocation for his own particular information; but I believe the commons stand in need of no such instruction: they are sufficient judges of the propriety of their own measures; and in any event it would be derogatory to the rights of the commons of England to ask on this occasion the advice of any inferior assembly, who had no share in the legislature*.

Many other members spoke for and against the union: at length a motion was made, that the first article of the treaty, which implies a peremptory agreement to an incorporating union, should be postponed, and that the house should proceed to the consideration of the terms of the intended union contained in the other articles. This proposal being rejected, several Tory members quitted the house; whereupon the first, second, third, and fourth articles of the treaty were read and approved without opposition; and on the eighth of February the commons, in a committee of the whole house, went through and approved the remaining articles: in short, such was the dispatch made by the party who favoured the union, and who had the majority in the house, that by the eleventh of February, a bare week only from the time this important matter was first taken into their consideration, the commons had gone through and approved the whole treaty. This precipitation gave the enemies of the party in power too plausible an handle to charge them with want of that coolness and deliberation which an affair of this importance required.

Before their lordships began to investigate the articles of the union, they, at the instance of the archbishop of Canterbury, brought in a bill for the security of the church of England, to be inserted as a fundamental and essential part of that treaty. This passed through both houses without opposition, and received the royal assent. On the fifteenth of February the debates concerning the union were begun in the house of lords. The queen herself was present, and the debates were longer and more solemn than those of the commons had been. The lords resolved themselves into a committee of the whole house, and made Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, their chairman. The earls of Rochester, Anglesey, and Nottingham, with the bishop of Bath and Wells, and the lords North and Grey, Stawel and Haversham, were the principal speakers against the union. The latter of these noblemen, who of late years had made himself famous by his set speeches on several occasions, could not be silent on this, and therefore spoke to the following purport. He observed, that the articles came to their lordships with the greatest countenance of authority that it is possible any thing could have; but, said he, notwithstanding authority may be the strongest motive to incline the will, it was certainly the weakest in the world to convince the understanding. He was not, he said, against a federal union, a union in interest and in the succession; but this was a matter of a different nature: the question, he said, was, Whether two nations, independent in their sovereignties, that have their distinct laws and interests, and, which is not to be forgotten, their different forms of worship, church-government, and order, shall be united into one kingdom? That in his opinion, this was an union composed of so many mismatched pieces, of such jarring, incongruous ingredients, that he feared it would require a standing force to keep us from falling asunder and breaking to pieces every moment. He farther observed, that by this act, an hundred Scots peers, and as many commons, were excluded the British parliament; gentlemen who as little thought of being excluded a year or two before as any of their lordships did then: that their rights were as well and as strongly secured to them as their lordships were at that time, by the fundamental laws of their kingdom, by the claim of right, and by act of parliament, whereby it was made high-treason to make any alteration in the constitution of the kingdom. He said, that if the bishops would weaken their own cause, so far as to give up the two great points of episcopal ordination and confirmation; if they would approve and ratify the act for securing the presbyterian church-government in Scotland "as the true protestant religion and purity of worship," (according to the words in the Scottish act) they gave up that which had been contended for between them and the presbyterians many years, and been defended by the greatest and most learned men of the church of England. He disapproved of exempting articles, reserving to the present possessors the heritable offices and superiorities; both which, he said, Cromwell had been so wise as by an act of state to abolish. He said that the union was contrary to the general sense of the Scottish nation, sufficiently manifested by the murmurs of all ranks of people in that kingdom, while the treaty was under consideration of the parliament there; adding, That he saw no necessity for this incorporating union, since Scotland had offered to come into the succession without it; and he thought it a very dangerous experiment to both nations: but the topic upon which he laid the chief stress, and which was enforced by the lords Guernsey, Granville, and Abingdon, who also spoke against the union, was, the injury the good old English constitution, justly allowed to be the most equal and best poised government in the world, might suffer by having the weight of sixty-one Scottish members, and those too returned by a Scottish privy-council, thrown into the scale.

The lord North and Grey complained of the small and unequal proportion of the land-tax charged upon Scotland. His lordship also found great fault with the equivalent granted to that kingdom by the fifteenth article of the treaty, in which he was joined by the earl of Rochester, and the lords Guildford and Leigh, who said they conceived nothing could have been more equal on this head of the treaty, than that neither of the kingdoms should have been burthened with the debts of the other contracted before the union; but the revenues of Scotland might have been strictly appropriated to discharge the debts of that kingdom, or to any other uses within themselves as should have been judged requisite; and there would have been no need of an equivalent of near four hundred thousand pounds, to be raised in England within this year for the purchase of those revenues in Scotland, at a time when this kingdom is already burthened with such vast sums for the necessary charges of the war. The earl of Nottingham, after having opposed every article of the treaty separately, concluded with the following observation: "As sir John Maynard said to king William at the Revolution, that having buried all his contemporaries in Westminster-hall, he was afraid, if his majesty had not come in that very juncture of time, he might likewise have out-lived the very laws; so if this union do pass, as I have no reason to doubt but it will, I may affirm that I have out-lived all the laws, and the very constitution of England: I therefore pray God to avert the dire effects which may probably ensue from such an incorporating union."

Such were in substance the arguments made use of by those who opposed the union. It may be sufficient to observe, that to all the objections that were offered against that treaty taking place, this general answer was made, That so great a thing as the uniting the whole island into one government could not be compassed but with some inconveniencies; but if the advantage of safety and union was greater than those inconveniencies, then a lesser evil must be submitted to: that with regard to matters of an ecclesiastical nature, all parties had been guilty of many instances of violence; but that the heats and animosities between them might be allayed by soft and gentle management. It was observed, that the cantons of Switzerland, though they professed different religions, were yet united in one general body, and the diet of Germany was composed of princes and states, among whom three different persuasions prevailed; so that two different sorts of discipline might very well subsist under one government: that if there was any danger on either side, it threatened the Scots much more than the English, as it was more likely the five hundred and thirteen members should get the better of forty-five, than that forty-five should overcome five hundred and thirteen; and in the house of lords twenty-six bishops would always be an over-match for sixteen Scots peers. The chief speakers for the union were the earls of Godolphin, Sunderland, and Wharton, the lords Townshend, Halifax, and Somers, the bishops of Oxford, Norwich, and Sarum*.

Notwithstanding all the opposition made by the lords of the Tory party, every article was approved by a great majority, though not without several protests. Hereupon a bill of ratification was prepared in the lower house by sir Simon Harcourt the solicitor-general, in such an artful manner as to prevent all debate; and the Whigs promoted it with such zeal, that it passed by a majority of one hundred and fourteen voices. It made its way through the house of lords with equal dispatch, and on the fourth of March received the royal assent, when the queen made the following speech upon the occasion:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with the greatest satisfaction that I have given my assent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom.

"I consider this union as a matter of the greatest importance to the wealth, strength, and safety of the whole island; and at the same time a work of so much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now all attempts which have been made towards it, in the course of above one hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt but it will be remembered and spoke of hereafter to the honour of those who have been instrumental in bringing it to such a happy conclusion. I desire and expect from all my subjects of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all possible respect and kindness one to another, that so it may appear to all the world they have hearts disposed to be one people.

"This will be a great pleasure to me, and will make us all quickly sensible of the good effects of this union.

"And I cannot but look upon it as a particular happiness, that in my reign so full a provision is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the security of our religion, by so firm an establishment of the protestant succession throughout Great Britain."

The rest of the speech contains only her desire that the commons would provide for the equivalent for Scotland, and that the two houses would use all possible dispatch in the public business before them.

On the eleventh of March the two houses attended her majesty with addresses of congratulation on the union of the two kingdoms, which were most graciously received, and condescendingly answered.

I have already given an abstract of the twenty-five articles of union, and shall in this place add an abstract of the acts for the security of the respective churches of England and Scotland, which were made essential conditions of the union.

The tenor of the act for securing the protestant religion and presbyterian church-government in Scotland.

"Her majesty, with the advice and consent of the estates in parliament, doth hereby establish the true protestant religion, worship, discipline, and government of this church, to continue without alteration to the people of this land to all generations; and confirms the fifth act of the first parliament of W. & M. entitled, "An act ratifying the confession of faith, and settling the presbyterian church-government, and other acts relating thereto, in prosecution of the declaration of the estates, containing the claim of right, dated the eleventh of April 1689:" and her majesty, with the advice and consent aforesaid, declares that the government of the church by kirk-sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general-assemblies established, shall continue unalterable; and that the said presbyterian government shall be the only government of the church of Scotland.

"That the universities of St. Andrews, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, as now established, shall continue for ever: that none bearing any office in any university, college, or school there, shall be admitted or continued in their office, but such as shall acknowledge the civil government prescribed, or to be prescribed by parliament; and also at their admissions subscribe the said confession of their faith; and that they will practise and conform themselves to the worship in use in this church, submit to the discipline, and never attempt the subversion thereof.

"The subjects of this kingdom shall be free from any oath, test, or subscription, within this kingdom, inconsistent with the said true protestant religion, church government, worship, and discipline.

"The sovereign succeeding her majesty shall, in all times coming, on accession to the crown, swear and subscribe that they shall preserve the said settlement of religion, government, worship, discipline, and privileges of this church.

"This act shall be held a fundamental and essential condition of any union to be concluded between the two kingdoms, without alteration, for ever.

"And her majesty declares, that all laws and statutes in this kingdom, inconsistent with the terms of these articles, shall after the union cease and be void."

The tenor of an act for securing of the church of England, as by law established.

"That an act made in the thirteenth of Elizabeth, cap. 12. for the ministers of the church to be of a sound religion; and an act made 13 Car. II. cap. 4. for the uniformity of public prayers, &c. (other than such clauses in the said acts as have been repealed) and all other acts in force for the preservation of the church of England, doctrine and government thereof, shall be in force for ever.

"Every king and queen succeeding her majesty, at their coronation, shall, in the presence of all persons assisting, or otherwise present, take and subscribe an oath to preserve the settlement of the church of England, and the doctrine, discipline, and government thereof, within the kingdoms of England and Scotland, and the territories thereunto belonging.

"This act shall be held a fundamental and essential part of any union between the two kingdoms.

"Then enacted, that the said articles of union, and the said act for the establishing the protestant religion and the presbyterian church-government in Scotland shall be, and are hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed.

"And that the act passed this present session of parliament, cap. 5. for securing the church of England, as by law established, and the said act for securing the protestant religion and the presbyterian church-government, shall for ever be held fundamental and essential conditions of the said union *."

Thus, after many vigorous, though ineffectual, attempts for the purpose, was at length happily accomplished an union between the kingdoms of England and Scotland, which took place on the first day of May, 1707. The great benefits accruing to both nations by this union do now daily appear more and more conspicuous. From that country England has her American plantations very much increased in people; and from Scotland likewise not only the navy-royal, but our land-armies, have been supplied with many thousands of stout and well-affected men, as has very lately and very effectually been experienced: and although the two rebellions since the union were both originally propagated from Scotland, through the violence of party-zeal, and of clanships and superiorities, since wisely abolished; yet a peaceable, loyal, and industrious spirit have since universally prevailed in that country. By an union with Scotland, England has also the more absolute use of many good ports, of a more extensive fishery, of a supply of very good, though small cattle, and of sundry other benefits. SCOTLAND, on the other hand, receives inestimable advantages by her incorporating union with England; first, by gradually and very visibly enriching herself, from a participation of commerce with England's foreign plantations, factories, &c. Secondly, by this connection with England, she has gradually learnt the melioration of her soil, which in many parts is now known to be much more capable of improvement than was formerly imagined. Thirdly, by this union Scotland has procured a prodigious vent for coarse woollen, stockings, and stuffs, and her more valuable linen manufactures, not only in England, but for the American plantations, as well as the consumption of so many of her black cattle, peltry, &c. It affords equal matter of concern and surprise, that two nations, sprung from the same original stock, speaking the same language essentially, professing the same religion, and whom nature seems to have designed for one, being separated by the Great Ocean from the rest of mankind, should not have sooner pursued their true and evident mutual interests, and thereby have much sooner increased in wealth, security, and power.

* See Stat. v. Annæ Regiæ, cap. 5.

On the twenty-fourth of April the queen prorogued the parliament, after having told them, in a short speech, that she would continue by proclamation the lords and commons already assembled, as members in the first British parliament, pursuant to the power vested in her by the acts of parliament of both kingdoms. The parliament was accordingly revived by a proclamation, and by another the first parliament of Great Britain was appointed to meet on the twentieth of October.

Mean while several of the Scottish lords repaired to London, where they were most graciously received by the queen, who bestowed the title of duke on the earls of Roxburgh and Montrose, who, with the earls of Seafield, Mar, and Loudon, were sworn of the privy council. The union taking place on the first of May, that day was observed as a day of public thanksgiving: congratulatory addresses were presented by the different counties and corporations of England; but the university of Oxford and the Scots were wholly silent on this occasion, discovering thereby their dislike of a measure which her majesty had declared to be the greatest glory of her reign, and of the benefits of which they enjoyed an equal, if not the greatest share.

In order to preserve entire the chain of proceedings in the affair of the union, I purposely omitted to mention in their places the following particulars which happened during this session of parliament.

The French having made great depredations upon the islands of Nevis and St. Kitt's in the preceding year, 1706, and exercised great cruelty upon the inhabitants, the house of commons addressed her majesty about resettling those islands: and the marquis of Caermarthen having offered to go with a squadron of men of war to Madagascar, to suppress a nest of pirates who had become very troublesome in those parts; the house appointed a committee to consider of that matter, and it was resolved to present an address to the queen, to take such measures as in her wisdom should appear meet to suppress the said pirates; as also that her majesty would be pleased to use her endeavours to recover and preserve the antient possessions, trade, and fishery in Newfoundland. The French refugees also, by private direction of bishop Burnet, and some other persons in power, addressed the queen in behalf of their protestant brethren labouring under persecution in France. In this address, which was presented on the seventh of April, by some of the most eminent among the French refugees, they most humbly beseech her majesty, "That when her thoughts should be employed in settling the great concerns of Europe in a treaty of peace, her majesty would graciously vouchsafe to take into her royal care the interest of the poor distressed churches of France, which having been ruined by the superstitious vanity of the enemy, so it would add to the solid glory of her majesty's reign to be instrumental in restoring the same." To which her majesty was pleased to return a most gracious answer, promising to comply with their request. A set of inflammatory writers having of late undertaken, at the instigation of the enemies of the union, to alarm the nation with apprehensions of the church's danger, and to revile and traduce the conduct of the ministers; and having carried their licentiousness to an insufferable height, the government thought it high time to take cognizance of these incendiaries. Prosecutions were commenced against Dr. Brown for a copy of verses, entitled, "The country parson's advice to the lord-keeper," and a letter which he wrote to Mr. secretary Harley. He was found guilty, and sentenced to be twice pilloried. The same punishment was decreed against William Stephens, rector of Sutton in Surry, as author of a pamphlet called, "A letter to the author of the memorial of the church of England:" but, in consideration of his being in holy orders, the execution of the sentence was remitted. Edward Ward and William Pitts were set in the pillory for abusive writings; and George Sawbridge, the publisher of all of them, was fined six hundred pounds, and ordered to appear in the courts of Westminster-Hall, with a paper on his breast denoting his offence*.

The convocation was assembled, as usual, during the session of the parliament, and both houses presented her majesty with a very affectionate and loyal address, declaring that the church was in no danger from her majesty. The lower house, however, voted as if they imagined the church was in some danger from the terms of the union, and were actually employed in drawing up a remonstrance to the commons against that treaty. On this supposition, which the court was apprized of, the queen ordered the archbishop to prorogue the convocation for three weeks, by which time it was presumed the act for ratifying the union would have passed both houses. The lower house complied with this prorogation, but at the same time delivered a representation to the bishops, in which they complained of the prorogation, as a thing that had never been ordered during the sitting of the parliament since the Reformation. The bishops however having proved to her majesty, from the public records, that there were no less than seven or eight precedents of such prorogation during the session of parliament; the queen wrote a letter to the archbishop, severely reflecting on the conduct of the lower house, which she considered as an invasion of her royal supremacy; and threatened, if any thing of the like nature was attempted for the future, she would use such means as the law warranted for punishing offenders.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, some changes were made in several of the public offices, all of them in favour of the Whigs, by the interest of Mr. secretary Harley. Sir Simon Harcourt was constituted attorney-general, in the room of sir Edward Northey; sir James Montagu succeeded sir Simon in the place of solicitor-general. In the beginning of May the queen declared the lord-keeper Cowper lord high-chancellor of Great Britain. Prince George of Denmark took the oaths in the court of Chancery as lord high-admiral of Great Britain; and in like manner the earl of Godolphin was re-appointed lord high-treasurer of Great Britain: but the most considerable change had been made in the month of December, by the promotion of the earl of Sunderland to the post of secretary of state, in the room of sir Charles Hedges. This was brought about, against the queen's inclination, by the pressing instances of the Whigs, who, after the services they had done, thought that one of the secretaries at least should be a man in whom they could place confidence. The republic of Venice having at last appointed ambassadors extraordinary to compliment the queen on her accession to the throne, her majesty in return nominated the earl of Manchester her ambassador-extraordinary to that republic, and in his journey thither he was to call at the courts of Vienna and Turin*.

The battle of Hochstet, or Blenheim, had cost Lewis XIV. a fine army, and the whole country from the Danube to the Rhine. The confederates had made themselves masters of all Flanders, to the very gates of Lisle, in consequence of the glorious day of Ramillies; and the defeat at Turin, had drove the French out of Italy. They had, however, still some troops left in the duchy of Milan, and the little victorious army under the count de Medavy. They were also still in possession of some strong places. Lewis offered to give up all these to the emperor, provided he would permit those troops, which amounted to about fifteen thousand men, to retire unmolested. The emperor accepted of the proposition, and the duke of Savoy gave his assent, without the English or Dutch being once consulted about the matter. By this treaty, which was signed on the twelfth of March, 1707, the emperor Joseph became peaceable possessor of Italy; the kingdom of Naples and Sicily was guaranteed to him; and every thing which had formerly been feudal, was now treated as subject to a supreme power. He imposed a tax of fifteen thousand pistoles upon Tuscany, forty thousand upon the duchy of Mantua; and Parma, Modena, Lucca, and Genoa, notwithstanding they were free states, were included in these impositions.

In the beginning of this campaign all the enemies of France seemed to have acquired new strength, and that kingdom to be on the verge of ruin: she was pushed on all sides, both by sea and land. Of the formidable fleets with which Lewis XIV. had, till lately, domineered on the Ocean, scarcely thirty ships of the line were remaining. Strasburg still continued to be the barrier town towards Germany; but by the loss of Landau, all Alsace lay exposed. A design had been formed for the following campaign to invade Provence by sea and land. The duke of Savoy had undertook to march an army into that province, and to act there as should be concerted by the allies. In a word, destruction seemed now hanging over the head of the Grand Monarch, who had so lately been the terror of all Europe, from which nothing could, in all probability, have saved him, but the misconduct of the confederates. Lewis, by virtue of his capitulation with the emperor in Italy, was enabled to send such reinforcements into Spain and the Netherlands, as rendered him capable of opposing the allies.

Hitherto the arms of the confederates had been attended with amazing success in Spain; but this campaign Fortune seemed to abandon them all at once. The Spaniards appeared to be thoroughly reconciled to the government of Philip, and Charles was not in a condition to exert sufficient force to make them acknowledge him as their sovereign. His army was much inferior to that of the enemy: he had sustained an almost irreparable loss by the death of the brave prince of D'Armstadt, who, as I have already related, was killed at the attack upon Barcelona; and the earl of Peterborough had retired into Italy. The earl of Galway, and brigadier-general Stanhope, who commanded in his absence, were brave and gallant officers: they had the cause of the prince they were sent to serve at heart; but they did not possess all those qualifications which the situation of Charles's affairs required. The glory acquired by the duke of Marlborough, their friend and patron, had fired them with emulation, without imparting to them that great general's military capacity. They were eager to strike some important blow; and they persuaded Charles to second their views, by penetrating once more to Madrid, and fighting the enemy wherever they should appear, though much against his inclination, as he was very much averse to engage in any hazardous enterprize. Not that this prince wanted courage; on the contrary, he possessed a great share of it, joined to a clear head, and a solidity of judgment above his years. He reposed a great confidence in the earl of Peterborough, and that nobleman declared against an offensive war, on account of the difficulty of finding subsistence in Castile. He sent his opinion from Italy, in which he advised Charles to avoid a decisive action: he represented the fatal and irreparable consequences that might ensue from a defeat: he demonstrated that those might easily be avoided, by remaining on the defensive, and waiting the event of the intended expedition against Provence, which could not fail one way or another to oblige the French king to recall his troops out of Spain to protect his own dominions: he observed also, that as a fleet was daily expected from England with a powerful reinforcement of men and military stores, it would be time enough to attack the enemy when they arrived. This advice, however, prudent as it was, had no attention paid to it. The earl of Galway, brigadier Montrose, and the marquis das Minas, the Portuguese general, were bent upon coming to action; and it was resolved in a council of war to go in quest of the enemy, and offer them battle wherever they should appear; and, in order to provoke the Spaniards to the same resolve, the army, to the number of fifteen thousand men, was assembled at Caudela* on the first day of April, and on the seventh of the same month laid siege to the castle of Valencia, lying in the road between Valencia and Castile: but hearing that the duke of Berwick was in the neighbourhood, they advanced on the fourteenth of the same month towards the town of Almanza, where the enemy were drawn up in order of battle, their number, as I have before observed, being greatly superior to that of the allies. The following is the account of this fatal day, as published by authority.

Our army entered the plain of Almanza about noon, and formed in the line of battle, and so marched till it came within a mile of the enemy. Lord Galway, to supply our want of cavalry, had interlined a brigade of foot with each wing of horse: but the enemy having drawn from the left some squadrons to reinforce their right wing, lord Tyrwley, who commanded at the left wing, ordered the Portuguese horse, of the left of the rear line, commanded by the count de Attalaya, to double into our first line, in order to make an equal front with the enemy.

About three o'clock in the afternoon the earl of Galway posted himself at the head of the English dragoons, and marched to begin the battle with the enemy's right wing of horse; the Portuguese being ordered to take the charge as it should come to them from the left, but not before the English and Dutch were actually engaged. While we were marching on, the enemy began to play upon us from a battery on a rising ground, a little in the front of their right: but our troops pressing on to come to a close engagement, the cannon on either side did little execution; and a detachment of dragoons being sent under colonel Dormer to attack the enemy's battery, they retired with their guns in great precipitation. As soon as our left wing was advanced within an hundred paces of the enemy's horse, they likewise advanced out of their line to meet our charge, and the engagement soon became very bloody and obstinate on both sides. The enemy, by the weight of their squadrons, forced ours to retreat some paces; but two regiments of foot, on the left of that brigade which was interlined with the horse of the first line, coming up, threw in their fire upon the enemy's flank and rear, and our cavalry at the same time renewing their charge in front, drove them in disorder through their own lines with a very great slaughter.

By this time the English and Dutch foot, who formed the center of our army, under the command of lieutenant-general Erle and baron Freysheim, were sharply engaged, and broke through the enemy's first and second lines, bearing down all before them as far as the walls of Almanza: but this success was not of long duration; for the enemy's squadrons of the second line fell in upon their flank, and forced our infantry back with great loss.

The enemy observing that the cavalry of our right did not advance with our left wing, detached some squadrons to fall upon the Portuguese, who formed the right line, under the command of the marquis das Minas. These troops, in the most dastardly manner, gave way upon the first charge, and the whole right wing made off and abandoned their infantry, who were most of them either killed or taken prisoners. The battle still continued on our left wing, the enemy still charging us with fresh squadrons, but without success; which the duke of Berwick perceiving, he sent nine battalions, most of them French, who drew up before the first line of the Spanish horse, to oppose our brigade of foot, consisting of five regiments. At the same time they brought up several fresh squadrons, to make another charge upon our left wing of horse. The count d'Attalaya, who commanded the Portuguese horse that were mixed with our dragoons, was carried off wounded. Our troops were now attacked on every side; and being left naked in the flanks by the cowardly flight of the Portuguese wing, were surrounded and hemmed in on all sides.

In this dreadful situation, they formed themselves into a hollow square, and retired from the field of battle. Had they been able to make their retreat good, the enemy would have had no great cause to boast of the victory, the loss on both sides being nearly equal; but the men, after marching nine hours without any refreshment, and fighting about six, were fainting with fatigue: all their ammunition was gone; they saw themselves abandoned by their own horse, and in a country to which they were utter strangers; destitute of provisions, and cut off from all hopes of a supply. Upon these considerations, they resolved to surrender themselves (to the amount of thirteen battalions) as the French infantry had done at Blenheim, and to send to the duke of Berwick to desire honourable terms, which were gladly granted; and the duke, who was at some distance, and indeed thought this body out of his reach, sent count d'Asfeldt to receive their surrender, on these conditions; That they should be prisoners of war till they should be exchanged; that they should be all disarmed but the officers, who should keep their swords; and that they should have liberty to send for their baggage before they marched any farther. The Portuguese, and part of the English horse that guarded the baggage, retreated to Alcira.

In this fatal action the confederates lost above ten thousand men, two thousand of whom were left dead on the field of battle, and among those the following officers; brigadier Killegrew, the colonels Roper, Laurence, Dormer, Deloches, Green, Austin, MacNeal, Wooler, Withers, Ramsey, and Erskine. The earl of Galway, who charged in person at the head of Guiscard's dragoons, received a deep cut in his face, having before lost his right hand, with which he might have parried the blow. The marquis das Minas was run through the arm, and saw his mistress, who fought in the habit of an Amazon, killed by his side. The lord Mark Ker; Mr. O'Hara, son to the lord Tyrawley; and the colonels Clayton and Pierce were wounded. The loss of the enemy was not much inferior to ours.

After this unfortunate battle lord Galway retired with the remains of the army to the frontiers of Catalonia, in order to join king Charles, who was purposing to march to the borders of Roussillon †.

Neither Philip nor Charles were present at this action. The duke of Orleans, who had been appointed to the command in Spain, did not arrive till the day after the battle: however, he made all the advantage he could of the victory, marching into Valencia, and reducing that whole province, with the capital city, before the middle of May. He afterwards continued his route to Saragossa, the capital of Arragon; whereupon that whole kingdom made their submission to king Philip, imploring his clemency. The duke, however, disarmed them for the present, and they were obliged to buy their peace with great sums of money, besides subsisting the French army with provisions. King Philip afterwards thought fit to deprive them of their antient privileges for a time, and took such other measures to mortify them as enraged princes generally exercise towards rebellious subjects. The duke of Orleans afterwards began a private negotiation with the earl of Galway, during which the two armies lay inactive; and he concluded the campaign with the siege of Lerida ‡, which was surrendered by capitulation on the second day of November; then the troops on both sides went into winter quarters. The earl of Galway and the marquis das Minas embarked at Barcelona for Lisbon; and general Carpenter remained commander of the English forces quartered in Catalonia, which was now the only part of Spain that remained to king Charles §.

The allies, glowing with indignation at the check their arms had received at Almanza, resolved to put in execution, without delay, the scheme they had formed for an attack upon Toulon, hoping to make themselves amends for the losses they had suffered in Spain, by over-running the fertile provinces of the south of France, to which Toulon is the key, on the side of the Mediterranean. With this view, no expence was spared to fit out the most formidable armament that had been raised for some years. Queen Anne remitted a large sum of money to the duke of Savoy, who, with prince Eugene, was to enter France on the side of Provence, at the head of thirty thousand men, while the combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of sir Cloudesley Shovel, were to assist their operations by sea. Secrecy, however, the soul of every great enterprize, was wanting here; and the duke of Savoy embarrassed the measures (that had been concerted with great sagacity) by his irresolution and delay. The English and Dutch, who looked upon the conquest of Toulon as certain, sent a large body of troops to fill up the vacancies that had been occasioned by the emperor's having drawn off considerable detachments to send through the ecclesiastical state towards Naples, of which he had made himself master without any difficulty. The forces of the confederates were formed into three different armies, in order to amuse the enemy, and more effectually to conceal their real intentions.

It was about the month of June when the design upon Toulon first began to appear; whereupon the mareschal de Tesse, who commanded in Provence, made all the dispositions that could be expected from an experienced and prudent general on such an occasion; notwithstanding which the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene passed the Var on the eleventh day of July, with their whole army, and advanced directly towards Toulon ||, whither the artillery and ammunition, which were very formidable, were transported on board of the combined squadrons. The confederate army being arrived before the place, prince Eugene went upon one of the heights in the neighbourhood, to observe the disposition of the enemy, when he soon perceived the whole difficulty of the enterprize he had undertaken, and found that he must fight an army strongly entrenched in the out-works, and on the heights that surrounded the place, and which were well furnished with a vast number of guns: in fine, that the town, so far from being unprovided for a siege, as the allies had been made to believe, was in a condition to bid defiance to their strongest efforts; upon which the prince was for making a timely retreat, but the duke of Savoy was positive in his opinion for carrying on the enterprize. Accordingly a council of war being held, it was resolved to begin their operations with the attack of the hill of St. Catherine, which the enemy had fortified; and in this first attempt the allies succeeded, though not without loss. They now began to erect their batteries on this eminence, and to play with red-hot shot upon the town, accompanied by an incessant shower of bombs from the fleet, which did prodigious damage to the buildings and works of the place. They also attacked and carried Fort St. Louis, le Grand Tour, and Balaguier, three little forts in the harbour.

While the allies were thus employed, the enemy were not idle: they made several vigorous sallies, in which they cut off a good number of our troops, and nailed up some cannon. Marshal de Tesse gathered in all the troops that were in the country, as well militia as regulars; and by the fifteenth of August found his numbers so increased, that he resolved to attempt dislodging the || Thoulon, or Toulon, is a pretty large city of Provence in France, with one of the most spacious and secure ports of Europe, in a bay of the Mediterranean. Here the largest ships of the French navy are built and stationed: here is an arsenal, furnished with all sorts of naval stores, also yards and docks, and the whole is well fortified. allies from the post of St. Catherine, cost what it might; and indeed he took his measures with great skill and sagacity: he ordered two attacks to be made; the one feigned, the other true; but both so ordered as to co-operate with and mutually assist each other: that which was destined against the hill of St. Catherine he commanded in person, and the French attacked the confederates with a fury not to be withstood. The duke and the prince sent four battalions to their relief, but it was too late; the French had driven our men from the post with such slaughter, that not above thirty were left out of a body of between eight and nine hundred. In this action the prince of Saxe-Gotha, one of the bravest of the confederate generals, chusing rather to die on the spot than abandon his post, put himself at the head of this small remnant, crying out to them, "Courage, my brave friends, let us die like men of honour; it shall never be said that a prince of Saxe-Gotha suffered himself to be driven from his post." He fell, however, the victim of his martial ardour: a musket-ball entered his head under the left eye, and another pierced his left breast: he fell dead on the spot, infinitely regretted by the emperor and all the allies: he had not attained his thirtieth year. His little band seeing him fall, immediately laid down their arms. The four battalions, who were by this time come up, had not a better fate: the victorious enemy fell upon them sword in hand, killing great numbers, and putting the rest to flight; and then nailing up all the cannon of the confederates which they found in the place, they returned to their camp with very little loss.

Prince Eugene was now more than ever convinced of the impossibility of taking Toulon: he repeated his instances to abandon the enterprize, which he said might be done at present without hazarding any thing; but that the enemy were daily receiving reinforcements from all parts; that it appeared even now very difficult to be supplied from the fleet with provisions and necessaries for the siege when the wind was contrary, and that in an advanced season of the year it would be still more so; and that the desertion of the soldiers for want of provision, and the distempers among them, would daily thin their numbers, and reduce them to an inferiority with the enemy. The most prudent and experienced amongst the commanders in the confederate army were fully sensible of the truth of prince Eugene's arguments. The duke of Savoy himself at length began to see the matter in its true light; and having received intelligence that the enemy had now sixty battalions in their intrenchments, besides a numerous cavalry, he agreed to desist from this enterprize: but that they might not quit the place without leaving behind them evident marks of their visit, directions were given for bombarding Toulon both by sea and land with redoubled vigour; and the duke of Savoy, who in this took retaliation for his capital city of Turin, went to an eminence to enjoy the destructive blaze. The enemy were greatly distressed by this dreadful farewell: eight ships of the line were burned in the harbour; twenty were sunk in the entrance to the mole, few of which could ever be recovered; several magazines, and above one hundred and sixty horses, were destroyed in the city; and the devastations committed in the adjacent country were estimated at no less than thirty millions of livres, or near five hundred thousand pounds sterling.

By this time the confederates received advice that the French king had recalled a good number of battalions from the army on the Rhine; that the duke of Burgundy was also at the head of a powerful army, advancing to the relief of Toulon; wherefore, on the twenty-fifth day of August, having embarked their guns and other implements of war, they decamped in the night, leaving their tents standing to deceive the enemy, and on the thirty-first repassed the Var, having lost, as appeared by a muster of their troops, about six thousand men, by sickness, desertion, or the sword. But to cover in some measure the disgrace of this disappointment, and to make some amends for the losses he had suffered, the duke of Savoy soon after laid siege to Suza (the capital of the marquissate of the same name in Piedmont) the garrison of which submitted at discretion. By this conquest he not only secured the entry into his own territories, but likewise opened to himself a free passage into Dauphiné*. After this the army went into winter-quarters†.

The English and Dutch, particularly the former, were grievously chagrined at the miscarriage of this expedition, from which they had formed such flattering prospects of speedily terminating the war with honour and advantage, and which they now saw vanish into air, after such a mighty expence to insure its success. They accused the duke of Savoy of holding an intelligence with Lewis XIV. but still we were obliged to submit, and pay the greatest part of the expence. The ill success of this expedition was also attributed, as I have already observed, to the emperor's having weakened the army under the command of prince Eugene in Italy, in order to send troops to the conquest of Naples. Indeed the house of Austria seemed all along to have very little at heart the projects or interests of the rest of the allies, or to regard the expences they were at, provided she could answer her own private views. She had found out the secret to engage England and Holland warmly in her cause, and to draw immense sums from those two nations, of which she made her own use. The kingdom of Naples was a conquest of greater importance to her than that of Toulon, which more immediately concerned the maritime powers, who would have reaped infinite advantages from the destruction of one of the finest seaports the enemy possessed in Europe.

The raising the siege of Toulon was followed by several other cross accidents and losses to the allies. The very seasons seemed to arm against them. Their fleets were greatly shattered by bad weather at sea, by which several ships were lost, or fell a prey to the enemy's cruizers. Great Britain in particular suffered a terrible disaster, in the unhappy fate of sir Cloudesley Shovel, who, on his return home with fifteen sail of the line, and five of a lesser rank, was lost upon the rocks of Scilly, in his own ship the Association, and perished, with every person on board. This was likewise the fate of the Eagle, Romney, and Firebrand: the rest of the fleet happily got safe into Spithead*. Nor was this the only misfortune that befel us at sea this year; for though France was not in a condition to send out any fleet, yet the British nation never suffered greater losses on that element. The prince of Denmark's council was very unhappy in the whole conduct of the cruizers and convoys. The merchants made heavy complaints, and not without reason: five men of war (who were convoy to a great fleet of merchant-men and transports, laden with stores and horses, bound for Lisbon) fell in with the Breft and Dunkirk squadrons off the Lizard, to the number of fourteen sail. The Cumberland, Chester, and Ruby, being disabled, were forced to submit; the Devonshire maintained a running fight till night, when by some accident she was blown up, and only two of her men saved: the Royal Oak was boarded by the French, but got clear, and with some vessels made the harbour of Kinsale (in Ireland) and some others of the merchant-ships and transports bore away for, and got safe into Lisbon. Indeed, about this time the government received advice that captain Underdon, commander of the Falkland, had made a successful expedition against the French fisheries in North America, having taken two of their men of war, and burnt several fishing-vessels and boats, destroyed their stages, carried off their fish, and made their fishermen prisoners: but this success was too inconsiderable to alleviate the loss of the men and ships that perished with sir Cloudesley Shovel, or fell a prey to the French cruizers in the Channel.

It is certain indeed that we still continued to have the superiority over the enemy; but commerce, which is the main sinew of war, was greatly weakened. The party of Charles III. which he supported at such an immense expence, was visibly declining: nothing effectual could be done to retrieve it till the next year's campaign. The interval, however, ought to have been improved by every possible means; instead of which the operations were suffered to languish, and the enemy to gain a degree of strength that it was not easy afterwards to withstand. Eight or ten ships of force more in the Mediterranean would have obviated these inconveniencies, and have enabled Charles to keep his adherents together. Nothing could appear more simple and natural than such a measure; and it is hardly conceivable how our ministry, while they were continually busied in forming the most important projects, should overlook the lesser arrangement, which naturally led to the completion of the main design.

Upon the Upper Rhine the Germans seemed to be asleep: they suffered marshal Villars to pass that river with very little opposition, to make himself master of their lines at Biehl and Stolhoffen, and lay the circles of Suabia and Franconia under contribution: and he had even penetrated into Bavaria, had he not been obliged to weaken his army, and send large detachments into Provence for the relief of Toulon. The imperial army was, as usual, augmented the latter end of the summer, and the command of it was, at the pressing instances of the allies, given to the elector of Hanover, who exerted himself with uncommon diligence in restoring military discipline; but the army was too weak, and the season too far advanced, to enter on great designs. One considerable action happened at Offenburgh, which very much raised the elector's reputation. He surprized seven regiments of French horse and dragoons encamped near that place, whom he attacked on the twenty-fourth of September, and entirely defeated them, killing several officers, and eight hundred private men. Soon after marshal Villars repassed the Rhine; and the elector of Hanover separated his army, and dispersed them so conveniently in their winter-quarters, that they might be assembled upon any emergent occasion in less than forty-eight hours†.

The conduct of Charles XII. of Sweden continued still so mysterious, that the confederates were not a little alarmed at his being in the heart of Germany. It was therefore resolved to send some person of sagacity to dive into his real intentions, and the duke of Marlborough was accordingly dispatched in the month of April, with a letter from the queen to that monarch, who then held his residence at Lipsick. His grace, who was no less able a negotiator than he was a successful general, attacked Charles on the side of his vanity, the only part by which he was accessible. Being admitted to an audience, he is said to have addressed him in the following terms:

“ I present to your majesty a letter, not from the chancery, but from the heart of the queen my mistress, and written with her own hand. Had not her sex prevented her from taking so long a journey, she would have crossed the sea to see a prince admired by the whole universe. I esteem myself happy in having the honour of assuring your majesty of my regard; and I should think it a great happiness if my affairs would allow me to learn, under so great a general as your majesty, what I want to know in the art of war. §”

To this compliment his Swedish majesty returned the following answer; “ That the queen of Great Britain's letter, and the person of her ambassador, were both very acceptable to him; that he should always have the utmost regard for her Britannic majesty, and the interests of the grand alliance; that it was much against his will that he had been obliged to give the least umbrage to any of the parties engaged in the confederacy, but that his excellency could not but be convinced that he had just cause to bring his troops into that country; that nevertheless his grace might assure the queen his mistress, that he intended to withdraw them as soon as he had obtained the satisfaction he demanded; and that in the mean time he should carefully abstain from doing any thing that might tend to the prejudice of the common cause in general, or of the protestant religion in particular, of which he should always glory to be a zealous protector*.

This however was looked upon as nothing more than repaying words with words. It was well known that the French court had gained over count Piper, the chief minister and favourite of Charles, to their interest, who put his master upon seeking occasion for a quarrel with the emperor, whom the Swedish conqueror affected to treat with great haughtiness, and had started some pretensions which gave the court of Vienna great uneasiness.

Count Zobor, son-in-law to the prince of Lichtenstein, and chamberlain to the emperor, had, at a public entertainment, made some indecent reflections on the character of Charles XII. in the presence of baron de Strahlen, the Swedish envoy, who so far resented it, that he gave the count at once the lye, and a box on the ear; after which he peremptorily demanded reparation from the Imperial court. The emperor, afraid of displeasing the king of Sweden, was obliged to banish the count. Charles, not satisfied even with this condescension, insisted that count Zobor should be delivered up to him. The pride of the court of Vienna was forced to stoop. The count was put into the hands of the king, who sent him back, after having kept him for some time as a prisoner at Stetin.

He further demanded, contrary to all the laws of nations, that the emperor should deliver up to him one thousand five hundred unhappy Muscovites who had escaped the year before out of Saxony, and had been entertained in the imperial army on the Upper Rhine. The emperor was obliged to yield even to this unreasonable demand; but the Muscovites being informed of what was in agitation, disbanded themselves, and marched off in parties into Poland.

The third and last of his demands was the most daring. Having declared himself the protector of the emperor's protestant subjects in Silesia, a province belonging to the house of Austria, and not to the empire; he insisted that the emperor should grant them the liberties and privileges which had been established by the treaties of Westphalia, but which were extinguished, or at least eluded, by those of Ryswick. The emperor, who wanted only to get rid of such a dangerous neighbour, yielded once more, and granted all that he desired. The Lutherans of Silesia had one hundred churches, which the catholics were obliged to cede to them. All differences being thus compromised, a treaty was signed between the emperor and the king of Sweden at Leipzig, on the first of September, under the guaranty of the queen of Great Britain and the States-general: and now Charles having no pretext to remain in Germany, set out at the head of his army for Poland, to stop the progress of the czar of Muscovy, who had by this time almost overrun that kingdom†.

Whilst the house of Austria underwent humiliations on every side, two pieces of pomp and magnificence consumed great part of their treasure: an embassy was sent from Lisbon to demand the emperor's sister for the king of Portugal, which was effected at a very great expence. A wife also was to be sought for king Charles: he had seen the princess Caroline of Anspach, and was much pleased with her. Proposals were made to her in his name, and great endeavours used to prevail on her to change her religion; but she preferring the protestant faith to the splendor of a crown, refused to be a queen on those terms. Her firmness met with a suitable reward; for being soon after married to the electoral prince of Brunswick, she shared with him the crown of Great Britain. The princess of Wolfenbottle was not so firm: she subscribed to the conditions of the king of Spain, and was in a short time married to him by proxy, and sent to Barcelona. The queen of Portugal this same year came to Holland, to be carried to Lisbon by a squadron of the English fleet‡.

The duke of Marlborough having finished his negotiations with the king of Sweden by the latter end of April, left Saxony, and repaired to Flanders, where he assembled the allied army at Anderlach, near Brussels, about the middle of May, and advanced to Soignies, with a design to give battle to the elector of Bavaria and the duke of Vendôme, who commanded the French forces, and had encamped on the plain of Flerus. On his way, however, he received intelligence that the enemy's army had been strongly reinforced by draughts from all their garrisons, insomuch as to be greatly superior to that of the allies. Upon this intelligence the duke, whose prudence was always equal to his valour, thought proper to resume the road to Brussels, and encamped his army at Mildert, while the French advanced to Gemblours. The two dukes spent the rest of the campaign in marches and counter-marches, endeavouring to gain some advantage of each other; but such was the caution of each general, that no action happened between the two armies, nor was any town besieged, but both sides held their own, and about the latter end of October marched into the same quarters they had occupied the preceding winter§.

At the close of the campaign the duke of Marlborough repaired to Frankfort, where he had a conference with the electors of Hanover, Mentz, and Palatine, about the operations of the ensuing year: then he returned to the Hague; and having settled the necessary measures with the deputies of the States-general, set sail for England, where he landed on the second day of November. It furnished matter of much speculation to the politicians of those days to account for the inactive conduct of his grace during this critical campaign, when he commanded a victorious army of one hundred thousand veteran troops flushed with victory. His friends accounted for it, by alleging that he waited to see the success of the grand expedition against Toulon.—It might be so.

The military transactions abroad being now at an end, we will return to those of a domestic nature.

Affairs in the English council and administration began now to assume a new face, and the royal favour now seemed directed in a new channel. Mr. Harley, who had for some years been secretary of state, had ingratiated himself greatly with his sovereign, and in consequence thereof began to act for himself, and in opposition to the lord-treasurer. The duchess of Marlborough was also supplanted by Mrs. Masham, her own kinswoman, whom she had formerly relieved from indigence, and placed about the person of the queen, in the nature of a bed-chamber woman. This person had, by studying the temper of the queen, and meeting all her designs and little biases with assent and approbation, absolutely gained her affection. Her majesty began now to be sensible that her old favourite the duchess of Marlborough had, during her reign of favour, played the tyrant; and the remonstrances of that lady, as to state affairs, which had hitherto been placed to the account of an honest bluntness and undisguised affection, were now censured as insolent attempts to thwart her majesty in her most respected maxims, and make her the tool of an ambitious and designing family-party. Mrs. Masham was a relation to Mr. Harley, as well as to the duchess, and she acted under his directions in managing some of the private springs of political intrigues, which he now began to put in play, to form a party in conjunction with the Tories, to sap the credit of the duke of Marlborough and the earl of Godolphin, and expel the Whigs from the advantages they possessed under the government. Harley's chief coadjutor in this scheme was Mr. Henry St. John (afterwards the famous lord Bolingbroke) who for the present was content to act in a subordinate capacity; but in a short time, conscious of his own parts and influence, raised himself to the character of that minister's rival. To these politicians sir Simon Harcourt joined himself, a colleague of uncommon ability and credit; and they united their endeavours to rally and incorporate the disunited Tories. It was said that prince George was brought into the concert, by being made to apprehend that he was in a manner excluded from his due share in the government, by the great power which the duke of Marlborough and the lord-treasurer had acquired to themselves and their friends. They asserted that the queen herself was little better than a cypher in the state, being as much under the controul of the duchess of Marlborough as her affairs were by the duke. The queen about this time took some steps which plainly shewed her inclination towards the Tories: among others, she bestowed the bishoprics of Chichester and Exeter upon sir William Dawes and Dr. Blackall, who, tho' persons of unblemished character, were professed anti-revolutionists.

The disposition of the Tories seemed to concur with the views of the new-formed party: the nation in general expressed great discontent with the Whig ministry, on account of the many losses and disgraces which had befallen our arms both by sea and land in the course of this year. The Tories did not fail to feed their disgust, while the ministry seemed totally inattentive to the spreading murmurs which portended a storm ready to fall upon their heads. By a strange instance of mismanagement, they treated their newly incorporated brethren the Scots in such a manner as seemed to exasperate that people more than ever against the union. A stop was put to their whole commerce for two months, before it was diverted into the new channel. Three months elapsed before the equivalent was remitted to that kingdom, and it was afterwards applied with the most shameful partiality. The Scottish nation now resounded on all sides with complaints: the Jacobites hailed the happy omen, and began to stir in favour of their exiled prince. Conferences were held with the court of St. Germain's, and measures concerted for bringing about the desired revolution: nay, so openly did they act, and with so little regard to decency towards the established government, that the pretender's birth-day was publicly celebrated in many different parts of the kingdom: in a word, every thing in Scotland seemed ripe for a general revolt.

In Ireland, indeed, every thing wore the face of quiet and tranquility, under the administration of the earl of Pembroke. A parliament having met at Dublin, in the month of July, presented addresses of congratulation to her majesty on the late union of the two kingdoms: several laudable resolutions were passed by the commons, in favour of their own manufactures: they granted the necessary supplies; and, having finished several bills, were prorogued to the sixth of May of the ensuing year; and the earl of Pembroke returned to England.

Such was the state of our home affairs, when the time for convening the great assembly of the nation approached very near. The parliament had already sat two years, and of course, according to the institution of triennial parliaments, it had only another year to sit; but as it had been revived on account of its being the first parliament of Great Britain, it was commonly supposed to be a new parliament. Mr. Secretary Harley and his friends, however, maintained, that it could not be a new parliament, since it was not summoned by a new writ, but only by virtue of a clause in an act of parliament. The Whigs, by their superior interest, at length carried their point, and it was yielded to be a new parliament.

Accordingly, on the twenty-third of October, the first parliament of Great Britain met at Westminster, when all the forms usual at the beginning of a new parliament were observed: the queen came to the house of peers, and the commons being sent for, they were directed by the lord-chancellor to return to their house and chuse a speaker, and present him that day sevensnight. They unanimously made choice of Mr. Smith, their former speaker, and then adjourned to the thirtieth of the same month: the lords adjourned to the same day. At this first meeting thirteen of the Scottish peers returned for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, were admitted to their places in the British house of lords, each of them being introduced by two English peers of the same rank; and the commons of North Britain took their places in the lower house. On the thirtieth the queen came again to the house of peers, and the commons, being sent for, presented their speaker, who was approved by the queen: then the two houses were again adjourned to the sixth of November, on which day her majesty made a speech to the first British parliament, to the following purport.

She began with expressing "her humble thankfulness to God, and entire satisfaction to herself, that she met them there in her first parliament of Great Britain, not doubting (she said) but they came with hearts prepared, as her's was, to make the union so prosperous, as it might answer the well-grounded hopes of all her good subjects, and the reasonable apprehensions of her enemies; and to that end, she observed, nothing was so material to convince both friends and enemies, that the uniting their interests had not only improved their abilities, but also their resolutions, as to prosecute the war till an honourable peace could be obtained."

Then, having spoken of the attempt upon Toulon, which, though it had not been attended with the desired success, had not, she said, wholly lost its intended effect; having taken notice of our disadvantages in Spain, and the expulsion of the enemy wholly out of Italy, as also of the conduct and authority of the elector of Hanover, who commanded as general of the empire that campaign on the Rhine; and after that, of the supplies necessary for carrying on the war with success; she came to the business of the late union, and said, "it was impossible but some doubts and difficulties must have arisen on account of that measure, which, however, she hoped, were so far overcome as to have defeated the designs of those, who would have made use of that handle to foment disturbances." Then, having recommended to their consideration several things, made liable by the articles of union to the consideration of the parliament of Great Britain, she concluded with assuring them, "that nothing should be wanting on her part to procure her people all the blessings that could follow from that happy circumstance of her reign, and to extinguish the least occasion of jealousy, that either the civil or religious rights of any part of that her united kingdom could suffer by the consequences of that union; hoping (she said) they would suffer nothing to prevail with them to disunite among themselves, or abate their zeal in opposing the common enemy*."

I shall not dwell on the addresses presented to her majesty on this occasion, but only observe, that both houses, having made some enquiries into the miscarriages of the navy, and brought in a bill for the better security of the trade of the kingdom, the commons went roundly to work about the necessary supplies for the service of the ensuing year, amounting in all to about six millions†. They introduced another bill, for repealing the Scottish act of security, and that about peace and war, which had excited such jealousy in the English nation: they likewise resolved, that there should be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great Britain: that the militia of Scotland should be put upon the same footing with that of England: that the powers of the justices of the peace should be the same through the whole united kingdoms: that, for the better administration of justice in Scotland, the lords of justiciary should go circuits twice in the year: and that the writs for electing Scottish members to serve in parliament should be directed, and returns made, in the same manner as was observed in England.

The queen came to the parliament house on the eighteenth of December, and gave the royal assent to those bills; when, after thanking the commons for their readiness and affection in providing so considerable a part of the supplies, she hinted at the necessity there was of augmenting the forces in Spain, Portugal, and Savoy. This intimation produced a debate in the house of lords, on the affairs of Spain, the queen being present incognito. It began about returning thanks to the earl of Peterborough for his services in that country, or else to call him to an account for his conduct if he had done amiss. The services of the earl of Peterborough were extolled by the earl of Rochester and lord Haversham, and it was moved, that he might have the thanks of the house: this was opposed by the Whigs, who imagined it might imply a reflection on the conduct of the earl of Galway. The earl of Rochester observed on this occasion, that it was a saying of old duke Schomberg's, that the attacking France in the Netherlands was like taking a bull by the horns; and therefore his lordship proposed the standing upon the defensive in Flanders, and sending from thence fifteen or twenty thousand men to Catalonia. In this he was seconded by the earl of Nottingham and others, who took notice that Spain was in a manner abandoned to the enemy. This motion was strongly opposed by the duke of Marlborough, who urged, that the great towns in Brabant, which he had conquered, could not be preserved without a considerable number of men; and that if the French should gain any advantage in Flanders, from their superiority in point of numbers, the discontented party in Holland, which was very strong, and bore with great impatience the burthen of the war, would immediately become clamorous for a peace. His grace on this occasion discovered so much warmth, that the whole house took notice of it; and lord Rochester said, he wondered that nobleman, who had always been so conspicuous for his calmness and moderation, should now be out of temper; at the same time he challenged his grace to shew how troops could be procured for the service of Italy and Spain; to which the duke replied, that the subject was of too great concern to be spoken of without warmth, and assured the house, that measures had been already concerted for forming an army of forty thousand men, under the duke of Savoy, after sending powerful succours to king Charles‡.

* Proceedings of the House of Commons, iv. 70.

† The ways and means for raising those sums were, the land-tax of four shillings in the pound; the malt duty; upon the several duties granted last year for annuities, a farther sum was now enacted of six hundred and forty thousand pounds for like annuities of forty thousand pounds per annum, at the same price; customs laid for ninety-five years, on which one million was to be taken in for purchasing more annuities at sixteen years purchase. The East India company proposed to advance one million two hundred thousand pounds for the service of the war, if they might have their term enlarged to the year 1726, contenting themselves with the same interest they already received for the two millions they formerly advanced, which was complied with, and enacted accordingly; and the general mortgage as it was called (that is, divers duties at the custom-house) was continued from 1712 to 1714, for a loan of seven hundred and twenty-nine thousand and sixty-seven pounds, which completed the sums voted.

‡ Proceedings of the House of Lords, ii. 183.

How powerful these were, the event will shew.

This declaration of the duke's, however, put an end to the debates, and on the twenty-third of December the two houses joined in an address to the queen, against making any peace, which could not be safe and favourable for her and her allies, if Spain, the West Indies, or any part of the Spanish monarchy, should be suffered to remain under the power of the house of Bourbon. Her majesty, in her answer, fully concurred with them in opinion, adding farther, that she was very well pleased to find the measures she had concerted for the succour of the king of Spain, were so well approved by both houses: she said, she would continue her most pressing instances with the emperor, for hastening farther succours, and that they might be commanded by prince Eugene, agreeable to the desire of the two houses in their address. This request she accordingly made; the court of Vienna, however, did not chuse to comply with it, but sent thither the count Staremberg, who, of all the German generals, was next to the prince in military reputation.

The high degree of credit in which Mr. Harley now stood with the queen, filled the Whigs with very disagreeable apprehensions: they mustered all their strength, and, headed by the two great statesmen, the duke and the treasurer, who yet managed every thing, resolved to be before-hand with the secretary, and, if possible, drive him from the court; which while they were meditating upon, an accident happened that gave them some colour for attacking their rival. One Gregg, an inferior clerk in Mr. Harley's office, was detected in holding a secret correspondence with monsieur Chamillard, the French king's minister; whereupon he was apprehended, and brought to his trial, when he pleaded guilty, and was condemned; but he was reprieved from time to time, for several months, in hopes that he might make some discoveries of importance: but the fellow took the whole guilt upon himself, declaring at his execution, that neither his master Mr. Harley, nor any other person, had the least knowledge of his treasonable correspondence, which, he said, he had entered into merely to supply those necessities which a life of extravagance and debauchery had run him into. The Whigs were in great hopes that this affair would have fixed an indelible stain upon the secretary's character; but the most that could be made out to the censure of Mr. Harley, was, that he suffered papers of a secret nature to be too much exposed in his office, whereby Gregg and other clerks had it in their power to give intelligence to the enemy, if they should be so disposed. The peers thought proper to offer an address to her majesty upon this head, reflecting upon Mr. Harley's negligence in the discharge of his office (which was certainly reprehensible.) The duke of Marlborough and the lord treasurer Godolphin, laying hold of this favourable opportunity to overturn their tottering rival, declared they would lay down their commissions if the secretary was employed any longer. The queen, who in fact was little better than the tool of every ministry that was uppermost, was forced to acquiesce, and prevailed on Mr. Harley to make a voluntary resignation of his post, and retire: with him went out sir Thomas Mansell, comptroller of the household, sir Simon Harcourt, attorney-general, and Mr. St. John, secretary at war; leaving the Whigs to act without controul. Mr. Harley's place was bestowed on Mr. Henry Boyle, chancellor of the Exchequer. The queen, however, retained so deep a resentment of the behaviour of the duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin on this occasion, that she entirely withdrew her confidence from them, though in appearance she carried it towards them as formerly.

A few days after this breach at court, which happened about the latter end of February, 1708, the nation was alarmed with the sudden news of an invasion from France. Lewis XIV. after having tried every method to bring the allies to a compliance with his proposals, resolved to attempt an invasion of Great Britain. The undertaking was certainly a very bold one, considering the weak state of his maritime forces, and the powerful fleets with which we then covered the seas; but though the success was doubtful, it was not quite destitute of probability: those of the Scots who were averse to the union, could not without indignation behold themselves reduced to a state of dependence on the English; and they thought no means so likely to shake off the yoke, as by bringing about a revolution in the government. With this view, they had proposed an expedition in favour of the pretender, whom they styled James III. and promised to join him with thirty thousand men in arms, to fight his cause, if he would only land at Edinburgh, with some few succours from France.

Lewis readily fell in with the proposal, hoping, if he could excite a rebellion in England, it would prevent us from contributing our proportion towards the prosecution of the war; though he pretended that his sole design was to make the same efforts in behalf of the pretender, who had now assumed the title of the Chevalier de St. George, which he had done for the father. Accordingly in the month of March, 1708, eight ships of the line and seventy transports were got ready at Dunkirk, and six thousand men were embarked on board them. The count de Gacé had the command of the troops, and the chevalier de Fourbin Janson, one of the best sea-officers of his time, that of the fleet. Every thing seemed favourable for their design; there were not above three thousand regular troops in Scotland: England was left defenceless, its soldiers being all engaged on the continent. This expedition was exactly like that in 1744, in favour of the grandson of James II. It was impeded by several accidents, and discovered by the government; whereupon orders were given for assembling a strong squadron of men of war, which were sent under the command of sir George Byng and the lord Dursley, to lie off Dunkirk, and wait the motions of the French: but the English admirals being driven off their station by violent gales of wind, were forced to return into the Downs; and the French took the advantage of the very winds which drove them over to the British shore, to sail out of their harbours, with the pretender and twelve French and Irish battalions on board, and proceeded for the coast of Scotland.

In the mean time both houses of parliament (who had been made acquainted, by the queen's order, with what the enemy was meditating against her dominions) addressed her majesty, beseeching her her to take care of her royal person; promising to stand by her with their lives and fortunes, in maintenance of her own undoubted right and title, against the pretended prince of Wales and all her enemies. A bill was also brought in for suspending the Habeas corpus act till October, with relation to persons taken up by the government on suspicion: a proclamation was issued, declaring the pretender, his accomplices and adherents, traitors and rebels, and for apprehending them; with such other necessary precautions as the exigence of the circumstance dictated.

On the other hand the fleet, under the command of sir George Byng, which had put back to the Downs, being reinforced to forty ships of the line, set sail for Dunkirk again; and on his way the admiral received intelligence, by an Ostend ship, dispatched by major-general Cadogan, who, upon the first news of the intended invasion, had been dispatched to Brussels, in order to ship off the English forces in garrison in the Netherlands for England, that the Dunkirk squadron was sailed northward. Whereupon a council of war was held, and it was resolved to pursue the enemy, whose design they judged to be against Edinburgh: accordingly sir George Byng, after having detached a squadron under admiral Baker, to convoy the troops from Ostend to England, began to give chase to the enemy with the rest of the fleet.

The queen having acquainted the parliament, in a speech, of the French fleet being sailed from Dunkirk, and of sir George Byng's being sent in pursuit of them; as also that ten battalions of her troops were coming over from Ostend, for the protection of her dominions; both houses presented warm addresses, importing, that they would stand by and assist her majesty against all her enemies: that the small number of ships and troops employed in this projected invasion, while it raised the contempt and indignation of all her majesty's faithful and loyal subjects, shewed, at the same time, that the chief prospect of success, which the enemy entertained, depended on their hopes of assistance from some of her subjects, whose restless passions, and arbitrary principles, had for several years engaged them in laying designs to undermine and destroy the best form of government that ever was established in this island; and that, as the present crisis would effectually distinguish her real from her pretended friends, they hoped she would encourage the one, and discountenance the other, and would never listen to the suggestions of any, who endeavoured to excite a jealousy and distrust of those, who, ever since the Revolution, had been most steady and firm to the interest of the late king, and to that of her majesty.

Addresses on the same occasion were sent up from different parts of the kingdom, all which the queen received with tokens of high satisfaction. In the mean time she left no endeavours unexerted to defeat the designs of her enemies. Several regiments of foot, with some squadrons of cavalry, sent from Flanders and other parts, were sent towards Scotland; while the earl of Leven, commander in chief of the forces in that country, and governor of the castle of Edinburgh, put that fortress in a posture of defence, and made the proper dispositions to oppose the pretender at his landing.

The French fleet arrived at Edinburgh Frith the twenty-third of March, N. S. and late the same night sir George Byng came to the same place, so great had been his vigilance and dispatch in pursuit of the enemy; who were so confounded at his sudden appearance, that they immediately crowded all the sail they could, and favoured by the darkness of the night and a land-breeze, stood out to sea: as soon as the day broke, the English admiral descried them in the offing, upon which he made a signal for all the ships under his command to slip their cables, and give chase; but the enemy having got the start of them by some miles, and their ships being cleaner than our's, sir George could come up but with one of them, which was the Salisbury, a prize the French had taken from us, on board of which were the lord Griffin, the lord Clermont, Mr. Middleton, the marquis de Levi a French lieutenant-general, with some other French and Irish officers, and five companies of French soldiers. And sir George having followed the rest of the fleet till he lost sight of them, returned to Edinburgh Frith with his prisoners, who being afterwards brought to London, the lord Griffin was committed to the Tower, with the rest of the prisoners of distinction; and his lordship having been attainted in the last reign for high-treason, execution was awarded against him by the court of Queen's Bench: but her majesty being pleased to reprieve him from time to time, he died at length in the Tower.

All the noblemen and persons of distinction in Scotland, suspected of disaffection to the government, were apprehended, and either imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh, or brought up to London, to be confined in the Tower or in Newgate. Among these was duke Hamilton, who, according to Lockhart, in his Memoirs, had solemnly promised to join the pretender at the instant he should land. On the duke's being brought to London, he found means to make his court to the Whigs so effectually, by promising to join with them and their friends in Scotland, in the election of peers for the parliament of Great Britain, that he prevailed on them not only to procure his, but all the other prisoners liberty, upon bail, which was likewise soon remitted. This was a nice step in the duke; and if he had not hit upon this favourable conjuncture, and managed it with great address, fatal consequences would probably have ensued to him and his friends. It is certain they were Whig lords who bailed the duke himself, three of which were the duke of Newcastle, the earl of Wharton, and the lord Halifax. Some writers, indeed, have affected to attribute the duke's release to another cause, namely, that he was the person who first revealed the secret of the intended invasion to the English court: this time alone must unriddle.

But of all the idle reports raised by the breath of faction to mislead a weak and captious populace, no notion could certainly be more absurd than that which some historians have endeavoured to propagate, who pretend that queen Anne herself was engaged in a correspondence with her pretended brother in this affair. It is absolute folly to suppose that she should invite her competitor to the crown to come and dethrone her. What might have been the consequences of this invasion, had it actually taken effect, it is hard to determine; but as it was happily suppressed in embryo, the only inconvenience it produced, was, that it occasioned a considerable run upon the Bank of England, which was like to have affected the credit of the nation. In order to prevent this public calamity, the commons on the twentieth of March passed the following useful and seasonable vote: "That whoever designedly endeavoured to destroy or lessen the public credit, especially at a time when the kingdom was in danger of an invasion, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, and an enemy to her majesty and the kingdom." The lord-treasurer also signified to the directors of the Bank, that her majesty would allow, for six months, an interest of six per cent. upon their bills; which was double the usual rate; and considerable sums of money were offered them by several opulent noblemen and gentlemen; and the directors, on their parts, having called in twenty per cent. upon their capital stock, they were soon in a condition to answer all demands made upon them by the timorous, the envious, or the disaffected.

This session of parliament, during its continuance, exerted itself in a very laudable manner for the service of the public, by enquiring into every kind of mismanagement, real or supposed, that fell within its cognizance. Both houses took into consideration the military proceedings and negotiations of the earl of Peterborough, together with his disposal of the remittances during his having the command in Spain; when his lordship produced such a number of witnesses and original papers to justify his conduct, that his character triumphed in the enquiry: however, seeing that a party-spirit had been raised up against him, his lordship chose to resign all his employments. The parliament next took cognizance of the affairs of Spain, and found there had been a great deficiency in the English troops at the battle of Almanza; for out of near thirty thousand men provided by parliament for the service of Spain and Portugal in the year 1707, there were but eight thousand six hundred and sixty-nine men, besides officers and servants, at the time of that battle. This was represented to the queen in an address, who returned an answer thereto so much to their satisfaction, that they voted another address, in which they thanked her majesty for the measures she had taken to restore the affairs of Spain, and provide foreign troops for the service. A bill was also brought in and passed both houses for rendering the union of the two kingdoms more entire and compleat; whereby it was enacted, "That after the first of May, 1708, there should be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great Britain: that justices of the peace in Scotland should have the same authority as those in England: that circuit-courts shall be held twice a year in Scotland; and that the forty-five representatives of Scotland in the British house of commons shall be chosen by virtue of writs under the great-seal of Great Britain, and returned as in England." A court of Exchequer was likewise erected in Scotland upon the model of that of England.

The parliament having at length gone through all the business before them, her majesty came to the house of commons on the first of April, and prorogued the parliament to the thirtieth of the same month, and it was afterwards dissolved by proclamation. The most material acts passed this session, besides those already mentioned, were, "An act for the security of her majesty's person and government, and of the succession of the crown in the protestant line," which declares it to be treason in any one to impeach the act of settlement; enacts, that the parliament shall continue to sit six months after the demise of the queen or her successors; appoints a regency on such demise; and empowers all officers and ministers for the time being to continue to act six months after such event, unless removed by the successor, as in the former act of settlement. An act, declaring in what manner Scots peers were to be elected*. An act for the encouragement of the trade in America; by which, amongst other things, it was enacted, That every seaman, being a foreigner, who should faithfully serve on board any ship of war belonging to Great Britain, for two years, should be deemed a natural-born subject.

After the dissolution of the parliament, writs were issued out for new elections, together with a proclamation commanding all the peers of North Britain to assemble at Holy-rood-house in Edinburgh on the seventeenth day of June, to elect sixteen peers to represent them in the ensuing British parliament, pursuant to the twenty-second article of the treaty of union. The privy-council of Scotland was dissolved, and a new one constituted for the whole united kingdom†. The duke of Queensberry was created a British peer, by the titles of baron of Rippon, marquis of Beverley, and duke of Dover; and the office of secretary of war, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Henry St. John, was bestowed upon Mr. Robert Walpole, a gentleman of very quick parts, masterly elocution, and one who made a considerable figure in the two succeeding reigns.

About the same time a proclamation was issued for distributing prizes in certain proportions, amongst the officers and seamen of the royal navy, a regulation that still prevails. The capture was divided into eight equal shares, of which the captain, if not under the command of an admiral, or other superior officer, was to have three shares; but in the latter case, the admiral or commodore was to have one of the three. The commission-officers and master were to have one eighth divided amongst them, the warrant-officers one, the petty-officers one, and the sailors the other two †. I proceed now to the military operations of the year 1708.

Lewis XIV. who for some time had the mortification to see his affairs grow worse and worse, thought that by sending the duke of Burgundy, his grandson, to head the army in Flanders, the presence of the heir-presumptive of the crown would excite the emulation of the troops, which began to droop. Accordingly, a numerous army was assembled in the Netherlands, under the command of this prince, and they gave him the duke of Vendosme as an assistant. It now happened, says M. de Voltaire, as it too frequently does, the experienced officer was not sufficiently listened to, and the prince's council frequently carried it against the general's reasons. The elector of Bavaria was appointed to the command of a separate army on the Rhine, where he was seconded by the duke of Berwick; and marshal Villeroy was sent to conduct the forces in Dauphiné.

As soon as the storm which had threatened Great Britain by the intended invasion was blown over, the duke of Marlborough went over to the Hague, where he was met by prince Eugene; and those two great generals conferred with the pensionary Heinsius and the deputies of the States-general: after which they repaired to the court of Hanover, where they persuaded the elector to be satisfied with acting upon the defensive in his command on the Rhine, and to part with some of his forces in order to enable the allies to make more vigorous efforts in the Netherlands.

The prince then repaired to the imperial court, and the duke returned to Flanders, where, about the latter end of May, he assembled the army, consisting of one hundred and fifty squadrons of horse, and one hundred and twelve battalions of infantry. The French army under the duke of Burgundy amounted to one hundred and ninety-seven squadrons, and one hundred twenty-four battalions. Thus superior to the allies in number, and headed by a prince of the blood, it was thought they would make some striking effort: they opened the campaign indeed with a prospect of great success; for the Flemings being generally better affected to the French than to the Dutch, and having a very great respect for the elector of Bavaria, their late governor, that prince easily persuaded them to take up arms against the confederates. Accordingly, the troops of the latter being marched from Ghent, Bruges, and the neighbouring garrisons, to the general rendezvous, leaving only the country militia, or the burghers, to guard the gates; on the appearance of a detachment of French troops, those places surrendered without striking a blow, and the French advanced to Dutch Flanders, and laid that country under contribution.

Upon the news of these successes, the duke of Marlborough wrote to prince Eugene to hasten to him, determined to oblige the enemy to come to a battle, as the only means, in his opinion, to prevent their farther progress, which might end in cutting off the communication of the allies with Brabant. Hereupon prince Eugene began his march, with a considerable body of troops, towards the Moselle; but this was only with a view to amuse the French who were in those parts, and give time to the elector of Hanover to advance towards the Rhine; after which prince Eugene quitted the banks of the Moselle, where he had no magazines, and repaired to join the duke of Marlborough in Flanders; when a council of war being held, it was resolved to pass the Dender, and offer the enemy battle. In the mean time, the dukes of Burgundy and Berry, and the duke of Vendosme, thinking themselves an over-match for the confederates, resolved upon the siege of Oudenarde §; and accordingly they caused that place to be invested on the ninth of July, hoping to subdue it before the allies could be reinforced.

The duke of Marlborough was immediately in motion, and marched with surprising expedition to the relief of the place. On the approach of the allies the French thought fit to raise the siege, and began to cross the Scheld at Gavre; which the duke of Marlborough perceiving, and being determined to bring them to a battle, detached general Cadogan with sixteen battalions and eight squadrons over night to take post on the other side the Scheld, near Oudenarde, and to lay the bridges necessary for the passage of the rest of the army, which began to march about eight in the morning, and proceeded with such expedition, that by two in the afternoon the horse had reached the bridges, and soon after the army began to pass; but by this time the enemy, finding that we had taken post beyond the Scheld, resolved to strike off to the right towards Ghent. The duke of Vendosme was for the army forming itself, but the duke of Burgundy would not hear of it for some time. At length he halted upon the Height of Gaveren, and made a shew of marching back, in order to dispute the passage of the allies over the Scheld: he first ordered twenty squadrons of horse into the plain, but he soon after recalled them again, resolved to continue his march.

In the mean time, general Cadogan, with his detachment, fell upon seven battalions of foot, which the enemy had thrown into the hedges and into a village upon the Scheld, below Oudenard, called Heynem; and being afterwards reinforced by the foot, who now began to come up, the attack was made with so much vigour and success, that the enemy was soon driven out of the village; and our troops pursuing them with a close fire, a whole brigade, together with the brigadier, threw down their arms, and surrendered prisoners. The event of this skirmish convinced the duke of Burgundy that it would now be impossible to avoid a battle: he therefore endeavoured to disengage his troops from the hollow ways and defiles through which they were marching, in order to bring them into the plain, where they might be properly formed; but the confederate generals were too experienced to give him leisure to effect this purpose: their army was immediately formed in order of battle, and advanced to the charge. Hereupon the enemy faced about and formed also, but with great disorder, owing to the misunderstanding which prevailed between their generals the duke of Burgundy and the duke of Vendôme, the former continually countermanding what the other ordered.

At length the battle was begun about four o'clock in the afternoon, and lasted with great firmness till about ten at night. The fight was properly between the foot; but the confederates got ground, and drove the enemy from one post to another, till darkness put an end to the combat. The horse, who by reason of the broken ground, could not act, were detached to the right and left wing, and advanced so far, that they attacked the enemy in flank and rear; which when they perceived, they fell into the utmost confusion, and part of them retired with the baggage and artillery towards Deynse and Ghent, and another part by the road to Courtray. The duke of Vendôme seeing the French forces flying with the utmost precipitation, formed a rear-guard of about twenty-five squadrons and as many battalions, with which he secured his retreat. To this precaution was entirely owing the safety of their army; for the next morning at day-break the duke of Marlborough detached a large body of horse and foot under the lieutenant-generals Bulau and Lumley, to pursue the fugitives; but the hedges and ditches which skirted the road were lined with the French grenadiers in such a manner, that the cavalry could not form, and they were obliged to desist. The French reached Ghent about nine in the morning, and marching through the city, encamped at Lovendegen on the canal: there they thought proper to cast up intrenchments for their security, which they fortified with the artillery they had left at Gavre with their heavy baggage.

In this action, which was called the battle of Oudenarde, from the place near which it was fought, on the twelfth day of July, the electoral prince of Hanover (afterwards king George II.) gave early proofs of his martial disposition. He charged at the head of the Hanoverian dragoons with great intrepidity: his horse was shot under him, and one of his aids-de-camp killed by his side. About four thousand of the enemy were left dead on the field of battle, two thousand deserted, and above eight thousand were taken prisoners, including a great number of officers, together with ten pieces of cannon, above one hundred standards, six colours, eight pair of kettle-drums, and four thousand horse. The loss of the allies did not exceed two thousand men, among whom were one major-general, and a few inferior officers.

The duke of Vendôme having reinforced the garrisons of Ypres, Lille, and Tournay, remained quiet in his camp, to observe what enterprize the allies would next undertake, as he was pretty certain they would form the siege of some strong place, as Ypres, Lille, Mons, or Tournay; in which case he hoped to be able to return to Oudenarde, and make himself master of that town and of the Scheld, and so embarrass them in their operations.

The allies remained two days encamped on the field of battle, when the duke of Marlborough sent count Lottum with a detachment to level the French lines between Ypres and Warneion, and another was sent to raise contributions as far as Arras, while the rest of the army plundered the provinces of Picardy and Artois. All this was done with a view to draw Vendôme out of the advantageous post he occupied; but that general understood the art of war too well to be thus caught; upon which the allies determined to lay siege to Lille*.

To sit down before so large and well fortified a town as Lille without being master of Ghent, obliged to send for provisions and ammunition as far as Ostend, at the hazard of being every moment surprised, was what the French represented as an instance of the highest rashness and presumption, without reflecting that the misunderstanding and irresolution that prevailed in their own army rendered this enterprize very excusable; and it was justified in the end by the success. On the 13th of August the place was invested on one side by prince Eugene, and on the other by the prince of Orange Nassau, stadtholder of Friseland, while the duke of Marlborough encamped at Helchin to cover the siege. The town, the strongest in all Flanders, was furnished with every kind of necessary, store of ammunition, and the garrison was reinforced by twenty-one battalions of the best troops in France, commanded by marechal Boufflers in person. The trenches were opened on the 22d day of August, and the attacks carried on with amazing vigour.

By this time the dukes of Burgundy and Berry being joined by the duke of Berwick with a powerful reinforcement, which augmented their army to twelve thousand men, it was resolved to try every effort to oblige the confederates to raise the siege. The duke of Vendôme was of opinion to march without loss of time and give battle to the allies. Indeed every one thought the duke of Burgundy rather in a condition to besiege Marlborough and Eugene, than that general to besiege Lisle. Vendosme's advice, however, was not hearkened to, and such were the altercations between the two generals, that the French king thought it necessary to dispatch Mr. Chamillard, secretary of war, to examine whether it was proper to give the allies battle or not; the latter, it is certain, resolved not to fight if they could possibly avoid it. The duke of Burgundy and Vendosme marched towards the duke of Marlborough, and for several days cannonaded his camp; whereupon prince Eugene joined him with a considerable body of horse and foot from the siege; but the allies finding the design of the enemy was only to retard the siege, the duke of Marlborough intrenched himself, and prince Eugene returned to Lisle, where the siege went on but slowly, the French disputing every inch of ground with the most obstinate bravery. The French generals finding all their endeavours to bring the confederates to an engagement prove fruitless, and not daring to attack the duke in his strong camp, contented themselves with disposing of their troops in such a manner as to cut off the convoys that might be coming with provisions and ammunition to the besiegers, as well as to cover those provinces that lay exposed to the incursions of our army.

Accordingly, having received advice that the duke of Marlborough had sent a detachment to cover the march of seven hundred waggons with supplies from Ostend to prince Eugene's camp, the duke of Burgundy sent an army of twenty-two thousand men to make themselves masters of it; when, incredible to relate, the party which guarded it, tho' not exceeding six thousand, made so gallant a defence under major-general Webb, that they compelled the enemy to retire with the loss of upwards of seven thousand men killed on the spot. This action, generally called the battle of Wynendale*, was one of the most glorious achievements performed during the whole course of the war, and proved of infinite importance to the allies; since, if the convoy had been taken, the siege must have been raised. Much about the same time, the elector of Bavaria suffered a check before Brussels, which he had assaulted with a body of ten thousand men; but was repulsed with great loss by the garrison; and hearing that the duke of Marlborough was marching towards him, he thought fit to retreat with great precipitation.

Mean while the besiegers prosecuted their operations with such incredible fury, that the garrison was unable to resist their attacks. All this, however, could not be done without a very considerable loss on the side of the besiegers; the allies themselves acknowledged, that at the attack on the counterscarp on the seventh of September, they lost no less than two thousand men, either killed or wounded, and amongst them sixteen engineers; and at the storming the outworks, September the twenty-first, it is confessed they lost one thousand more. In this last affair prince Eugene was wounded in the head with a musket-ball, which grazed upon his skull, and confined him to his tent for some days, during which time the duke of Marlborough commanded at the siege. On the thirtieth of September prince Eugene being recovered of his wound, visited the trenches, and continued the operations with the usual vigour. Marshal de Boufflers did every thing that could be expected from a brave and experienced officer; but the allies having, after a most bloody and obstinate action, made themselves masters of the covered way, prince Eugene caused a battery of fifty pieces of cannon to be raised thereon, which played with such incredible fury upon the curtain, that in less than twelve hours a breach was made sufficient for an assault. Every thing was accordingly prepared for beginning it, when, on the twenty-second of October, marshal Boufflers demanded a capitulation for the town. A mutual exchange of hostages were made, and prince Eugene, in consideration of the gallant defence the French general had made, left it to him to propose his own terms. On this occasion the prince wrote the marshal the following letter:

“S I R,

“This is to congratulate you on the noble defence you have made, and at the same time to assure you how perfect an esteem I entertain for your person, of which I am desirous to give you a proof, by leaving it to yourself to draw up the articles of capitulation in such manner as you shall think proper, protesting to you that I will not make any alteration therein, unless I should find any thing required contrary to my honour and duty; but this is what I can have no reason to apprehend from so brave a person.”

The prince was as good as his promise, excepting in regard to one article only, whereby it was stipulated, that the citadel should not be attacked from the town; he, however, gave a verbal promise to that effect, which he strictly observed.

On the twenty-fifth of October prince Eugene entered the town in triumph, and the French garrison marched into the castle, which still continued to make a vigorous defence 'till a letter arrived from the French king to marshal Boufflers, wherein he highly praised him for his gallant behaviour, and gave him permission to surrender the citadel whenever he thought proper. Hereupon the marshal beat a parley on the eighth of December, and on the tenth marched out at the head of his garrison with the usual marks of honour, and was conducted to Douay; and, which is very extraordinary, the detachment which escorted them thither, took up their quarters in the town on the faith of the marshal's word, where they passed all the night, and met with all kind of civility and good treatment.

In the mean time the numerous army that had looked on under the dukes of Burgundy, Berwick, and Vendosme, while Lisle was taken, began to diminish by little and little; and having suffered the duke of Marlborough to take Ghent, then Bruges, and all the posts one after another, at last retreated to their own country; and the generals of the allies having settled the plan of winter quarters, repaired to the Hague, leaving the forces under the command of count Tilly. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene were every-where received with the highest acclamations and the most distinguished marks of honour. Medals were struck representing them under the characters of Castor and Pollux; the States-general had ordered most magnificent fire-works to be prepared to celebrate their arrival at the Hague; which being made known to the two generals, they requested that the money destined for that exhibition might be distributed amongst the brave soldiers who had been maimed and wounded during this bloody campaign*.

Little was done on the Upper Rhine this campaign: the electors of Bavaria and Hanover were opposed to each other there; but such large detachments had been made from both their armies, for Flanders, that neither side was in a condition to undertake any action of importance.

The duke of Savoy this year made himself master of Exilles and la Perouse, and of the Valley of St. Martin and Fenestrelles, which are looked upon as the keys of Italy on that side: he also made a diversion in favour of king Charles, by obliging the enemy to abandon Pignerole; and sent a large detachment from Rouffillon, to the assistance of marshal Villars, who was not able to make head against the duke.

The affairs of king Philip began to prosper after the battle of Almanza, on all sides. The duke of Orleans commanded the best part of the year; and, after making himself master of Tortosa, had certainly carried his conquests farther, if the French court had not thought proper to recall him; the reasons of which extraordinary step have been somewhat differently reported. It is alleged by some writers, that the princess of Ursini, who at that time entirely governed king Philip, fell into a correspondence with the enemies of the duke of Orleans at the French court, and, by a multitude of intrigues, rendered him suspected to his uncle, Lewis XIV. Others, again, as confidently affirm, that his royal highness held a secret correspondence with the allies, and had actually formed a project for supplanting king Philip. Whatever his political scheme might be, he certainly shewed himself an able politician, since by keeping count Staremberg employed in Catalonia, he gave the chevalier d'Asfeldt time to conquer Valencia. On the other hand, our ministry applied themselves in a particular manner, this year, to put his Catholic majesty's affairs into better order, and to repair, if it was possible, the untoward consequences of the fatal battle of Almanza. Sir John Leake, who commanded the grand fleet, was so early at sea, that by the twenty-seventh of March he was in Lisbon harbour: on the twenty-third of April he sailed from thence for Barcelona, with near twenty sail of the line, besides transports, where he arrived on the fifteenth of May. There was an absolute necessity of sending so strong a fleet to the relief of king Charles, who was now in a manner shut up in his city of Barcelona, and had no other hopes of being delivered, but by our fleet's transporting the German troops, that lay ready for his service in Italy. The first thing, therefore, that the admiral did, was to send the transports, under the protection of a strong squadron, to wait over those forces; after which it was determined to attempt the reduction of the island of Sardinia†. The conquest of this place was made almost as soon as projected: the admiral appeared before Cagliari, the capital town, on the first of August, O. S. After having bombarded it for a day and a night, general Wills landed, with about eight hundred men, and made the necessary dispositions for an attack, when the Spanish garrison saved his troops any farther trouble, by coming to a speedy capitulation. The reduction of this island was of great advantage to king Charles's affairs, as it enabled him to supply himself, as often as he had occasion, with corn and other provisions; the greatest part of the inhabitants also entered into his service‡.

Scarce had the English admiral completed this conquest, when his assistance was required towards another: general Stanhope (afterwards earl Stanhope and secretary of state) having formed a plan for the reduction of the island of Minorca¶, concerted with the admiral the measures necessary for carrying it into execution; when they obtained from count Staremberg, the commander in chief of the allied army in Spain, a few battalions of English, Spaniards, and Portuguese, with which the admiral and general set sail from Barcelona on the twenty-third of August, with a fine train of British artillery, and were accompanied by brigadier Webb and colonel Petit, an engineer of great reputation; and on the twenty-sixth, landed about two miles from fort St. Philip, with about three thousand men, and formed the siege of the town. The garrison consisted of one thousand Spaniards and six hundred French mariners: the siege was carried on with such vigour, that by the end of September, the place surrendered, and the garrison marched out, and were afterwards transported on board our vessels, some to France and others to Spain, according to the articles of the capitulation. Fort St. Philip being thus reduced, with the loss of only forty men, the rest of the island gladly submitted to the English government, and general Stanhope appointed colonel Petit governor of Fort St. Philip, and deputy-governor of the whole island. Being thus possessed of this important island, our government thought proper to keep it to themselves, as we had thereby the advantage of an excellent harbour, which during the war, was exceeding useful to us in the clean-island about six leagues from it), lies in the Mediterranean. Its greatest length is forty-five, and greatest breadth twenty-four English miles. The chief places are, 1. Citadella on the south-west side, about the middle of the island, in the bottom of a bay, thought to be the Samma of Ptolemy: 2. Fort Formelli, on the east side, over against Citadella: 3. ing and refitting such of our ships as were employed in the Mediterranean. The possession of this island was confirmed to the English by the treaty of Utrecht, and remained in our hands till the year 1756, when it was most strangely suffered to be retaken by the French, after a forty-nine years possession. After this important conquest, the general returned to the army in Spain, where an unsuccessful attempt to surprise Tortosa finished the operations of the campaign. Admiral Leake set sail, with the largest ships, for England, and arrived safely at St. Helen's on the nineteenth of October†.

Our trade was pretty well secured by sea this year, so that our merchants suffered very few losses: the cruisers were numerous and active; and convoys were regularly furnished, and of a proper strength. In the West Indies, commodore Wager had the good fortune to meet with a fleet of Spanish galleons off Carthagena; but, being ill seconded by some of his captains, most of the enemy's ships escaped; however, the Spanish admiral, computed to be worth three millions of pieces of eight, blew up in the engagement, and the commodore took the rear-admiral, which was very rich, the commodore's own share amounting to one hundred thousand pounds sterling. Two of the English captains, who had been wanting in their duty, were tried by a court martial, and degraded‡. It was the misfortune of the naval administration, during the greatest part of this reign, that men were preferred by interest rather than merit.

In the middle of the summer of this year, a resolution was taken to make a descent on, or at least to alarm, the coast of France; and sir George Byng, as admiral, and lord Dursley, as vice-admiral of the blue, were appointed to command the fleet destined for that purpose; and lieutenant-general Erle had the command of the land-forces.

On the twenty-ninth of July the fleet, with the transports having the troops on board which were intended for the descent, sailed from Spithead, and, after hovering some days upon the French coast, they anchored, on the eleventh of August, in the bay of La Hogue, with an intent to land the next day; but, upon reconnoitring the coast, they found so strong a force collected to oppose the descent, and so many forts and batteries in a condition to defend the shore, that it was deemed impracticable; upon which the fleet returned to Spithead, on the twenty-eighth of August: after thus alarming the French coast, the troops on board were, at the desire of the duke of Marlborough, landed at Ostend, on the twenty-third of September, and proved greatly instrumental in the reduction of Lisle. Another squadron of the British fleet, under the command of sir George Byng, carried over the archduchess Mary Anne, to be married to the king of Portugal, which ceremony was performed with great pomp and magnificence. She had a quick and easy passage, and arrived at Lisbon on the twenty-seventh of October¶.

Before I proceed to relate the domestic transactions of our own country, I think it requisite just to take notice that the elector-palatine was this year restored to the possession of the Upper Palatinate, with the title and rank which had been vested in the house of Bavaria by the treaty of Munster: and George-Lewis of Hanover (afterwards king George I. of Great Britain) was at length acknowledged as elector of Brunswick Lunenburg by the electoral college, to which dignity he had been raised by the interest of king William in the year 1692*.

The court of England was this summer involved in a very disagreeable altercation with the czar of Muscovy, on account of an insult offered to the person of his ambassador count Mattheoff, who was arrested in the street at the suit of one Morton, a laceman, and insolently treated by the bailiffs, who dragged him to a spunging-house, where he continued until he was bailed by the earl of Feversham and a merchant in the city. Enraged at this insult, he demanded redress of the government, and was seconded in his remonstrance by the ambassadors of the emperor, the king of Prussia, and several other foreign potentates. Notwithstanding all possible assurances were made him of satisfaction, and that the authors of this outrage were taken into custody, Mattheoff demanded a passport for himself and family, refused the presents that are usually made to ambassadors at their departure, and retired in disgust to Holland. The czar wrote a sharp letter to the queen, insisting upon her punishing with death all the persons concerned in offering this affront to the person of his ambassador; but as such a satisfaction could not be granted him consistent with the laws of England, the queen and her ministry were thrown into the utmost perplexity, and several councils were held to consider how to proceed in this critical situation.

On the twenty eighth of October, about ten in the forenoon, died his royal highness George prince of Denmark, lord high-admiral of Great Britain, and her majesty's consort, at Kensington, of an asthma, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was married to her majesty the twenty-eighth of July, 1683, and on the thirteenth of November, 1708, he was interred in the abbey-church of Westminster, at ten in the evening. Bishop Burnet gives us the following character of him: "This prince had shewn himself brave in war, both in Denmark and in Ireland: his temper was mild and gentle; he had made a good progress in mathematics; he had travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, and knew much more than he could well express, for he spoke acquired languages ill and ungracefully. His royal highness was very much lamented by those who knew him; and her majesty, who had been, during the whole course of her marriage, an extraordinary tender and affectionate wife, was inconsolable for his loss; they had indeed been the happiest pair that ever adorned a court." Her majesty was pleased to keep the admiralty in her own hands for about three weeks, and on the twenty-fifth of November she appointed Thomas earl of Pembroke lord high admiral of Great Britain and Ireland, to the great satisfaction of the whole nation.

This event was followed by some changes in the ministry: the earl of Wharton was constituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland, the lord Somers appointed president of the council, and the earl of Dorset was made constable of Dover castle, and lord-warden of the Cinque-ports. Notwithstanding these promotions of Whig noblemen, the duke of Marlborough declined apace in his credit with the queen, who was privately under the direction of Mr. Harley and the Tory party.

The new parliament (being the second of Great Britain) met the second of November, when the Whigs appeared to have a great majority. The queen, not thinking it decent to appear in the house so soon after the death of her consort, appointed, by a commission under the great-seal, the archbishop of Canterbury, the chancellor, the lord-steward, and the master of the horse, to represent her royal person, and to open the session. Sir Richard Onslow being chosen speaker of the lower house, received the queen's approbation. After which the lord chancellor made a speech to both houses, importing, "That the commissioners were appointed by her majesty to acquaint them, that she expected they would continue to prosecute the war with the same vigour and resolution, with which it had hitherto been conducted: that she hoped they would enable her to make such augmentation of her forces as they should judge necessary for preserving and improving the advantages which the allies had gained in the Netherlands: that she desired they would prepare such bills as might confirm and perfect the union: that, if they would propose means for the advancement of trade and manufactures, she would take pleasure in enacting such provisions; and that, as she had the most sincere regard for the preservation of their liberties and the support of the protestant succession, she would continue to exert her utmost endeavours to defeat the designs of the pretender, and of all his open and secret abettors †."

The addresses of condolance, both of lords and commons, to her majesty, for the death of the prince her consort, and those of congratulation on the success of her arms under the duke of Marlborough, being matters of form, I shall pass them over, to come to other business of the parliament, the chief of which was concerning the supply, the Scots elections and invasions, the naturalization of foreign protestants, and the trials of treason in Scotland.

Having considered the different branches of the supply, they approved of an augmentation of ten thousand men as necessary for the more vigorous prosecution of the war; and they voted above seven millions for the service of the ensuing year, which was to be raised by a land-tax of four shillings in the pound, the duty on malt, and other articles: these funds however would have fallen very short of the sum voted, had not the bank of England agreed to circulate two millions five hundred thousand pounds in Exchequer-bills for the government, on condition that the term of their continuance as a bank should be prolonged for twenty-one years, from the first of August, 1711, and their stock of two millions two hundred and one thousand one hundred and seventy-one pounds should be doubled by a new subscription:

the two-third subsidy was appropriated for the interest of the money raised by this expedient.

The Scottish elections occasioned great debates in both houses; the question chiefly turned upon this point, Whether the eldest sons of Scottish peers were capable of sitting in the British parliament? What was principally urged against them was, their incapacity to sit in the parliament of Scotland before the union, and therefore ought to be so in respect to the parliament of Great Britain. Council was heard in behalf of the claimants; but little being offered on their side against this argument, the eldest sons of the peers of Scotland were declared incapable to sit in parliament. In consequence of this decision, given in the month of December, the speaker was ordered to issue writs for electing new members for the shires of Aberdeen and Linlithgow, in the room of William lord Haddo, and James lord Johnston, the first eldest son to the earl of Aberdeen, and the other of the marquis of Annandale ‡. A petition, of a new nature, was much about the same time brought into the house of lords by some Scottish peers, claiming a right to vote and sign proxies in the election of the sixteen peers of Scotland. There were very warm debates in the house upon this subject; but at length, upon a division, it was carried, "That a Scottish lord, created a peer of Great Britain, should no longer retain his vote in Scotland; and that the noblemen who were under confinement in the castle of Edinburgh, under suspicion of being concerned in the late invasion, had a right to sign proxies, after having taken the oaths to the government."

But the principal affair that came under parliamentary consideration this session was, the naturalization of foreign protestants. This point was debated with great vehemence in both houses, and many shrewd arguments were advanced on both sides of the question. The Whigs spoke in favour of the bill; the Tories argued against it: the former affirmed that it would prove an effectual means to encourage industry, improve trade and manufactures, and repair the waste of men which the war had occasioned. They instanced the conduct of the king of Prussia, who by inviting the French refugees to settle in his dominions, had fertilized a barren and ill-peopled country, improved its trade and manufactures, augmented its revenues, and procured many other considerable benefits. But the chief motive of the Whigs in pushing this bill, was to throw an addition of foreigners into the balance against the landed interest. The opposers of an act of naturalization objected thereto, that such a swarm of aliens as such a measure would necessarily bring over, might bring with them many dangerous consequences to the constitution; that it was in fact inviting so many spies and informers amongst us, since it could not be supposed that they would leave all affection for their mother-country behind them, though they might gladly embrace for the present the asylum offered them here. It was said, they would find means to insinuate themselves into many places of trust and profit, and even to seats in the great assembly of the national representatives, and by frequent inter-marriages, contribute to the extinction of the English race. Lastly, that they would greatly increase the number of our poor, already so great a burthen to this country, and take out of the mouths of English tradesmen and labourers great part of the bread they now earned by their industry *. Cogent as these arguments appeared to be, the Whigs carried their point, and the bill, with some amendments, passed through both houses, and was at last confirmed by the royal assent †, though not without a number of protests entered by the Tory members, particularly the duke of Buckingham, and the lords Nottingham, Guernsey, Scarfdale, North, Grey, Anglesey, and Guildford.

Part of the time of the lords, as well as of the commons, was taken up in examining papers about the pretender's invasion. The Tories were for charging the ministry with great neglect of duty, in not providing timely and effectually against it. Those attacks, however, served only to betray the animosity, as well as weakness, of their party; for the Whigs having the lead in parliament, it was resolved by a great majority that the ministry had behaved with all the care and fidelity which could reasonably be expected from men in their station. This enquiry however gave rise to a bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason in Scotland: it was brought in under the title of "An act for improving the union of the two kingdoms." By this law trials for treason in Scotland were to be conducted in the same manner as in England, with some small variation. This bill was warmly opposed by the Scottish members; but maugre all their efforts, it passed rapidly thro' both houses, and finally passed into a law; to render which the more palatable, her majesty was pleased to grant an act of grace, by which all treasons were pardoned, except those committed on the high-seas; and an excepting clause was enforced against those who had been aiding and assisting to the pretender, in his embarkation for his last expedition against this country ‡.

On the first of March 1709, the duke of Marlborough came over from Flanders, when the lords gave him the thanks of their house for his great services this campaign; and it being conjectured that he had brought over some proposals of peace, both houses addressed her majesty on this subject, wherein they desire her majesty, that the French king may be obliged to own her title and the protestant succession, and that the pretender may be removed out of his dominions, never to return again, and that the harbour of Dunkirk and its fortifications might be demolished.

An order of council having been made about this time for leaving out the prayer for the queen's having issue, on presumption that her majesty would continue in the state of widowhood; Mr. Watson, son to lord Rockingham, moved in the lower house to address her majesty, "That she would not suffer her just grief to prevail so far, but that she would, in compliance with the earnest wishes of her subjects, entertain thoughts of a second marriage." This motion was carried, and the address actually presented to the queen, who returned for answer, "That the provision she had made for the protestant succession would always be a proof of her hearty concern for the happiness of the nation; but that the subject of their address was of such a nature, that she was persuaded they did not expect a particular answer:" a most gracious and prudent reply to a very impertinent and ill-timed address.

The affair of the Muscovitish ambassador, which still continued greatly to embarrass the queen and council, gave occasion to the bringing in and passing a bill in both houses, for preserving the privileges of ambassadors and other foreign ministers. By this act the persons of ambassadors, and those of their servants, were effectually secured from the danger of arrest; though with this reasonable exception in favour of tradesmen, that no person should be prosecuted for arresting the servant of an ambassador or public minister, unless the name of such servant was first registered in the office of one of the secretaries of state, and by him transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who should hang it up in some conspicuous place in their office. Her majesty also thought proper some time after to make solemn excuses by her ambassador at the Russian court (Mr. Whitworth) to repair Mattheoff's honour by a letter, to order the offenders to be severely prosecuted, and to indemnify the ambassador for all his costs and damages, concessions with which the czar and his ambassador declared themselves well satisfied; and thus this troublesome affair ended.

These were the transactions of this session of parliament, which was prorogued on the first of April by the lord-chancellor, in virtue of a commission from her majesty, who still continued indisposed.

In consequence of the naturalization act, there came over in the month of May this year near seven thousand of the poor Palatines and Swabians from the borders of the Rhine in Germany, who had been utterly ruined, and driven from their habitations by the French. It was never known who encouraged them to this emigration. Certain it is, there was no settled or concerted plan for their establishment any where. Had they been all sent to some of our colonies on the continent of America, they would probably before now have raised a considerable addition to our strength in those parts. It was proposed by some to settle them in the new forest of Hampshire, where land might be parcelled out for them by shares or lots. Upon ment, and attested by two credible witnesses.

the whole, it was an ill conducted, though it might be a well meant affair. Being however come, there was a necessity of keeping them from perishing: a sufficient number of tents was erected for them on Blackheath and near Camberwell, and a brief was granted throughout Great Britain for a collection for them. Some were taken into private houses; 500 families of them were sent into Ireland, where twenty-four thousand pounds were granted by parliament for their support. Three thousand of them were at length sent over to New-York, and settled upon Hudson's river; but being badly received there, many of them removed to Pennsylvania, where they were kindly entertained by the quakers, which afterwards proved the means of drawing thither many thousands of German and Swiss protestants, whereby Pennsylvania is since become by far the most populous and flourishing colony for its standing of any in British America*.

This year her majesty thought proper, on account of the great multiplication of business, to appoint a third secretary of state; and accordingly James duke of Queensberry and Dover was sworn into that office.

France was now not only compleatly humbled, but even trembled for its own safety. Resources began to fail, credit was at a stand; and the people, who had idolized their monarch in his prosperity, began to murmur against him when he became unfortunate. The severity of the winter completed the despair of the nation. The olive trees, which bring in a great deal of money in the south of France, were all destroyed; almost all the fruit-trees were killed by the frost†: there were no hopes of an harvest, and there was little corn in the granaries; and what could be brought at a very great distance from the sea-port towns of the Levant and the coast of Barbary, was liable to be taken by the fleets of the confederates, to whom the French had hardly any ships to oppose. On the other hand, the allies were still fruitful in resources, especially the Dutch, who had been so long the carriers of other nations, that they had magazines sufficiently stored to supply the strongest armies the allies could bring into the field in a plentiful manner, while the French troops, diminished and disheartened, seemed ready to perish for want.

Under these fatal circumstances, Lewis determined to sacrifice all the considerations of pride and ambition, as well as the interest of his grandson, to his desire of peace, which was become so necessary and indispensable. Accordingly, in the beginning of the year 1709, he dispatched the president Rouillé privately to Holland with general proposals of peace, and the offers of a good barrier to the States-general, in hopes by those offers to detach them from the confederacy. This minister had a secret conference with Buys and Vanderdussen, the pensionaries of Amsterdam and Gouda, at Mardyke; from whence he was permitted to proceed to Woerden, a place between Leyden and Utrecht. The states, unwilling to take any steps in an affair of this nature without the participation of their allies, communicated the proposals of France to the courts of Vienna and Great Britain; whereupon prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough went over to the Hague in the beginning of April, and conferred with the grand pensionary Heinsius, Buys, and Vanderdussen, on the subject of the French proposals, which were deemed unsatisfactory.

Lewis then sent the marquis de Torcy, his secretary for foreign affairs, to the Hague, with fresh offers. By this time the queen had sent over the lord viscount Townshend as her ambassador-extraordinary and joint plenipotentiary with his grace the duke of Marlborough. The conferences began about the middle of May; but, considering the disposition of the victors, very little was to be expected from them. Prince Eugene, Marlborough, and the pensionary Heinsius, were all three for continuing the war: the prince, because it at once gratified his glory and his revenge; Marlborough, because he gained both reputation and immense riches, of which he was equally fond; the third, who was guided by the other two, took a secret pleasure in returning upon the minister of the proudest of all princes, the arrogance with which his republic had been treated in 1672. The offers made by the French minister in his master's name were as follow; "That Lewis would consent to the demolition of Dunkirk; that he would abandon the pretender, and dismiss him from his dominions; that he would acknowledge the queen's title and the protestant succession; that he would renounce all pretensions to the Spanish monarchy, and cede the places in the Netherlands which the States-general demanded for their barrier; that he would treat with the emperor on the footing of the treaty of Ryswick, and even demolish the fortifications of Strasburgh." The ministers of the allies spoke in the stile of conquerors; and without taking any notice of the French king's conditions, demanded the restitution of the Upper and Lower Alsace to the empire, and insisted upon Lewis restoring Strasburg in its present condition; upon his ceding the town and castellany of Lisle, demolishing Dunkirk, New Brisac, Fort Louis, and Hunningen: they even went so far as to require that he should assist in driving his grandson from the throne of Spain within two months; and that, as a surety for his performance of this treaty, he should begin by ceding to the States-general for ever ten towns in Flanders, among which was Tournay, not yet taken. "Lewis little expected (says a celebrated French writer‡) some years before, when he refused a company of horse to prince Eugene||, when Churchill was only a colonel in the English army, and the name of Heinsius was hardly known, that one day these three men should impose such laws upon him." Indeed candour

† The scourge of this dreadful winter was general all over Europe: with us it began to freeze the night before Christmas-day, and was followed by great and heavy snows. The weather was mostly dark and gloomy: the frost lasted three months, during which time many cattle, especially sheep, and likewise birds, perished. The Thames was frozen over, and on the third of January people began to erect booths and set up tents on the ice. The summer which succeeded this frost was very near as comfortable as the winter, by reason of the coldness and moisture of the air, pouring almost continual rains on the earth, which, as it retarded the maturity of the fruits, so in many places it occasioned a thin harvest, and consequently a scarcity of corn.

obliges us to confess, however we may detest the artifice and duplicity of the French in most of their political dealings, that these were rather the demands of persons rendered proud and wanton by success, than the endeavours of patriots and friends to mankind, to remedy the evils and inconveniences of a long, bloody, and expensive war, by a just and equitable peace. In vain did Torcy make use of every argument to obtain less rigorous terms; in vain had he recourse to soothing supplications and concessions in the name of his sovereign: he found the plenipotentiaries implacable, and therefore pretended to submit to these preliminaries, which were signed on the twenty-eighth of May, and Torcy returned to carry his master the orders of his enemies. Lewis XIV. received them with the mingled sentiments of grief, shame, and indignation: he rejected them with disdain, and now did what he had never before done towards his subjects: he exposed the extravagance and unreasonableness of the demands of the allies, in a circular letter addressed to his people; and after acquainting them with the farther burthens he was obliged to lay upon them, he endeavoured to excite their indignation, to rouse their honour, and even to move their pity. This procedure had the desired effect: the French, a people remarkable for their affection to their kings, though impoverished and half-starved by the war, resolved to expend their whole substance in his support, and rather to fight his battles without pay, than abandon him to the infamy of accepting such dishonourable terms ¶.

The preliminaries being thus rejected by the French king, the conferences were broken off, Rouillé was ordered to quit Holland in twenty-four hours, and the confederate generals resolved to open the campaign without farther delay.

Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough repaired to Flanders, and on the twenty-second of June the allied army was assembled on the plain of Lisse to the number of one hundred and ten thousand men. Lewis, on his part, sent the marshal Villars, whom the French stiled the Fortunate General, to replace Vendôme, and make head against his enemies. Villars took possession of a very advantageous camp on the plain of Lens, where he threw up such intrenchments, that the allies did not think fit to attack him, but resolved to open the campaign with the siege of Tournay*. Accordingly that place was invested by the confederate troops on the twenty-seventh of June, N. S. On the twenty-seventh of July the trenches were opened: the town itself was easily taken; but the citadel was so strong, both by art and nature, and the governor, lieutenant-general Surville, such an experienced officer, that, though he had a garrison of four thousand men only, and the place was scantily provided with provisions, he continued to hold out for the space of a month with incredible valour. As the besiegers proceeded by the method of sap, this siege proved extremely bloody, the miners on both sides frequently meeting underground, in the midst of mines and countermines, big with ruin and destruction. Of all the horrid scenes of war, this was the most dreadful: those who had braved death in every shape above-ground, were shocked at these encounters, and dreaded entering those dismal caverns, where they were not only in danger of being choked by rubbish, and perishing by the sword of the enemy, but very often by their friends, who were not easily to be distinguished from the foe. About four hundred of the confederates were blown into the air by the explosion of one of these mines. At length the besiegers having effected a breach, and made the necessary dispositions for a general assault on the second of September, the governor surrendered, upon condition that all the officers and soldiers should retain their swords and baggage, and be permitted to return into France, with this restriction, that they should not serve until a like number of officers and soldiers of the allies that were prisoners, should be exchanged for them, and that they should leave their colours and fire-arms behind them †.

Tournay being reduced, the allies next resolved upon the siege of Mons ‡. With this view prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough made the army pass the Scheld, and dispatched the prince of Hesse Cassel to attack the French lines from the Haine to the Sombre, which were abandoned at his approach. On the seventh of September, marshal Boufflers arrived in the French camp, and joined Villars, who, after making several motions, in order to cover Mons, posted himself behind the woods of la Merte and Trainiere, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. On the ninth the allies made a motion to the left, by which the two armies approached so near, that they began to cannonade each other. The French army amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand men, that of the confederates was nearly the same number: it being found impracticable to form the siege of Mons until the French were driven from their post, which they had fortified in the strongest manner, it was resolved to attack them at all events. This occasioned the bloodiest battle that ever was fought in Flanders. Accordingly, on the eleventh of September, in the morning, the duke ordered

* Tournay is one of the most ancient cities of Flanders; it had belonged, time out of mind, to France, till, in 1513, it was taken by king Henry VIII. of England. It was soon after restored by the intrigues of cardinal Woolsey. The Spaniards took it in 1618, and kept it till 1667, when it was retaken by Lewis XIV. This prince had spared no cost to fortify it, and had made it one of the strongest places in the Netherlands. It is very advantageously situated, of a great compass, and is divided by the Scheld, as the army that besieges it must also be, which is always very incommodious and dangerous. Tournay is a bishopric, under the archbishop of Cambray; about fifteen miles east of Lisse, twenty north-east of Douay, thirty-two almost west of Mons, and thirty south of Ghent.

‡ Mons, or Bergen, a very large, fine, strong, and rich city of the Austrian Netherlands, and the capital of Hainault, situated on a hill, at the junction of the Haine and Trouille. The country round it may be so overflowed as to render an enemy's approaches very difficult. The French took it in 1691, but ceded it to Spain by the treaty of Ryswick, in 1697; it was confirmed to the house of Austria by the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, and made part of the barrier. The French, under count Saxe, took this city in the late war; but it was restored by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, in 1748, after demolishing its fortifications. batteries to be erected on the wings and in the center, and prepared for the attack.

The duke of Marlborough commanded the right wing, composed of the English and German troops in English pay; prince Eugene was in the center, and baron Fagel and the prince of Orange on the left, with the Dutch. Marshal Villars took the command of the left wing of his army, and left the right to marshal Boufflers, who was his senior officer.

About eight o'clock in the morning the attack was began by general Schuylenberg and the duke of Argyll, from the right, at the head of eighty-six battalions, supported by twenty-two battalions under count Lotum: these fell upon the left of the enemy with such fury, that in spite of all the resistance they could make, which was indeed extremely obstinate and well maintained, they were, in less than an hour, driven from their entrenchments into the woods of Sart and Trainiere. The prince of Orange and baron Fagel, with thirty-six Dutch battalions, advanced against the right of the enemy, who were posted in the wood of la Merte, and had secured themselves in such a manner, by triple entrenchments, with lines, cannon, and trees laid across, that they seemed to be quite inaccessible. The battle was here fought with the most desperate courage on both sides: the Dutch obliged the French to quit the first entrenchment, but were repulsed from the second with great slaughter: the prince of Orange, in order to encourage his men, took a standard and planted it on the entrenchments, but not a man was found hardy enough to follow him. This gallant prince had two horses killed under him, most of his officers were either slain or disabled, and it is hard to say which side victory would have taken, had not marshal Villars, who had quitted his station to come and oppose the prince of Orange, received a wound in his knee, which obliged him to quit the field of battle, in order to have it dressed. The French, struck with this news, abated considerably in the vigour of their resistance; the prince of Orange returned to the charge with double fury, and at length forced the enemy's entrenchments, and drove them out of the wood into the plain, where their horse was all drawn up; and ours advancing upon them, the whole army engaged, and fought with great fury till three in the afternoon, when the French cavalry began to give way and retire. The allies pursued them to the defile of Bavay with great slaughter. Marshal Boufflers, who had taken the command upon the accident which had befallen marshal Villars, made a retreat in as good order as possible, with the assistance of the prince of Montmorenci, afterwards marshal Luxemburg. The French army rested between Quesnoi and Valenciennes: ours encamped upon the field of battle*.

It must be readily believed that the loss must have been very great on both sides, from so bloody a conflict. This was, indeed, the dearest victory the confederates had ever purchased, above eighteen thousand of them being either killed or wounded in the action, and among the former several officers of distinction: nevertheless the enemy had little reason to boast of their success; for, although they did not lose above eight or nine thousand men, they suffered the disgrace of a total defeat, and were so severely handled, that they were not able to make any other attempt to relieve Mons, which surrendered about the end of October; and the French not caring to hazard another battle, remained inactive during the rest of the campaign, which was closed about the middle of November, when both armies retired to winter-quarters. If the glory of a victory consists in the number of lives sacrificed to gain it, the allies had, indeed, great reason to plume themselves upon this: the greatest masters in the military art were, however, very liberal of their censures on the duke of Marlborough's conduct, for not attacking the enemy before they began to form their intrenchments: the battle would certainly have been less bloody, and the prospect of victory was far more favourable, as to render it almost impregnable. It must, however, be acknowledged, that few generals were less guilty of rash actions than the duke of Marlborough; and it was generally believed he had suffered himself to be over-persuaded by the Dutch generals, who were ever remarkably slow, and ridiculously cautious in all their motions†.

This year's campaign on the Rhine proved very inconsiderable: the court of Vienna had taken so little care to provide for its army there, that it was some time before the elector of Brunswick could be prevailed on to assume the command of them: at length, however, he put himself at their head; but the whole of the operations was confined to one sharp action between a detachment of the French army commanded by the count de Borgh, and a body of Germans under count Merci, on the twenty-sixth of August, N. S. in which about two thousand men were slain on each side, but without any manifest advantage to either party, farther than that the French obliged the count to abandon an enterprize he had formed upon the Franche Comté, and to repass the Rhine‡.

The campaign in Piedmont was equally inactive. Field-marshal count Thaun commanded the confederates in that quarter, the duke of Savoy having refused to take the field, on account of some differences between him and the emperor, occasioned by the latter's refusing to confirm Vigevano, and other dependencies in the Milanese, which had by agreement been made over to the duke. Count Thaun had formed the design of besieging Briançon; but the duke of Berwick, who commanded for the French, took such precautions, as effectually disconcerted the count's enterprize, who found himself obliged to repass the Alps, which he had crossed, and marched his troops into winter-quarters in Piedmont, towards the latter end of September §.

The most important transaction relating to Italy, this year, was the emperor's obliging the pope (Clement XI.) to acknowledge the archduke for king of Spain, which his holiness had hitherto delayed to do, under various pretexts, until he should see what turn the affairs of the house of Bourbon might take during this campaign. This Clement had, at the instigation of France, ventured to unsheathe the sword last year for a short time; but he had no sooner taken up arms, than he repented of it. He perceived the Romans were incapable of wielding the sword under a sacerdotal government; he therefore put Commachio (a small city and imperial fief in the duchy of Ferrara) into the emperor's hands, as a pledge of his future peaceable conduct, and acknowledged Charles as king of Spain, Naples, and Sicily*.

The military operations in Spain and Portugal were not by much so favourable to the allies, as those in Flanders. The castle of Alicant, garrisoned by two English regiments, had been besieged, and held out during the whole winter against a very numerous army of the enemy under count d'Asfeldt, with a very large train of heavy artillery, excellently supplied with ammunition: at length the city being absolutely untenable, colonel Richards, the commander, retired with his garrison into the castle, which had hitherto been deemed impregnable. There colonel Sibourg, a French refugee officer, took the command, determined to hold it out to the last extremity. At length d'Asfeldt, who conducted the siege, caused the solid rock on which the castle stands to be undermined, and having lodged fifteen hundred barrels of gunpowder therein, on the thirtieth of March summoned the castle to surrender on the most honourable terms; threatening however, if these were neglected, to shew no mercy to those who might fall into his hands; at the same time he desired the governor, Sibourg, to depute some of his most experienced engineers to examine the condition of the works. This offer was accepted, and the officers, at their return, assured the governor that nothing could preserve the whole castle from being carried up by the explosion, unless it took vent in their own counter-mines. D'Asfeldt had allowed Sibourg twenty-four hours to consider what he would do; the other remained firm to his purpose, and with an obstinacy which surprised the enemy, resolved to stand the explosion. The besiegers finding him immovable, set fire to the mine at the appointed hour. The centinels on the ramparts observing some smoke from the lighted matches and other combustible matter near the train, gave the alarm, upon which the governor ordered the guard to retire, and walked out to the parade, attended by several officers: the mine at last blew up, the whole rock felt the concussion, and opening suddenly under their feet, and closing suddenly again, buried them in the abyss; about fifty other persons were swallowed up in different quarters. After the loss of the governor and chief officers, the command fell to lieutenant-colonel d'Albeaume, of Sibourg's regiment, who immediately drew out a detachment of the whole garrison, and with it made a desperate sally upon the enemy, who thought hardly a man was alive within the place; as would in all probability have been the case, had not the force of the explosion forced a vent through the veins of the rock and the counter-mine. D'Albeaume still continued to defend the castle†.

At length, a squadron of eighteen English men of war, under the command of sir Edward Whitaker, sailed from Barcelona to the relief of the place, and came into Alicant road on the seventeenth of April, from whence they made a furious fire upon the town, and endeavoured to land some forces, to throw into the castle; but don Pedro de Ronquillo, who had taken the command thereof, on its being surrendered, had taken such measures to prevent their landing, that the English thought proper to desist from the design. General Stanhope, who commanded the land-forces on board the fleet, seeing the impossibility of relieving the place, sent a boat ashore with a flag of truce, and an officer with a letter to the Spanish governor, wherein he offered to surrender the castle of Alicant upon honourable terms, which was done accordingly; and thus Alicant was reduced, the only strong place that king Charles had in Valencia‡.

On the frontiers of Catalonia, general Staremberg not only maintained his ground, but even embarrassed the enemy. Having passed the river Segra in spite of all the opposition they could make, he reduced the fortress of Balaguer; and having left a strong garrison to keep possession thereof, repassed the river, and sent the forces into winter-quarters.

In Portugal, the earl of Galway, to whom the late defeat at Almanza does not appear to have taught more prudence and circumspection, ventured upon a second battle, in which he was as unsuccessful as in the former: the Portuguese, who composed the major part of his army, according to their usual behaviour, left the English to encounter the whole stress of the fight, who, notwithstanding their inferiority in numbers, sustained with an amazing intrepidity the charge of the Spanish army, under marshal de Bay, who defeated them with great slaughter, obliging them to retreat with great precipitation, leaving behind them their colours, cannon, and a great number of prisoners. This unfortunate action happened on the seventeenth of May, N. S. on the banks of the Caya, a river in the province of Estremadura, not many miles from Badajox§.

A fatal catastrophe befel the affairs of that martial and restless prince the king of Sweden, this summer: he attacked the czar of Muscovy at Pultowa, on the thirty-first of July, N. S. and received such a total defeat, that he lost his camp, artillery, and baggage: Charles himself, with a small number of attendants, passed the Nieper, and with great difficulty sheltered himself in the Turkish dominions, and settled at Bender, a town in Moldavia. A confederacy was now entered into by king Augustus, the kings of Denmark and Prussia, and the czar of Muscovy, to wrest from him his paternal dominions; which they would certainly have effected, had not the emperor, the English, and the Dutch prevented it, by entering into a guaranty for preserving the peace of the empire, by which means the Swedish dominions in Germany were secured¶.

Nothing of importance passed at sea this year. Towards the end of it, the earl of Pembroke, finding the management of naval affairs a load too heavy for him to bear, though he had discharged the office of lord high-admiral with universal approbation, resolved to lay it down. This high office was offered to the earl of Oxford, who absolutely refused it, though he declared himself at the same time ready to accept a share in the direction of the admiralty. The queen thought proper therefore to issue a commission, appointing the said earl of Oxford with sir John Leake, sir George Byng, George Doddington, and Paul Methuen, esquires, commissioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral of Great Britain and Ireland, in the room of the earl of Pembroke, on whom her majesty settled a yearly pension of three thousand pounds, payable out of the revenue of the post-office, in consideration of his great and faithful services. Soon after, Mathew Aylmer, esq. was appointed admiral and commander in chief of her majesty's navy; the lord Dursley, vice-admiral; and Charles Wager, esq. rear-admiral of the red; sir John Jennings admiral, and sir Edward Whitaker vice-admiral of the white; sir John Norris, admiral, and John Baker, esq. vice-admiral of the blue ¶.

Though the events of this summer had been more favourable to France than Lewis had reason to expect, yet the domestic affairs of that kingdom were still in so languid a state, that he once more solicited peace at the close of the campaign; but not in so suppliant a manner as before. His minister, Torcy, maintained a correspondence with Mr. Petkum, the duke of Holstein's resident at the Hague, and through him proposed to the States-general a renewal of the negotiation. Their High Mightinesses could not well help taking some notice of these overtures; however, they refused to grant passes for the French plenipotentiaries to come to the Hague, but permitted Petkum to make a journey to Versailles. In the mean time, Lewis, to inspire the allies with a good opinion of his sincerity, withdrew his troops from Spain, as if he meant to leave his grand-son to take care of his own interests. This step might possibly have wrought the effect upon the minds of the confederated powers which was intended by it, had not Philip, at the same time, published a manifesto, protesting against all that should be transacted at the Hague to his prejudice: he named the duke of Alva and count Bergheyc for his plenipotentiaries, and ordered them to notify their credentials in form to the maritime powers; but no regard was shewn to their intimation. Petkum, after a short stay at Versailles, returned to the Hague on the seventh of December, bringing with him a memorial, importing, that the French king was ready to acknowledge the archduke Charles for king of Spain; to withdraw all assistance from his grandson and leave him to his fate; to deliver up four towns as cautionary places; to restore Strasburgh and Brisac; to resign the sovereignty of Alsace; to demolish all the fortified places between Basil and Philipsburgh; to fill up the long formidable harbour of Dunkirk, and demolish its fortifications; and to leave Lille, Tournay, Ypres, Menin, Furnes, Condé, and Maubeuge in the hands of the States general. These were in part the articles proposed to serve as a basis for the peace which he solicited; for the perfecting which, he declared himself ready to send plenipotentiaries to begin the conferences with those of the allies, on the first of January ensuing. The States-general treated these offers as evasive and insincere, and came to a resolution, that it was absolutely necessary to prosecute the war with vigour; and they wrote pressing letters on that subject to all their allies*.

On the fifteenth of November, the parliament of Great Britain met. The queen, who had not been in person there the whole session before, was pleased to go that day to the house of peers, and in her speech to both houses told them, "That the enemy had, in the beginning of the year, endeavoured, by false appearances, and deceitful insinuations of a desire after peace, to create jealousies and divisions among the allies; but they had been disappointed in their expectations; and such measures had been taken as made it impossible for them to disguise their insincerity: that God Almighty had been pleased to bless the arms of the confederates with a most remarkable victory, and other successes, which had laid France open to the impression of the allied arms, and consequently rendered peace more necessary to that kingdom than it was at the beginning of the campaign; that she hoped they would enable her to prosecute the advantages she had gained, by reducing within proper limits that exorbitant and oppressive power, which had so long threatened the liberties of Christendom."

The parliament appeared to fall in entirely with the queen's opinion: they presented addresses of thanks for her speech, congratulated her on the success of her arms this campaign, and thanked the duke of Marlborough for his signal services; and so eager did they shew themselves for the continuation of the war, that in less than a month the commons granted upwards of six millions for the service of the ensuing year, and provided funds to answer the same. These immense grants of parliament struck the French prodigiously; for they demonstrated our credit to be in full vigour, while theirs was at its lowest ebb; and likewise shewed the disposition of our government to continue the war till the Grand Monarque was compleatly humbled.

The affair of Dr. Sacheverel made the principal business of this session. There were many reasons to believe that the queen had for some time been much disposed to change her ministry; and it is probable the same would have been effected, tho' perhaps not quite so soon, nor with so much noise, animosity, and violence. It happened, however, that Dr. Henry Sacheverel, rector of St. Saviour's, Southwark, preached a sermon on the fifth of November, at St. Paul's cathedral, before sir Samuel Garrard, lord-mayor, which he afterwards printed under the odd title of "The Perils of false Brethren in Church and State." In this sermon he strenuously asserted the high notions of hereditary indefeasible right, passive obedience, and non-resistance; and made use of some expressions that seemed to reflect against the Revolution, the protestant succession, the union, and the toleration granted to the dissenters; and insinuating the church to be in danger under the present administration. Complaint was made of this sermon in the house of commons, who impeached the doctor before the lords for high crimes and misdemeanors, upon four several articles; to which he put in his answers about the end of the old year. To this the commons made their reply. A day of trial was appointed by the lords, which came on at Westminster-hall on the twenty-seventh of February, 1710. Twenty managers were appointed by the commons, who were present in a grand committee at the trial, and the articles were opened against him by the attorney-general and Mr. Lechmere. The queen herself went incog. every day during the trial, which lasted till the tenth of March, when the doctor was at last sentenced "not to preach for three years, and his sermon to be burnt by the common hangman."

It would swell this part of my history to an unreasonable bulk, was I to relate the several arguments used as well at the bar as in both houses of parliament, in arraignment or support of this man, and the doctrine contained in his sermon: they may be found at large in Tindal, and some other of our voluminous writers; as also in the printed trial of Sacheverel, and the collection of Parliamentary Debates. I shall content myself with observing, that nothing could equal the ferment this affair raised in the nation. The enemies of the ministry seized this occasion to inflame the minds of the populace, by representing both in their conversation and writings, that the Whigs had formed a design to pull down the church, and that this prosecution was intended to try their strength before they would proceed openly to the execution of their project. These assertions had such an effect, that as the doctor passed to and from Westminster-hall the several days of his trial, he was attended by vast multitudes of people, who abused all that would not pull off their hats to him, and cry out, "God bless the church and Sacheverel!" Nay, they proceeded so far as to demolish several dissenting meeting-houses, and make bonfires of the materials, with loud huzzas of "High-church and Sacheverel!" In short, he was cried up as the patron of the church, and as persecuted for its sake; and the queen herself seemed to be not a little affected by it. If Mr. Harley and the Tory party were not at the bottom of this, they certainly made their advantage of it, to hasten the change they were aiming at; but it was some time before they could bring their matters to bear. However, the lenity of the sentence passed upon Sacheverel, which was in great measure owing to the dread of popular resentment, was considered by them as a victory obtained over their adversaries the Whigs, and celebrated as such by bonfires and illuminations.

This remarkable trial over, and such other business as came before the parliament being dispatched, the queen ordered it to be prorogued on the fifth day of April, 1710, after having in her speech to both houses, expressed her concern for the necessary cause which had taken up the greatest part of their time towards the latter end of the session: she declared that no prince could have a more true and tender concern for the welfare and prosperity of the church than herself; and therefore it was very injurious, she said, to take a pretence from wicked and malicious libels, to insinuate that the church was in danger under her administration *

Lewis XIV. still continued to solicit peace, and to defend himself. His ministers still kept up a correspondence with Perikem, and by means of that envoy obtained of the States-general a renewal of the negotiation. In order the more easily to obtain their content, he dispatched a new plan of pacification, in which he promised to renounce his grandson, and to comply with all their other demands, provided the electors of Cologne and Bavaria should be re-established in their estates and dignities.

The allies, determined to have the triumph of discussing the submissive proposals of the French monarch, permitted his plenipotentiaries to come to the little town of Gertruydenberg, in the beginning of the year 1710, to present their master's supplications. Lewis made choice of the marquis d'Uxelles, a man of great coolness and composure of temper: with him he joined the abbé, afterwards cardinal, Polignac, one of the brightest wits and most eloquent orators of his age; but wit, prudence, and eloquence, are of no service in a minister, when the master is unsuccessful. The ambassadors of Lewis were rather confined in Gertruydenberg than received there. Bays and Vanderdussen, the deputies of the states, came to hear their proposals, which they communicated to prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and count Zinzendorf, the imperial plenipotentiary then at the Hague. Though the French plenipotentiaries carried their submission so far as to promise for their king, that he should furnish money to dethrone Philip V. they were not listened to: the Dutch deputies insisted upon his effecting the cession of Spain and the Indies to the house of Austria; and in case his grandson should refuse to grant the same to his requisition, that he should engage alone to drive him out of Spain by force of arms. The negotiation lasted from the nineteenth day of March to the twenty-fifth day of July, during which time the conferences were frequently interrupted, and a great many dispatches went to and from the court of Versailles. At length the French plenipotentiaries, wearied out with the absurd insolence of the Dutch negotiators, returned to Paris, after having wrote a letter to the pensionary Heinsius, importing, that the demands of the allies could not be granted.

The States-general, to give some colour of justice to their proceedings, came to a resolution, "That the enemy had departed from the foundation on which the negotiation had begun; had studied pretences to evade the execution of the capital points, the restitution of Spain and the Indies; and, in a word, that France had no other view than to sow jealousies and dissensions among the allies." This resolution was transmitted to the several powers in the grand alliance. The court of Great Britain answered it by another memorial, in which the queen was made to declare, that she entirely approved of their resolution, and all the steps they had taken in the course of the negotiation; and that she was fully determined to prosecute the war with all possible vigour, until the enemy should be compelled to accept such terms of peace as might secure the tranquility of the Christian world.

While the allies were thus treating Lewis XIV. in the cabinet like masters irritated against his pride and grandeur, the operations of the field were not suffered to languish. On the fifteenth of April prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough set out from the Hague for Tournay, in order to assemble the forces which were quartered on the Maese, in Flanders, and Brabant. Their first operation was the siege of Doway *, which they carried, after a resistance of two months, in which the allies, by their own computation, lost eight thousand men killed and wounded, with upwards of fifty officers of distinction. The place surrendered on the twenty-ninth of June. As soon as the trenches and other works before the place were levelled, and the breaches repaired, the confederate army, by several detachments, advanced towards Arras †, near which marshal Villars, who still commanded in Flanders, was strongly encamped, designing to bring that general to a battle, or lay siege to the last-named town, the possession of which would have laid all Picardy open to them; but Villars acted with such precaution, that the allies could bring neither the one nor the other of these projects to bear; they therefore turned their arms against Bethune ‡, which was invested on the fifteenth of July, and on the twenty-ninth of August was surrendered by the governor. During the siege of this latter place Villars quitted his intrenchments, with a design to oblige the allies to raise it; but upon viewing their situation, he thought the attempt too hazardous, and returned to cover Picardy, leaving the prince and the duke to make themselves masters of St. Venant § and Aire §, places of less consequence. St. Venant surrendered the thirtieth of September, and Aire the ninth of November; and then the confederate army broke up, and marched into winter-quarters ¶.

The campaign on the Rhine this year afforded no transaction worthy notice, both sides being equally incapable of entering upon action. The elector of Brunswick, who commanded the Imperial army, not brooking so inactive a life, thought proper to resign a command, from which he saw neither honour to himself, nor advantage to the general cause, was to be expected: his serene highness's place was supplied by count Gronsfelt. The military operations were equally languid on the side of Piedmont: the duke of Savoy being indisposed, the command of the forces still remained vested in count Thaun, who attempted to cross the Alps, and force his way into Dauphiné; but the duke of Berwick, who commanded on the frontiers of that country, had secured the passes by such strong intrenchments, that the Imperial general found himself obliged to desist from his enterprise, and march his army back to their quarters.

In Spain the war was carried on with more spirit, and each party experienced success and disgrace in its turn. Count Staremberg, whom the court of Vienna had sent to retrieve the honour of king Charles's arms, was one of the most accomplished captains of his time: he had for colleague in the command, general Stanhope, an officer of unquestioned courage, but too fiery and impetuous. Lewis XIV. had been obliged to do that out of necessity, which the allies had exacted of him at Gertruydenberg, to abandon the cause of Philip, by sending for those troops that were yet in Spain, for his own defence. This, with a considerable reinforcement of troops which the allies had received out of Germany, had made them more than a match for Philip's army in Spain; upon which consideration it was resolved to come to a decisive action as soon as possible. General Stanhope, at the head of the horse and dragoons, attacked the whole cavalry of the enemy at Almennara, on the seventeenth of July, O. S. Stanhope charged in person, and with his own hand slew general Ameffaga, who commanded the body-guards of Philip: the Spanish horse were entirely defeated, together with nine battalions of foot, that escaped by favour of the night; and the main body of the army, which was encamped at some distance from the place of action, retreated with great precipitation to Lerida. General Staremberg pursued them to Saragossa, where he found them drawn up in order of battle; and an engagement ensuing on the nineteenth of August, O. S. the Imperialists gained a complete victory over that army, in which Philip and his adherents had placed their chief hopes, and which was commanded by the marquis de Bay, an unfortunate general. On this occasion the enemy lost five thousand men killed, seven thousand taken, together with all their artillery, and a great number of colours and standards. It is observable, that though the two rival kings were both within reach of their armies, and had actually reviewed them some few days before, yet neither were present at this battle: of all the princes for whom Europe was up in arms, the duke of Savoy was the only one who fought his own battles. In consequence of this victory, king Charles entered Saragossa in triumph; while Philip retired with the remains of his army to Madrid, from whence having

 Saragossa is a fine large city, and the capital of Arragon, in Spain, surrounded with old walls and other antique fortifications, at the confluence of the rivers Ebro, Galleyo, and Guerva, which run in a serpentine manner through the neighbourhood, rendering the country very fruitful. It lies one hundred and fifty-six miles west of Barcelona, and one hundred and eighty north-east of Madrid. The streets are broad and long, adorned on both sides with stately palaces, belonging to the grandees of the kingdom of Arragon. This city was the delight having sent his queen and son to a place of greater safety, he repaired to Valladolid*, in order to assemble his scattered troops, and compose another army.

It is acknowledged on all hands, that Charles was indebted for this victory to the bravery of the English troops, who, in this action, surpassed their usual prowess: his triumph, however, proved but short-lived. A council was held at Saragossa, to deliberate on the most effectual means for improving the late success, when general Staremberg proposed remaining in Arragon and Catalonia, and for the army to form the siege of Lerida; but general Stanhope strongly insisted on the expediency of marching immediately to Madrid, alleging, that the city was altogether defenceless; that the soldiers would have an opportunity greatly to enrich themselves; that the army might be refreshed with all kind of provisions; and lastly, that king Charles being in possession of the capital of the kingdom, would have a great influence in bringing the Spaniards over to his side. Unfortunately this advice prevailed; and, after staying some time at Saragossa, to refresh his troops, Charles set out for Madrid, into which city he made his entry on the twenty-eighth of September, from whence he sent a detachment to take possession of Toledo, which, lying upon the Tagus, was looked upon as an advantageous post for facilitating a conjunction with the Portuguese, under the earl of Galway. But that people having had such ill success in their former march to Madrid, could never be brought to attempt that route again.

The day that Charles entered Madrid proved the most disgraceful of his life; he found the city abandoned by all the grandees, and had the additional mortification to perceive that the Castilians were to a man attached to his competitor. Hardly would the people deign to look upon him, the citizens shut up their shops, and kept themselves close within their houses; the money which he ordered to be thrown to the populace in the streets, was left untouched; a company of players having acted a piece composed in honour of him and his successes, many of them were knocked on the head, and the author who had written it was found murdered in the streets the next day. Charles, a day or two after his entry, had sent to the marquis de Mansera to come to kiss his hand: this nobleman, descended from one of the most illustrious families in Spain, and president of the council of Castile, was near an hundred years of age, and it was thought that his submission would have great weight in determining the rest of the nobility, as well as the people, in favour of the Austrian prince; but the marquis was not to be shaken: he sent by the person who came to him from Charles, the following remarkable answer; "I have but one faith, and one king, who is Philip V. to whom I have sworn allegiance. I respect the archduke as a great prince, but can never acknowledge him as my sovereign. I have lived near an hundred years, and have never done any thing contrary to my duty, and I am determined not to bring dishonour upon myself during the little time I have to live."

These were not the only mortifications Charles had to encounter: his rival, Philip, was soon in a condition to face him again in the field. The king of France, at the earnest request of his grand-son, sent the duke of Vendosme to take the command of the Spanish army, which was at the same time reinforced by detachments of French troops. Vendosme's reputation was alone worth an army; the Castilians flocked in crowds to his standard; in fine, within three months after his fatal defeat at Saragossa, Philip found himself at the head of thirty thousand men, and now marched in quest of those before whom he had formerly fled.

Charles III. was by no means in a condition to keep the field against so powerful an enemy: he had been neglected by those whose interest it was to support him; the English government, under the influence of a great general, had all along slighted the war in Spain, to lavish millions in the Netherlands; Charles therefore, about the middle of November, found himself under the disagreeable necessity of marching back to Saragossa, and cantoned his troops in the neighbourhood of Cifuentes, where general Staremberg fixed his head-quarters. Vendosme, well knowing the weakness of the allies, immediately marched in pursuit of them, in order to force them to an engagement before they should be able to reach Catalonia: he came up with their rear at Brihuega, on the twenty-sixth of November, where he surprised general Stanhope, with a body of two thousand men, who, with the general and all their officers†, were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war.

General Stanhope, upon the first approach of the enemy, had sent an account of his situation to Staremberg, who immediately assembled the troops, and set out to his relief; but all was over before he arrived, and he had the additional misfortune to find himself compelled to come to action near Villa Viciosa‡, with an enemy near double his number. They fell upon his left wing, but this gallant officer made such a noble defence, that, though he had only seven hundred horse to oppose against a body of six thousand horse and foot, the enemy were constrained to bring up their whole army to the charge: then, overpowered by numbers, courage could no longer avail, and the left wing of the allies was entirely routed; but the victors, instead of pursuing their blow, began to plunder the baggage, which Staremberg perceiving, brought up his right wing, and charged the enemy with such bravery and conduct, that he put them to the rout, retook the cannon which had fallen into their hands, toge-light of Julius Cæsar, who erected here a very magnificent palace for himself (now inhabited by the archbishop), and built a large stone bridge over the Ebro, opposite to the middle of the town, consisting of a great number of arches, which is now as firm and strong as if it was a modern structure. To perpetuate his munificence to this city, he called it after his own name, Cæsar's Augusta, which we easily trace in the name Saragossa.

It is the see of a bishop, has an university, and a considerable trade. Among the other stately buildings, the Great Piazza is one of the noblest, being the model of that of Madrid, consisting of five hundred arches, with gilded balconies. The city is encircled with a wall, but is not a place of strength. Here are about seventy convents, for both sexes. It lies eighty-six miles north-west of Madrid.

ther with the Spanish artillery, and remained master of the field, where he continued till eight o'clock next day, the enemy retiring in disorder: but the allied army had suffered so severely in the action, that the general found he could not maintain his ground, and therefore, having caused the cannon to be nailed up, he returned to Saragossa, from whence he marched into Catalonia, whither he was followed by Vendôme, who obliged him to take refuge under the walls of Barcelona. In the mean time the duke de Noailles, another French general, laid siege to Gironne, which he took, notwithstanding the severity of the season (it being now the month of December); so that Charles was now confined to the single province of Catalonia, and even that lay open to the incursions of the enemy.

After the battle of Villa Viciosa, Charles's affairs became every day more and more desperate. The Portuguese were so far from being in a condition to afford him any succours, that it was with difficulty they could defend their own country against the encroachments of the enemy. The earl of Galway had returned to England, to solicit supplies of men and money from the ministry, but they were too much taken up with party distractions at home to attend to foreign affairs; or, indeed, the English were now almost weary of lavishing their treasures, and draining the veins of their brave countrymen, without any prospect of advantage to themselves. They began to feel the evils of so long and burdensome a war, and a sudden revolution of affairs at length put an end to the public calamities, and to the triumphs of those who had alone profited by them. This great change seems to have been chiefly brought about by the affair of Dr. Sacheverel. In the course of that gentleman's trial, and in the debates in parliament consequent thereupon, the Whig party had declaimed against monarchical power in such indecent terms as had given great offence to the queen, who had assisted at them all incognita, and found herself, by their doctrine, reduced to a mere creature of the people's, and that she had in effect given her confidence to a set of people who were, by their very principles, the professed enemies to monarchy. Her majesty, however, did not suffer herself to be carried away by these first impressions; she resolved to examine the matter more closely. She had for some time been cooled in her affection towards the duchess of Marlborough, who had hitherto governed her in the most absolute manner: this change of disposition towards the favourite was not occasioned by caprice or inconstancy, but was the pure result of reason, repeatedly offended by the insupportable haughtiness with which that lady had treated her royal mistress.

I have already observed, that the queen had taken into her favour Mrs. Masham, a lady possessed of every requisite to make her the agreeable companion and confidante. The duchess became extravagantly jealous: she reproached the queen with her coolness towards her, in terms that would hardly be supportable from an equal. This naturally widened the breach; her majesty languished for want of that liberty which the meanest of her subjects enjoyed, that of thinking and chusing for themselves. Whilst the duchess thus governed the queen, her husband governed the state; he had the Treasury at his command, through the means of the lord-treasurer Godolphin, his son-in-law; Sunderland, who had married another of his daughters, and was secretary of state, submitted every thing in the cabinet to him; and the queen's household, where his wife had unlimited controul, was at his devotion: he was master of the army, and had the disposal of all military posts.

It happened, about the beginning of this year, that Mrs. Masham, the queen's new favourite, asked a vacant regiment for her brother, Mr. Hill. The queen wrote to the duke, desiring him to bestow it upon Mr. Hill; the duke refused it, upon which she gave it to him herself. Matters grew warm between both parties; his grace affected to think himself ill used, and refused to come to council; but the queen was so surrounded by his partisans, that, finding they were determined to clog the wheels of government, rather than their patron should be thwarted in any of his measures, she was forced to write to the duke, to dispose of the regiment as he should think proper, and to desire he would appear as usual in the cabinet.

It was at this juncture that a certain set of men, called Tories, resolved to rescue their sovereign from the domestic slavery in which she was held, and to give peace to their country, exhausted by a war, in which it had been made the tool of half Europe. I am well aware that it has been alleged by a great number of writers, copying the one after the other, that this was the last effort of a party, determined, if possible, to place the pretender on the throne of England; but there appears no just foundation for charging the Tories with harbouring any such design: it is, indeed, very probable there might be some Jacobites among them, who secretly wished for such a revolution; nay, who would, perhaps, have ventured a great deal to effect it; but it is certain they carefully concealed their designs from the party with whom they associated, well knowing that the Tories could never be brought to alter that succession which they themselves had established.

The Tories made use of Mrs. Masham's interest with the queen to operate the change they meditated. That lady, as I have elsewhere observed, was intimately connected with Mr. Harley, the late secretary of state, who, from time to time, directed her in what manner she was to carry it with the queen, and what springs to put in motion, in order to effect the desired purpose. Masham, agreeable to her instructions, left no one winning art untried to fix herself in the esteem of her royal mistress. She succeeded to the height of her wishes: she then ventured to engage her majesty in conversations of a political turn, in the course of which she took opportunities of acquainting her with many things to which she had hitherto been kept an utter stranger; and when she found she had awakened her curiosity, she referred her for farther satisfaction to her relation Mr. Harley, of whom the queen had entertained an high opinion. That statesman was admitted to several private conferences with the queen, to which he was introduced by Mrs. Masham, at certain appointed hours: by him her majesty was informed of the general discontent which prevailed throughout the kingdom, at seeing its most essential interests sacrificed to gratify the ambitious and greedy views of a private family, who lorded it even over majesty itself. He assured her, that the majority of the kingdom were inspired with principles of true loyalty, and entirely devoted to her service; and engaged, if she would remove from about her person the petty tyrants who kept her enslaved, and call a new parliament, such representatives would be sent up as were the truest friends to monarchy and the established church, as well as to the protestant succession.

Won by these arguments, the queen resolved upon a total change of the ministry. It was, however, some time before she declared herself, for these matters were agitated as early as the spring of this year. In the mean time the duchess of Marlborough, finding a visible alteration in her majesty's behaviour towards her, desired an audience, in order to justify herself of any thing that might be laid to her charge: she hoped to work upon the queen's tenderness, and retrieve the influence she had lost; she had recourse to tears and supplications, but they proved in vain; the queen began to taste the sweets of acting independent of the haughty will of an inferior, and dismissed her with this reply, "You desired no answer, and none you shall have;" alluding to an expression the duchess had used in one of her letters to her majesty*. After this interview, which happened on the sixth of April, the queen never saw the duchess, nor had any correspondence with her, except twice on public occasions; for she was not yet divested of her employments, it being, perhaps, not yet determined who should succeed her.

At length the queen resolved to break through all obstacles, which that family and its numerous friends and adherents had laid in her way, and shew the Whigs she could reign without them. In the first place, about the beginning of June, she removed the earl of Sunderland from his office of secretary of state, and gave the seals to the earl of Dartmouth, one of the lords commissioners of trade, and son-in-law to the earl of Nottingham; when the moneymongers, who had fattened on the public taxes, fearing that another ministry might not be for keeping up the war so warmly as the present, tried every expedient to support the tottering interest of the Whigs: several rich citizens, as well in private life as in public offices, waited on the queen with an address, representing, that the public credit could not be supported but by the present ministry. The city of London have, indeed, more than once affected to make the interest of a party that of the nation, and to dictate to their sovereign in the choice of ministers. But the most astonishing piece of insolence was that offered by the Dutch, who seeing that they could never find a ministry and a general more completely their friends than those who had now the management of the cabinet and the field, commissioned their envoy, Mr. Vryberge, to present a memorial to her majesty, representing the dismal effects a change in her ministry would produce abroad. The queen with great justice highly resented this procedure, and returned for answer, "that she was surprised a matter of this kind should come from the States; that it was the greatest insult that was ever offered to the crown of England: however, it should not lessen the esteem she had of her allies, or alter her resolution in her own affairs."

Accordingly her majesty proceeded to make other changes. On the eighth of August, the treasurer's staff was taken from the earl of Godolphin; and John, earl Powlett, Robert Harley, esq. fir Thomas Mansel, baronet, and Robert Benson, esq. were made commissioners of the treasury; and at the same time Mr. Harley was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer and under-treasurer, in the room of Mr. Smith: Mr. St. John was made secretary of state, in the room of Mr. Boyle; fir Simon Harcourt lord-keeper, in the room of lord chancellor Cowper, who resigned; the earl of Rochester president of the council, in the room of lord Somers; the duke of Buckingham steward of the household, in the room of the duke of Devonshire; the earl of Portmore was appointed general of the forces in Portugal, in the room of lord Galway; and the duke of Ormond was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the earl of Wharton: an alteration was also made in the lieutenancy of London. All these changes were in favour of the Tories, and were soon followed by others; and finally, in favour of them, the parliament was dissolved in September, and a proclamation issued for calling a new one, in which, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Whigs, they were able to carry the elections of a very few members only. Before these changes, upon the death of lord chief-justice Holt, fir Thomas Parker, a famous manager against Dr. Sacheverel, was made lord chief-justice of the Queen's Bench.

The new parliament met on the twenty-fifth of November, when Mr. Bromley was chosen speaker without opposition, and approved by the queen, who, on the twenty-seventh, made a speech to both houses, in which she recommended prosecuting the war with vigour, especially in Spain; she declared herself resolved to support the church of England, to preserve the British constitution agreeable to the Union, to maintain the indulgence allowed by law to scrupulous consciences, and to employ none but such as were heartily attached to the protestant succession in the house of Hanover. The lords and commons, in their respective addresses, at present concurred with her majesty's sentiments of carrying on the war vigorously, especially in Spain, and in embracing all reasonable measures towards procuring an honourable peace. The commons were particularly warm and hearty in their assurances, exhorting her majesty to discountenance all such principles and measures as had lately threatened her royal crown and dignity; "measures which (say they), whenever they might prevail, will prove fatal to the whole constitution, both in church and state†." By this, perhaps, they would be understood to mean the antimonarchical and levelling principles so freely broached by the Whigs in Sacheverel's affair, who, in their proceedings in relation to that madman (for he was little better), seemed rather to aim at casting an odium on the clergy in general, and on the friends of kingly government, than to correct him for his private errors or mistaken zeal. But to return.

The commons set about granting the supplies for the ensuing year so heartily, that the queen, by the

After the battle of Villa Viciosa, Charles's affairs became every day more and more desperate. The Portuguese were so far from being in a condition to afford him any succours, that it was with difficulty they could defend their own country against the encroachments of the enemy. The earl of Galway had returned to England, to solicit supplies of men and money from the ministry, but they were too much taken up with party distractions at home to attend to foreign affairs; or, indeed, the English were now almost weary of lavishing their treasures, and draining the veins of their brave countrymen, without any prospect of advantage to themselves. They began to feel the evils of so long and burdensome a war, and a sudden revolution of affairs at length put an end to the public calamities, and to the triumphs of those who had alone profited by them. This great change seems to have been chiefly brought about by the affair of Dr. Sacheverel. In the course of that gentleman's trial, and in the debates in parliament consequent thereupon, the Whig party had declaimed against monarchical power in such indecent terms as had given great offence to the queen, who had assisted at them all incognita, and found herself, by their doctrine, reduced to a mere creature of the people's, and that she had in effect given her confidence to a set of people who were, by their very principles, the professed enemies to monarchy. Her majesty, however, did not suffer herself to be carried away by these first impressions; she resolved to examine the matter more closely. She had for some time been cooled in her affection towards the duchess of Marlborough, who had hitherto governed her in the most absolute manner: this change of disposition towards the favourite was not occasioned by caprice or inconstancy, but was the pure result of reason, repeatedly offended by the insupportable haughtiness with which that lady had treated her royal mistress.

I have already observed, that the queen had taken into her favour Mrs. Masham, a lady possessed of every requisite to make her the agreeable companion and confidante. The duchess became extravagantly jealous: she reproached the queen with her coolness towards her, in terms that would hardly be supportable from an equal. This naturally widened the breach; her majesty languished for want of that liberty which the meanest of her subjects enjoyed, that of thinking and chusing for themselves. Whilst the duchess thus governed the queen, her husband governed the state; he had the Treasury at his command, through the means of the lord-treasurer Godolphin, his son-in-law; Sunderland, who had married another of his daughters, and was secretary of state, submitted every thing in the cabinet to him; and the queen's household, where his wife had unlimited controul, was at his devotion: he was master of the army, and had the disposal of all military posts.

It happened, about the beginning of this year, that Mrs. Masham, the queen's new favourite, asked a vacant regiment for her brother, Mr. Hill. The queen wrote to the duke, desiring him to bestow it upon Mr. Hill; the duke refused it, upon which she gave it to him herself. Matters grew warm between both parties; his grace affected to think himself ill used, and refused to come to council; but the queen was so surrounded by his partisans, that, finding they were determined to clog the wheels of government, rather than their patron should be thwarted in any of his measures, she was forced to write to the duke, to dispose of the regiment as he should think proper, and to desire he would appear as usual in the cabinet.

It was at this juncture that a certain set of men, called Tories, resolved to rescue their sovereign from the domestic slavery in which she was held, and to give peace to their country, exhausted by a war, in which it had been made the tool of half Europe. I am well aware that it has been alleged by a great number of writers, copying the one after the other, that this was the last effort of a party, determined, if possible, to place the pretender on the throne of England; but there appears no just foundation for charging the Tories with harbouring any such design: it is, indeed, very probable there might be some Jacobites among them, who secretly wished for such a revolution; nay, who would, perhaps, have ventured a great deal to effect it; but it is certain they carefully concealed their designs from the party with whom they associated, well knowing that the Tories could never be brought to alter that succession which they themselves had established.

The Tories made use of Mrs. Masham's interest with the queen to operate the change they meditated. That lady, as I have elsewhere observed, was intimately connected with Mr. Harley, the late secretary of state, who, from time to time, directed her in what manner she was to carry it with the queen, and what springs to put in motion, in order to effect the desired purpose. Masham, agreeable to her instructions, left no one winning art untried to fix herself in the esteem of her royal mistress. She succeeded to the height of her wishes: she then ventured to engage her majesty in conversations of a political turn, in the course of which she took opportunities of acquainting her with many things to which she had hitherto been kept an utter stranger; and when she found she had awakened her curiosity, she referred her for farther satisfaction to her relation Mr. Harley, of whom the queen had entertained an high opinion. That statesman was admitted to several private conferences with the queen, to which he was introduced by Mrs. Masham, at certain appointed hours: by him her majesty was informed of the general discontent which prevailed throughout the kingdom, at seeing its most essential interests sacrificed to gratify the ambitious and twenty third of December, passed the land-tax bill, of four shillings in the pound. In the house of peers, the earl of Scarborough moved, that the thanks of the house should be returned to the duke of Marlborough; but some objections being started thereto, that general's friends did not think proper to push it, for fear of meeting with a rebuff, that would still lessen his and their credit.

About the beginning of December the earl of Peterborough was nominated to go ambassador extraordinary to the court of Vienna, as was the earl of Rivers to that of Hanover, and Mr. Hill was appointed envoy extraordinary to the States-general, in the room of lieutenant-general Cadogan. About the same time lieutenant-general Meredith, major-general M^cCartney, and brigadier Honeywood, on information laid and proved against them for having drank "damnation to the new ministry and the enemies of the duke of Marlborough," were deprived of their regiments, as an example to deter other officers of the army, many of whom had let fallen expressions that favoured strongly of supporting their general in an unwarrantable manner. Indeed, this period of the English history appears disgraced by the violent and rancorous conduct of two turbulent factions; for when the duke of Marlborough arrived in England, towards the latter end of December this year, the party in power, not contented with humbling him by the dismissal of all his friends, suffered him to be insulted and reviled in the grossest manner by their understrappers and hirelings; while his grace, in justice be it acknowledged, acquiesced in his sovereign's will with a moderation that did him great honour: he avoided all shew of popularity, he attended his duty at the council-board, nor did he take the least notice of the rancorous libels in which he was every day traduced: however, perceiving the queen's affection was wholly alienated from his duchess, he carried to her majesty a resignation of her places, which were those of groom of the stole, mistress of the robes, and keeper of the privy-purse: the two first the queen bestowed on the duchess of Somerset, and the last upon the new favourite, Mrs. Masham.

News being arrived at court of the ill success of our affairs in Spain, her majesty, on the third of January, 1711, sent a message to the two houses to impart to them the substance of the dispatches she had received; upon which they returned an address, by way of answer, importing, "that as the misfortune in Spain might have been occasioned by some preceding mismanagement, they would use their utmost endeavours to discover it, so as to prevent the like for the future." Some attempts had been made before, in the house of lords, to procure the thanks of that house to the earl of Peterborough, for his services in that country, but the same had been eluded by the Whigs, under various pretences; but now, upon the duke of Beaufort's motion, their lordships made application to the queen, to stay for some days the earl's journey to Vienna, that they might make use of such lights and informations as he was able to give them, concerning the affairs in Spain: and having taken those affairs into consideration on the fifth of January, in a committee of the whole house, his lordship was examined by them, when he gave a full relation of all facts and transactions in the course of the war, in which he obliquely charged the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, with all the miscarriages which had happened therein. The lords, either being, or affecting to be perfectly satisfied with this nobleman's testimony, came to the following resolution: "That the earl of Peterborough had given a faithful account of the councils of war in Valencia." Several lords, indeed, entered their dissent against this vote. After this the lords ordered the earl of Galway and lord Tyrawley to appear before them the next day, which they did accordingly; when the first of these noblemen gave their lordships an account of his conduct, from his first setting out for Portugal till the time he was recalled; but desired, as he said his memory might fail him, that he might be allowed to give in writing what he had delivered by word of mouth, which was granted. The lord Tyrawley was more upon the reserve, saying, "He kept no diary, and always carried a sword, which he used the best he could, upon occasion."

On the ninth, the lords entered into a very memorable debate upon this affair, at which the queen was present, and heard it all. Upon summing up the matter, it was thought by all impartial persons, that if the earl of Peterborough's advice had been followed, both before, at, and after the council of war in Valencia, things would have succeeded better in Spain. Be that as it may, it having been carried, upon the question, to give the earl the thanks of the house, it was accordingly done by the lord-keeper Harcourt, who could not help taking this opportunity to reflect obliquely on the great rewards that had been bestowed on the duke of Marlborough. The house also came to the following resolutions: "That the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, by advising an offensive war in Spain, had been the unhappy occasion of the battle of Almanza, and one great cause of our misfortunes in Spain, and of the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon. They farther voted, "That the prosecution of an offensive war in Spain, was approved and directed by the ministers, who were therefore justly blameable, as having contributed to our misfortunes in that kingdom, and to the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon: that the earl of Peterborough, during his command in Spain, had performed many great and eminent services; and if his opinion had been followed, it would have prevented the misfortunes that succeeded."

Finding also that the earl of Galway had given the right of the combined army (which is the post of honour) to the Portuguese, at the battle of Almanza, they resolved, "That the earl, in yielding that point, had acted contrary to the honour of the imperial crown of Great Britain." The earl had alleged in his defence, that, by the treaty with Portugal, the troops of that crown were to have the right in their own country, and that, in order to engage them to march to Madrid, he was obliged to allow them the same honour, without which they would not have stirred out of Portugal. Though this apology carried great reason with it, yet, lest such a condescension should be drawn into precedent, they thought fit to pass the above resolution, which was carried by a majority of sixty-four against forty-four. The several resolutions above recited were included in an address to the queen, and to every separate vote was attached a severe severe protest*. In short, both sides seemed to be less actuated with a regard for candour and national justice, than with the venom of party zeal and rancorous animosity.

While the lords were employed in this enquiry, the commons examined certain abuses which had crept into the management of the navy; and some censures were passed upon certain persons concerned in contracts for victualling the seamen. An enquiry was also made upon what invitation or encouragement the poor Palatines had come to England; and several votes were passed against the adviser of that measure. This enquiry begat such an heat in the house, that they passed a bill to repeal the act for a general naturalization of all protestants; but this was rejected by the house of lords. Another bill was enacted into a law, importing, that no person should be capable of representing a county in parliament, unless he possessed an estate of six hundred pounds a year; and that every burghers should have an annual income of half that sum. The design of this bill was to exclude trading people from the house of commons, and to lodge the legislative power with the landed gentlemen†.

About the latter end of January the duke of Argyll was appointed ambassador extraordinary to king Charles III. and commander in chief of her majesty's forces in Spain. In the same month, sir John Leake was made admiral and commander in chief of the fleet, in the room of Matthew Aylmer, esq. and sir Thomas Hardy was made rear-admiral of the blue. Not long after, the lord viscount Townshend, her majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States general was recalled, and the lord Raby was appointed to succeed him.

On the eighth of March, being the day of her majesty's accession to the throne, the marquis de Guiscard, a French refugee, was apprehended for high-treason, by virtue of a warrant from Mr. Secretary St. John. This was the same person, of whose project for the invasion of France I have already taken notice. The late ministry had such a confidence in him, that they had procured him a pension, for which it may be justly supposed he was to act the part of a spy for them; but instead of that he played the counterpart, which was discovered by Mr. Harley, who got possession of some letters he was sending to the court of France, upon which he was seized.

While he was under examination at the council-board, the desperate villain took an opportunity to stab Mr. Harley in two places in the breast, with a pen-knife he had concealed about him. One or two of the lords present seeing Mr. Harley fall, drew their swords, and wounded the assassin in several places: the door-keeper, alarmed with the noise, rushed in and secured him, though with difficulty (for he made a desperate resistance), and conveyed him to Newgate, where he soon after died of the wounds he had received. Mr. Harley continued for some time in a dangerous way, but at length happily recovered. This attempt upon his life, however, by an emissary of France, did great service to his political character. The two houses, in addresses to the queen, declared their belief that Mr. Harley's fidelity to her majesty, and his zeal for her service, had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery: they entreated her to take all possible care of her sacred person.

A proclamation was accordingly issued, commanding all papists to remove a certain distance from the metropolis; and the queen returned a very affectionate answer to the addresses of her parliament. At the same time, in order to prevent the like desperate attempts for the future, an act was passed, making it felony without benefit of clergy, to attempt the life of a privy-counsellor, in the execution of his office.

On the seventeenth of April, 1711, an express arrived at court, with the news that the emperor Joseph I. died of the small-pox, at Vienna, on the seventeenth of April, N. S. He left the dominions of the house of Austria and the German empire, together with the pretensions to Spain and the West Indies, to his brother Charles, who was elected emperor, some months afterwards.

The earl of Rochester dying this spring, who was the only competitor in the royal favour with Mr. Harley, that gentleman soon became sole minister; and on the fourteenth of May was created baron of Wigmore, in the county of Hereford, and raised to the rank of earl by the ancient and noble titles of Oxford and Mortimer; and, as a farther instance of her regard towards him, her majesty was pleased to appoint him lord high-treasurer of Great Britain. The new prime minister, upon his accession to power, saw it to be his interest, as well as that of his country, to put an end to the war with France and Spain as soon as possible: yet, as he could not avoid carrying on the war at least for this year, and until he could more firmly fix himself in power, he judged it principally necessary to find means to quiet the minds of the moneyed people, and restore the public credit, which the Whig party, on their dismissal, had used all their endeavours to impair; and to bring all parties into good humour, he this session introduced the great project of paying the public debts, by incorporating a trading company to the South Seas: upon this plan, however, more was built than the foundation would bear. The original design of allowing six per cent. to people who had trusted the government with their money, was certainly a very commendable scheme, and an easy method of liquidating that great debt; though possibly the giving out, that the stock would produce fifty or sixty per cent. might do more mischief than all the other projects for raising money, whether by lottery or otherwise, since the war commenced.

Before the session broke up, the commons, in consequence of an address from the house of convocation, then sitting, and a message from the queen, enforcing the same, passed a bill for building fifty new churches in the suburbs of London and Westminster, and allotted for this purpose a duty upon coals, which had been granted for the rebuilding the cathedral of St. Paul, now finished. Towards the close of the session, the commons presented a very severe remonstrance, or representation to the queen, charging the late ministry with great malversation in the management of the treasury, the navy, and the army, by which the nation had been needlessly loaded with a very heavy debt. This remonstrance being circulated through the nation, awakened the kingdom to a strict consideration of its condition: besides, the death of the emperor Joseph had in part dissipated those prejudices, which had put arms into the hands of so many nations. The English in particular began to reflect, that as the war had been undertaken to prevent Lewis XIV. from governing Spain, America, Lombardy, and the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, in the name of his grand-son, it would be highly absurd for us to exhaust our treasures, and weary ourselves in efforts, to unite all these kingdoms in the family of Charles, whose succession to the empire was in a manner secured. We had already been at greater expence in the war than Germany and Holland together: the expence of this year alone amounted to near seven millions sterling; what sufficient reason then could be brought, for the nation's ruining itself merely to procure a part of Flanders for the Dutch, our avowed rivals in trade? Such were the arguments made use of by the unprejudiced part of the people, by the partisans of the new ministry, and in fine by all those who had not private and lucrative views to answer by the continuation of the war; and these arguments emboldened the queen and her new counsellors to prepare matters for a general peace.

On the twelfth of June her majesty came to the house of peers, and the commons being sent for up, she made a speech to both houses, and then put an end to the session.

The king of Prussia, and several other princes in the grand alliance, insisting on the arrears due to their forces from the States-general, before they would suffer them to march out of their winter-quarters, the campaign did not begin so soon in Flanders as it was intended; but these difficulties being adjusted, the duke of Marlborough, to whom the queen still continued the command of her army, with the disposal of all military offices, repaired to the continent, and assembled the army, on the thirtieth of April, at Orchies, between Lisle and Douay: the next day he passed the Scarpe, and encamped between Douay and Bouchain; while the enemy, under marshal Villars, posted themselves behind the Sanset, in a camp that was looked upon as inaccessible. Prince Eugene of Savoy being detained at Vienna on occasion of the emperor's death, did not join the duke of Marlborough till the twenty-third of May.

On the fourteenth of June the army under the duke resumed its march, and having passed the canal of Arleux and the Scarpe, near Vitri, in presence of the enemy, encamped in the plains of Lens; the same day prince Eugene marched with the Imperial and Palatine troops, consisting of fifty squadrons and twelve battalions, to the Upper Rhine, to make head against the French on that side, who gave out, that they intended to penetrate again into Bavaria, and harraß the empire while it remained without a head.

On the other hand, marshal Villars thought his lines so secure and impenetrable, that he bid defiance to all the efforts of the duke of Marlborough. These lines began at Bouchain, on the Scheld, and were continued, along the Sanset and the Scarpe, to Arras; and from thence, along the Upper Scarpe and the river Ugy, to the Canche, the opening between these rivers being entrenched and fortified, with all possible care, by a large ditch, defended with redoubts and other works. But Marlborough, whose knowledge in the art of war could be only equalled by the constant success that ever waited on his arms, by a feigned march so diverted the mind of Villars, that he entered the French lines on the fourth of August, O. S. near Arleux, without any opposition; Villars taking it for granted, that his grace's intention was to attack him on the side of St. Omer's, whither he had for some time seemed to have directed his manœuvres. This was acknowledged to be the boldest attempt that had been made during the whole war, and did infinite honour to Marlborough; while Villars was not only censured at Paris, but even ridiculed by his own officers. Malevolence is ever blind to merit: notwithstanding this master-piece of military skill, the hirelings of faction were set to work at home, to depreciate the English general by every method they could devise; they not only endeavoured to ridicule the last action, as a thing of no importance, but they even taxed the duke with having removed his camp from a convenient situation to a place where the troops were in danger of starving. Whatever might be the errors or weaknesses of the duke of Marlborough, nothing could be more provoking and ungrateful than such treatment of a great man, who had done so much honour to his country, and was then actually exposing his life in its service: at a time too, when he knew himself to be in disgrace with his sovereign, and singled out by a powerful party as the object of their resentment. Thus much candour exacts from the historian, who, while he fearlessly lays open the failings, should never invidiously conceal or detract from the merit of distinguished personages. But to return.

On the tenth of August the duke invested Bouchain, contrary to the opinion of the deputies of the States-general, who proposed that he should give battle to the enemy, who had passed the Scheld at Creveœur, in order to cover Bouchain; but the duke prudently resolved not to hazard an engagement within the French lines, rightly judging, that any misfortune there might be attended with the most fatal consequences. The reduction of Bouchain, however, was in general considered as impracticable, inasmuch as it was situated in the middle of a morass, strongly fortified, supplied with store of provisions, defended by a numerous garrison, and in the neighbourhood of an army superior to that of the allies, who were likewise exposed to the excursions of the garrison of Valenciennes and Condé. It was, indeed, hazarding a great deal; but daily experience shews, that a general accustomed to conquest, will attempt with confidence what the less fortunate cannot look upon without shuddering: perhaps, likewise, his grace might think his honour concerned, to excel himself, if possible, this campaign, because his enemies had given out that nothing would be done this year in Flanders, the duke, they said, being resolved that nothing should succeed under the present administration, if he could help it. However this might be, Marlborough, by his superior skill and capacity, rendered ineffectual all the attempts that Villars made to raise the siege, baffled a scheme that general had formed to surprise Douay, and, by the assistance of the valour and intrepidity of the confederate troops, who idolized him, carried his purpose into execution. In twenty days after the trenches were opened, viz. on the thirtieth of August, O. S. Bouchain was compelled to surrender, on no better terms than the garrison remaining prisoners of war. The duke would next have proceeded to the reduction of Quesnoy, in order to secure the whole quarter; but the deputies of the States refusing their consent, he was obliged to relinquish his intentions. The conquest of Bouchain was the last military achievement performed by the duke of Marlborough, for by that time the breaches in the place were repaired, and the fort put into a proper posture of defence, the season of the year obliged the opposite armies to separate, and the allied troops were quartered in the frontier towns, that they might be ready at hand to take the field early in the spring. The campaign in Flanders thus concluded, the duke returned to the Hague the latter end of October, and about the middle of November arrived in England*.

In the beginning of this year the duke of Argyll was appointed ambassador extraordinary to king Charles III. and commander in chief of her majesty's forces in Spain. His grace landed at Barcelona on the twenty-ninth of May, and found the British troops in the utmost distress for want of subsistence, so that it was very late before they could take the field; at length count Staremberg with the Spaniards and Germans, and the duke of Argyll with the English, advanced towards the enemy, who attacked him at the Prato del Rey, a considerable pass, which was so vigorously defended by the confederates, that the duke of Vendosme was obliged to retire, and leave them in possession of the pass. The duke of Argyll was soon after seized with a violent fever, and obliged to be carried back to Barcelona. In the beginning of June sir John Jennings with a fleet arrived before that city, and superseded sir John Norris, who returned to England. Vendosme laid siege to the castle of Cardona in the month of August, which was gallantly defended till the end of December, when a detachment being sent to the relief of the place by count Staremberg, defeated the besiegers, killed two thousand on the spot, and made themselves masters of all their artillery, ammunition, and baggage. Nothing farther of importance was transacted in this quarter this campaign; and the duke of Argyll being recovered from his illness, returned to England.

The electors of the empire appearing unanimously disposed to bestow the imperial crown on Charles, that prince, leaving his queen at Barcelona, set sail for Italy in the month of September, and, after having had a conference with the duke of Savoy, who of late had appeared very cool in the prosecution of his engagements, repaired to Germany, where he was soon after elected to the imperial dignity, and declared emperor, by the name of Charles VI. and crowned with the usual solemnity at Frankfort. No action happened on the Rhine this campaign, prince Eugene having taken effectual precautions against the attempts threatened by the enemy†.

Charles VI. soon after his accession to the empire, concluded a treaty of pacification with the Hungarian malecontents‡.

No action happened at sea this year of any importance. The marine of France was in too deplorable a situation to make any figure on that element. The famous du Gué Trouin, who had not as yet any rank in the sea-service, with the assistance of some merchants who furnished him with money, fitted out a small fleet, and sailed to the Brasils, where he took one of the principal cities the Portuguese had on that coast, called St Sebastian de Rio Janiero. He and his crew returned home laden with riches, and the Portuguese suffered a very considerable loss by this expedition; but the mischief he had done in the Brasils did not alleviate the miseries of France§.

The new British ministry had laid a plan, in the spring of this year, at the solicitation of general Nicholson (who came to England purposely on that design) for the attack of Placentia, in Newfoundland, and (which was still of more importance) for the conquest of Quebec, and the rest of Canada, from France: troops were accordingly brought over early in the year from Flanders; and in the month of May, a powerful armament, consisting of twelve sail of the line and fifty transports, having on board five thousand men, under the command of brigadier Hill (brother to Mrs. Masham), sailed from Plymouth: sir Hovenden Walker had the command of the fleet. At Boston, in New England, they were joined by two regiments of provincials, and about four thousand men, composed of American planters, Palatines, and Indians. At this place they were detained so long for want of provisions, which it is said they ought to have carried out with them from England, that it was the beginning of August before they sailed into the river St. Lawrence, which was considerably too late in the year. General Nicholson, with the provincials, Palatines, and Indians, proceeded overland to Albany, which was to be the general rendezvous. But when the fleet had got a little way up that dangerous river, they were attacked, on the twenty-first of August, by a violent storm, and driven among the rocks, where eight transports were lost, with about eight hundred men; and many other of the ships were miserably shattered. The admiral, after this loss, sailed immediately back to Spanish River Bay, where it was resolved, in a council of war, that, as the fleet and forces were victualled for ten weeks only, and as they could not depend upon supplies from New England, they should return, which they accordingly did in October, without having made any attempt on the French at Placentia. This unsuccessful expedition was the first and only warlike one undertaken by the new ministry; and the disappointment was no small mortification to them, as it had cost the public a great sum of money. To complete the misfortune, the admiral's ship, the Edgar, blew up at Spithead, with a great number of persons on board (besides the crew, consisting of four hundred men) who were come to welcome their friends home: the admiral, and the greatest part of the officers happened fortunately to be on shore.

Having given an account of the military transactions of this year, I shall next take a view of our civil affairs : and first of Ireland.

About the middle of June his grace the duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, set out for that kingdom, and arrived at Dublin the third of July. On the twelfth of the same month the parliament assembled, to whom he made a speech suitable to the present situation of affairs. I shall not enter into a detail of the particular matters transacted this session, but only observe, that the majority of the peers shewed themselves to be strong friends to the Tory party and the new ministry in England ; while the commons expressed no less zeal for the Whig interest. The commons being informed that the lords, in an address to the queen this session, had reflected on the honour of their house, and a paper, alleged to be a copy of the said address, being read, they immediately addressed the queen upon it. The lords, in their turn, addressed in vindication of their former address; and also drew up a representation, at the solicitation of the bishops, against the dissenters in that kingdom. In fine, the heats between the two houses grew to an alarming height, so that the lord lieutenant found himself under a necessity to put an end to the session, which he did on the ninth of November, after giving the royal assent to such acts as were ready, and then returned to England.

In Scotland, the Jacobite party began to grow extremely insolent upon the change in the ministry. The duchess of Gordon presented the faculty of advocates with a silver medal, representing the pretender, and on the reverse the British islands, with the motto, REDDITE (return) : the faculty received it, and even voted thanks to the duchess for this token of her regard. This affair made a very great noise : the matter was laid before the queen, who ordered the lord-advocate of Scotland to enquire into the particulars. The faculty, dreading the consequences of their foolish proceeding, passed a solemn act, by which they declared their attachment to the queen and the protestant succession, and alleged in their excuse, that the affair of the medal had been transacted by a party at an occasional meeting, and not by general consent. The court was satisfied with this concession ; but the Hanoverian resident having presented a memorial to the queen, desiring that some punishment might be inflicted on the principal persons concerned in accepting the medal and returning thanks for the same, the government ordered a prosecution to be commenced against Dundas of Arncliffe, and one Horne ; and sir David Dalrymple, the lord-advocate, was removed, on account of his remissness : and thus the affair was dropped ||.

Both the queen and the ministry being now intent upon peace, and the French king having made new overtures this spring, Mr. Prior was sent to France, in company with the abbot Gualtier. This person, during marshal Tallard's embassy to king William, had acted as his chaplain ; and soon after getting into the earl of Jersey's acquaintance, who was ambassador in France after the peace of Ryswick, and whose lady was a Roman Catholic, was retained in that nobleman's family : here he got acquainted with Mr. Prior, who was that earl's secretary. Afterwards, returning to England, he became chaplain to count Gallas, ambassador from Charles III. of Spain. The earl of Jersey recommended him to Mr. Harley and Mr. St. John, as a proper person to go over with Mr. Prior to sound the intentions of the court of France. They were to let the king of France know, that the present ministry were desirous of peace ; but that they would make it only on such terms as should be to the satisfaction of the allies of Great Britain, agreeable to the treaties and stipulations entered into by the confederates. They then proposed, "That the trade of Holland should be restored, and the Dutch have a barrier, as well as the emperor and the duke of Savoy, for their security : that care should be taken to keep the balance in Italy ; and that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united. In relation to Great Britain, that our commerce should be settled to the satisfaction of the British subjects ; the government to be acknowledged in France, as now settled in Great Britain ; Dunkirk to be demolished ; the Assiento to be enjoyed by Great Britain, after the peace, as the French had it at present ; Newfoundland to be entirely given up to the English, but the trade of Hudson's Bay to be continued in the hands of the French and English ; and all things in America to remain in the state they should be found in, at the conclusion of the peace : that all advantages of trade granted to the French by the Spaniards, should be equally granted to the British subjects ; and in the last place, the secret should be inviolably kept, till allowed to be divulged by the mutual consent of both parties concerned."

With these propositions Mr. Prior went to France, in the beginning of July this year, but without any powers to negotiate, and was ordered to return immediately, if the French started any difficulties, and was particularly directed to see if they had full powers from Spain. The French not finding him sufficiently empowered to treat, sent over Mesnager, deputy of the council of commerce in France (with whom Mr. Prior returned). Mesnager remained here till the latter end of September, when, having finished his negotiations, he took leave of the British court, and returned home, having first obtained liberty for marshal Tallard, who had remained a prisoner here ever since the battle of Hochstet, to go to France for four months, upon his parole. On the ninth of October the offers made by France were communicated to count Gallas, and to the other ministers of the allies. The proposals obtained the name of Preliminaries, though they were signed only by the French agents, and contained only the offers made on the part of France : what those were, the reader will find in the note*.

These

* These articles imported, that Lewis acknowledged the title of the queen of Great Britain, and the succession of that crown, according to the present settlement: that he would freely, and bona fide, consent to the taking all just and reasonable measures for hindering the crowns of France and Spain from ever being united on the head of the same prince;

persuaded that such excess of power would be dangerous to the peace and tranquility of Europe : that all the parties, engaged in the present war, should, each of them, obtain a reasonable satisfaction in the treaty of peace which should be concluded ; and that trade should be established and maintained for the future, to the advantage of Great-Britain and Holland, and of the other nations, who had been accustomed to exercise commerce:

These offers being communicated to the foreign ministers residing in London, by Mr. secretary St. John, who at the same time notified to them, that her majesty had pitched upon the city of Utrecht for the place of congress, and that the conferences would begin on the first of January, O. S. count Gallas, now the Imperial ambassador, was pleased to treat them in a manner so disrespectful to our government, that the queen sent him a message forbidding him her court, and at the same time to acquaint him, that the sooner he left England, the more agreeable it would be to her. The States-General also thought proper to send over M. Buys, one of their deputies, in whose eloquence they had great confidence, to persuade her majesty not to give ear to any proposals made by the court of France: but they were disappointed in their expectations: the queen was determined to procure peace, and put a stop to the vast effusion of blood, which had for many years deluged half Europe, nor would longer suffer such numbers of her faithful subjects to throw away their lives, not in defence of their own country, but to gratify the covetousness and ambition of our allies. Accordingly the earl of Strafford, the English ambassador at the Hague, was ordered to demand the immediate concurrence of the States, declaring, in the queen's name, that she should look upon any delay as a refusal to comply with her propositions. Their High Mightinesses, considering that they were altogether unable to prosecute the war without the assistance of England, and that by separating their interests from those of Great Britain, they should not be able to obtain a barrier to their mind, thought it most adviseable, after long deliberation, to fall in with the queen's measures. Baron Bothmar, envoy extraordinary from his electoral highness of Hanover, also presented a memorial, dissuading her majesty from treating with the court of France, until the demands of the allies were fully complied with, by way of preliminaries. In order to quiet the apprehensions which that count had been inspired with by the Whig party, who represented all these measures as so many steps to bring in the pretender, the earl of Rivers, the English ambassador at Hanover, was ordered to assure the elector, that his succession to the crown should be effectually secured in the treaty. Charles, the new emperor, wrote to the queen on the same subject, and with the like arguments of dissuasion; but her majesty, for certain reasons, did not honour his letter with an answer. She had already done a great deal, perhaps even more than, in justice to her subjects, she ought to have done, in favour of the house of Austria; but there was no reason for aggrandizing that family any more than the house of Bourbon, at the expence of her own kingdom, and that of the peace of all Europe.

But that all parties might be made as easy as possible, her majesty wrote a letter to the allies, explaining to them the steps she had taken, and inviting them to the congress; she even condescended to have a conference with the dukes of Marlborough, Grafton, and St. Albans, the earls of Dorset and Scarborough, the lords Somers, Cowper, and others, on the same subject; but they remained fixed and steady in their opposition to a pacification. Her majesty, however, proceeded steadfastly in her measures, notwithstanding all the opposition she met with, both at home and abroad: and the parliament being assembled on the seventh of December, she made a speech to both houses, in which she expressed herself to the following purport: "That, notwithstanding the arts of those who delighted in war, the time and place for a general congress were finally appointed: that her allies, especially the States-general, whose interests she considered as inseparable from her own, had, by their ready concurrence, expressed an entire confidence in her conduct: that her chief concern was, that the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of the nation should be preserved inviolate, by securing the succession as it was limited by parliament, in the house of Hanover: that she should make it her endeavour, in the ensuing negotiation, to obtain all the advantages of trade and commerce, which a tender and affectionate sovereign could procure for a dutiful and loyal people: that, with regard to the princes and states who were engaged in the war, she would leave no means unattempted to obtain for each of them all reasonable satisfaction: that, as the best way to forward the treaty, would be to make early provision for opening the campaign, she hoped they would grant the necessary supplies for the ensuing year; and she begged they would proceed in this affair with such dispatch, as might convince the enemy, that if she could not obtain a good peace, she was ready to prosecute the war with vigour."

The earl of Nottingham, from being one of the chief supports of the Tory party, had of late associated with the Whigs in opposing the measures pursued by the court towards a pacification, and therefore, when her majesty's speech came to be canvassed in the house of lords, he objected to that part of it which related to this matter, asserting that the preliminary offers of the French court were vague, loose, and indeterminate; and on a motion being made for returning her majesty the thanks of the house for her speech, he proposed that a clause should be inserted in the address, importing, "that it was the humble opinion and advice of that house, that no peace could be safe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain and the West Indies were allotted to any branch of the house of Bourbon." This occasioned a violent debate, in the merce: that he would faithfully observe the conditions of peace when it should be concluded; and as the only object which he proposed to himself was, to secure the frontiers of his kingdom, without disturbing the neighbouring states, he readily agreed by the ensuing treaty, that the Dutch should be put in possession of the fortified places which should be mentioned in the Netherlands, to serve for the future as a barrier for securing the quiet of the republic of Holland against any attempts from the part of France: that he likewise consented, that a sufficient and convenient barrier should be formed for the empire, and the house of Austria: that, though he had expended very large sums, as well in purchasing, as fortifying Dunkirk; and though an additional expence would be necessary for razing the works, he would yet engage to cause them to be demolished, immediately after the conclusion of the peace, on condition, that, for the fortifications of that place, a proper equivalent should be given him; and as it could not be expected that England should furnish that equivalent, the manner of raising it should be left to the plenipotentiaries appointed to conduct the negotiations for peace: and that, when the general conferences for peace should be opened, the pretensions of all the princes and states, engaged in the war, should be carefully considered, and nothing should be omitted to regulate and settle them to the entire satisfaction of all the parties. Burnet. Tindal.

course of which the earl of Anglesey represented the necessity of easing the nation of the burthens incurred by an expensive war: he affirmed, that a good peace might have been procured immediately after the battle of Ramillies, if it had not been prevented by some persons, who prolonged the war for their own private interest. The duke of Marlborough, conceiving himself struck at by this assertion, rose up, and, in a very long speech, endeavoured to vindicate himself from such a charge, and, with a most solemn oath, declared that he was always very far from entertaining any design of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had most falsely insinuated. At last, the question being put upon that clause, it was carried for insertion by a small majority. To this address her majesty returned for answer, that she was very sorry any one could think she would not do her utmost to recover Spain and the West Indies from the house of Bourbon. The commons, in their address, inserted no such article, and therefore her majesty answered them in a more gracious style*.

Duke Hamilton, one of the sixteen peers for Scotland, having been created duke of Brandon in England, his right of sitting in the house of peers as a peer of Great Britain, was questioned, and counsel being heard on both sides of this point, it was resolved, upon the question, "That Scots peers created peers of Great Britain since the Union, have no right to sit in the house of peers, as peers of Great Britain." The bill against occasional conformity was revived this session by the earl of Nottingham, but in more moderate terms than the former, so that it passed both houses. On the twenty-second of December, her majesty being indisposed with an agueish disorder, granted a commission to the lord keeper and some other peers, to give the royal assent to this bill, and another for the land tax. Then the commons adjourned to the fourteenth of January, and the lords to the second of the same month, but not till they had, at the motion of the earl of Nottingham, presented an address to the queen, desiring she would instruct her plenipotentiaries in the ensuing negotiation, to act in perfect concert with the ministers of the allies; an address which was very disagreeable to her majesty, as it implied a suspicion of her ministers, as if they had clandestine views in their transactions with the enemy.

All this time the duke of Marlborough, equally insatiable of glory and riches, tried every possible expedient, both by himself and his adherents, to render the proposed peace abortive; but his influence was now in its wane, and his enemies, the more effectually to ruin him with the queen, caused a charge of peculation to be brought against him in parliament, by the commissioners for examining the public accounts, who reported, that they had discovered, that the duke had received an annual present of five or six thousand pounds, from sir Solomon Medina, a Jew, concerned in contracting for bread for the army; and that he had pocketed a deduction of two and an half per cent. from the foreign troops maintained by England. His grace alleged in his justification, "That the present from the Jew was a customary perquisite, which had always been enjoyed by the general of the Dutch army; that the deduction of two and an half per cent. was granted to him by an express warrant from the queen; that all the articles in the charge, joined together, did not exceed thirty thousand pounds, a sum much inferior to that which had been allowed by king William for contingencies; that the money was expended in providing intelligence, which was so exact, that the allied army under his command had never been surprised." Upon the whole, however, the great caution and secrecy with which this money was constantly received, gave reason to suspect, that it was not thought a justifiable perquisite; for Mr. Edward Cardonnel, the duke's secretary, and auditor of the bread-account, declared upon oath, that he never knew or heard of such perquisite, till the rumour of this affair being brought before the commissioners. However this might be, her majesty was pleased, on the thirtieth of December, to declare in council, that she thought fit to dismiss the duke of Marlborough from all his employments, that the matter might be impartially examined. This declaration was next day imparted to him, in a letter under the queen's own hand, in which she took occasion to complain of the treatment she had received from him and his friends. The royal protection thus withdrawn from this great man, it soon appeared how little reliance is to be placed on the opinion of the people. He, whom they had in a manner deified and adored, whose praises had filled every mouth, was now pointed at, as an object of the most indecent satire and most bitter invectives: he, who had so lately possessed the confidence of almost every court in Europe, and had seen his friendship sought after by their respective sovereigns, now found himself obliged, to elude the persecution of his enemies, to seek refuge in foreign country.

The ministry finding how strongly the house of lords opposed the measures for a peace, persuaded the queen to make use of an expedient, which nothing but necessity could justify, and which no English prince had ever before attempted. This was, to create no less than twelve new peers; a number which they imagined would secure them the majority in the upper house. Accordingly, on the last day of December, lord Compton and lord Bruce, sons to the earls of Northampton and Aylesbury, were called up by writ; and the other ten were created by patent†.

The new emperor, Charles VI. thinking that of all the allies he was likely to be the greatest sufferer by a peace with France, thought proper to dispatch prince Eugene to the British court, as the most likely person to promote his interest with the queen in this conjuncture, and hoping that his presence, with the assistance of the Whigs, who were very liberal of their invectives against the new ministry, might raise such a flame of discontent in the nation, as would turn out to the advantage of the advocates for war. His highness arrived at Harwich on the first of January, 1712, O. S. and on the seventh was introduced, by Mr. secretary St. John, to a private audience of her majesty: after a short compliment, which her majesty very graciously returned, his highness delivered to her a letter from the emperor, which he desired her majesty to peruse, saying, it contained all his errand. After reading the letter, the queen was pleased to tell the prince, "she was sorry that the state of her health did not permit her to speak with his highness as often she would be glad to do; but that she had ordered those two gentlemen (meaning the secretary and treasurer, then present) to receive his proposals, and confer with his highness as frequently as he should think proper."

† These were: lord Duplin, of the kingdom of Scotland, created baron Hay, of Pedwardin, in the county of Hereford; lord viscount Windor of Ireland, made baron Mountjoy in the isle of Wight: Henry Paget, son to lord Paget, created baron Burton in the county of Stafford; sir Thomas Mansel, baron Mansel, of Margam, in the county of Glamorgan: sir Thomas Willoughby, baron Middleton, of Middleton in the

The chief business with which the prince was charged, was to dissuade the queen from agreeing to the settlement of the crown of Spain on the house of Bourbon; and his memorial consisted of proposals and methods to carry on the war in that country with success. Mr. secretary St. John accordingly acquainted the house of commons, when they met, that he had received her majesty's commands to communicate to that house a proposition made to her majesty by prince Eugene, in the name of the emperor, for the support of the war in Spain; viz. "that his Imperial majesty judges that forty thousand men will be sufficient for this service, and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to four millions of crowns; towards which his Imperial majesty offers to make up the troops which he has in that country thirty thousand men, and to take one million of crowns upon himself." It was observed that no minister stood up to say any thing to this message, which gave the prince a bad preface of the success of his negotiation; and therefore, soon after taking leave of her majesty, he hastened back to the continent, to end the war alone, with the fresh incentive of a prospect of victory without a companion to share the glory.

In the mean while the duke of Marlborough's posts were all filled up, and the duke of Ormond was pitched upon as the fittest person to be captain-general: a commission was accordingly made out, appointing him commander in chief of her majesty's forces within the kingdom of Great Britain, and of those employed abroad in conjunction with the troops of the allies †. But to resume our parliamentary affairs.

The lords reassembled, agreeable to their adjournment, on the second of January, when the queen was pleased to return the following answer to their late address: "That she thought her speech to both houses would have given satisfaction to every one; and that she had given instructions to her plenipotentiaries according to the desire of their address." This done, the lord-keeper delivered to the house a message from the queen, importing, "That her majesty having matters of great importance to communicate to both houses of parliament, she desired the house of lords to adjourn immediately to the fourteenth, being the same day to which the commons had adjourned themselves." A warm debate arose upon this message, many lords being against an adjournment; but it was carried in the affirmative by eighty-one against sixty-eight.

The same day many of the Scots peers in town presented to the queen an humble representation concerning the late judgment of the lords in relation to the validity of the duke of Hamilton's patent, as duke of Brandon, which her majesty communicated to their lordships; who, when they came to debate this affair, resolved, that it was cognizable only by their house, and at last dropped it.

Her majesty, by reason of her indisposition, being unable to go to the house in person on the fourteenth, sent a message to the commons, importing, that the plenipotentiaries were arrived at Utrecht, and were employed in concerting measures for procuring satisfaction to all her allies; that the terms of peace should be communicated to the parliament before they were finally concluded; that in the mean time she was resolved to make preparations for an early campaign; and she therefore hoped the commons would grant the necessary supplies for that purpose ||.

The duke of Devonshire having, in consequence of a motion he had formerly made, prepared a bill for giving precedence to the elector of Hanover, as duke of Cambridge, before the rest of the English nobility, the treasurer, Harley, not to be behind-hand, introduced a bill for giving precedence to the whole electoral family, as children and nephews of the crown; and when it was passed into an act, he sent it over to Hanover, by his brother, Mr. Thomas Harley *.

The commons now entered on the observations of the commissioners for the public accounts, which had been laid before them on the twenty-first of December; and finding that Mr. Robert Walpole, who had for some time enjoyed the post of secretary at war, had received the sum of five hundred guineas, and taken a note for five hundred more, on account of two contracts for forage for her majesty's troops quartered in North Britain, they voted him guilty of a high breach of trust and notorious corruption, and, on the twentieth of January, expelled him their house, and committed him to the Tower †.

This done, they proceeded, on the twenty-fourth of January, to take the duke of Marlborough's affairs into consideration, when, after a long debate, it was resolved, by two hundred and seventy voices against one hundred and sixty-five, "That the taking several sums of money annually by the duke of Marlborough, from the contractors for furnishing the bread and bread-waggons for the army in the Low Countries, was unwarrantable and illegal." After which it was also resolved, by a great majority, "That the two and an half per cent. deducted from the foreign troops in her majesty's pay, was public money, and ought to be accounted for; and that the said resolution should be laid before her majesty by the whole house;" which was done accordingly on the twenty-sixth. Whereupon her majesty gave orders to her attorney-general to prosecute the duke for the money he had so deducted. It must be confessed, indeed, that he had the queen's own warrant for doing it; but still such practices were mean and mercenary, and greatly tarnished those glories which the duke had justly acquired by his military abilities and other shining qualities.

An affair of a more public nature next engrossed the attention of the commons, namely, the barrier-treaty with the Dutch, which had been concluded with the States by the lord Townshend, after the conferences at Gertruydenberg. By this treaty England guarantied a barrier in the Netherlands to the Dutch; and the States bound themselves to maintain, with their whole force, the queen's title and the protestant succession. The places to be guarantied to the States as a barrier, were chiefly Lisle, Tournay, Menin, and Douay, and they were to be kept still by them. The commons, after examining this treaty, voted, "That there were several articles therein destructive to the trade and interest of Great Britain: that the lord viscount Townshend had no orders or authority to conclude several articles in that treaty; and that he, and all those who had advised its being ratified, were enemies to the queen and kingdom*." On this occasion the Whigs, or low-church party, were, or at least pretended to be, strangely alarmed, as if there was a real design on foot to overturn the protestant succession, and no industry was wanting to propagate that notion among the people. But the event shewed, that this was not the thing intended by such a procedure, and that the negotiators of that treaty were those chiefly aimed at.

On the fourth of February, the commons, having deliberated on the state of the war, came to the following resolutions in regard to our allies the Dutch: "That the forces supplied by the States for the service of Spain, from 1705 to 1708, were no more than twelve thousand two hundred men; and that they had since sent thither no forces at all: that the States, during the course of the war, had furnished less than their proportion in Flanders, twenty thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven men: that the queen had paid in subsidies, more than her proportion, three millions one hundred and fifty-five crowns." These resolutions, with the votes concerning the barrier-treaty, were all digested into a long and spirited representation, which they presented to the queen, and in which they asserted, that, during the war, England had been over-charged nineteen millions; a circumstance which, they said, implied either fraud or mismanagement in the late ministry†.

The States-general, alarmed at these resolutions, and fearful of losing their beloved barrier, thought proper to write a respectful letter to the queen; at the same time they sent over a memorial, in which they endeavoured to vindicate their own conduct in the course of the war, against the representation of the commons. This memorial was inserted in one of the English news-papers, evidently with a view to make an impression upon the minds of the people to the disadvantage of the present administration; whereupon the commons voted the said memorial a false, scandalous, and malicious libel, reflecting on the resolutions of the house; and caused the printer and publisher to be taken into custody, as guilty of a breach of privilege‡.

The commons in fact seemed determined to alter every thing that had been done by the late ministry: they repealed the naturalization act; they passed a bill for tolerating the episcopal clergy in Scotland; and passed several other bills which greatly disgusted that nation, particularly an act for discontinuing the courts of justiciary during Christmas (called, An Act for discharging the Yule Vacance), as the observing of holidays was contrary to the principles of the presbyterians; and an act for restoring patronages, which their parliament had abolished by law, as a grievance. These measures occasioned much altercation; but the Scots were at length obliged to submit||. They had enjoyed their days of triumph over the church of England, which they had not exercised in the most tender manner; it seemed therefore but just that they should experience some little mortification in their turn. The house of lords were so disgusted with the sudden and unprecedented introduction of the twelve new peers among them, that a strong party was formed to revive, and if possible to carry into an act, the place-bill; but the ministry bestirred themselves so effectually, that all the Whig faction could effect, was to have the bill passed to take place after the demise of the queen, instead of after the determination of the present parliament, which was what they pushed for, so that it was no more thought on§. Soon after the commons proceeded to the consideration of the supplies, which they readily granted, amounting in the whole to about six millions, part of which was to be raised by two lotteries. About the same time the treasurer formed a bill for resuming all the grants made since the Revolution; but this scheme was strenuously opposed by all the Whig party, and the bill was rejected, though but by a small majority¶. But it will be necessary, before we bring this session to a conclusion, to look back a little, and observe how the negotiations for peace proceeded at Utrecht.

The British plenipotentiaries were Dr. Robinson, bishop of Bristol, lord privy-seal, and the earl of Strafford; the chief of the Dutch deputies were Buys and Vanderdussen; and the French king granted his powers to the marshal d'Uxelles, the abbot de Polignac, and mons. Mesnager, who had been in England; the ministers of the emperor and of Savoy likewise assisted at the congress, to which the empire and the other allies afterwards sent their plenipotentiaries, though not without reluctance. The conferences began on Friday, the twenty-ninth of January, N. S. 1712. On the eleventh of February the plenipotentiaries of France delivered their proposals in writing: and upon the twenty-fifth of March the ministers of the allies delivered to those of France their respective demands, and insisted on the latter giving in a specific answer in writing to their specific demands. This the French ministers declined, though at the same time they declared themselves ready to enter into a negotiation with all the allies, in the usual manner observed at other treaties. But it appearing very plain, that the Imperial and Dutch ministers had no inclination to treat at all, and refusing absolutely to enter into any measures with the British ministers, the latter found themselves under an absolute necessity of carrying on the treaty without them. The Dutch, to shew their aversion to peace, ordered a fast to be proclaimed in April for the success of the war, which was observed with unusual strictness: their general, the earl of Albemarle, also opened the campaign with burning the magazines of Arras.

The specific explanation of the offers of France for a general peace being transmitted to England, were found to be (so far as related to Great Britain) as follow:

“The French king will acknowledge, at the signing of the peace, the queen of Great Britain in that quality; as also the succession of that crown according to the present settlement, and in the manner her Britannic majesty shall please.

“His majesty will cause all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demolished immediately after the peace, provided an equivalent be given him to his satisfaction.

“The Island of St. Christopher, Hudson's Bay and streight of that name, shall be yielded up entire to Great Britain; and Acadia, with Port Royal and the Fort, shall be restored entire to his majesty.

“As to the island of Newfoundland, the king offers to yield up that also to Great Britain, reserving only to himself the fort of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fish, as before the war.

“It shall be agreed to make a treaty of commerce, before or after the peace, as England shall chuse; the conditions of which shall be made as equal between the two nations as they can possibly.”

When these offers came to be debated upon in parliament, they gave rise to long and very warm debates, especially in the house of peers, several lords treating them as trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her majesty and her allies. Some endeavours were used to adjourn the debates, but in vain; and it was resolved, without dividing, to present an address to the queen, representing the just indignation that house entertained at the insolence of France, in having proposed to acknowledge her majesty's title to these realms no sooner than when the peace should be signed; as also at the terms of peace offered to her and her allies by the plenipotentiaries of France; declaring at the same time, that they would assist her majesty to the utmost of their power in prosecuting the war, until they should obtain a safe and honourable peace*.

It must be confessed, that the specific demands delivered in by the ministers of the allies, ran as high as the French explanation another way. The emperor asked the whole Spanish monarchy; England demanded the restitution of Newfoundland, and the demolition of Dunkirk; the States required their whole barrier; and every ally insisted upon satisfaction to all the other allies as well as to himself. England and the States-general declared, that they demanded Spain and the West Indies for the emperor; in fine, the high pattern set by the French was fully imitated by the allies.

The duke of Ormond being appointed to command the queen's forces in Flanders, went over in the beginning of April to Holland, and had several conferences with the deputies of the States, who assured his grace, that they had given orders to their generals to live in a good correspondence with his grace. On the twenty-first of May his grace, in concert with prince Eugene, assembled the army between Douay and Marchiennes, which, upon a review, was found to consist of two hundred and ninety-five squadrons, and one hundred and forty-three battalions, amounting in the whole to one hundred and twenty-two thousand two hundred and fifty men; with which forces the general marched towards the enemy, and passing the Scheld, encamped at Solemnes and Keufville. But prince Eugene proposing to attack the French army under marshal Villars, or to invest the town of Quesnoy; the duke of Ormond, who had by this time received fresh orders from Mr. secretary St. John, gave the prince and the deputies of the States-general to understand, that her Britannic majesty having a prospect that the negotiations for peace would prove successful, had given him orders not to act offensively against the enemy.

The prince, and the deputies of the States were thunderstruck at this intimation, and immediately transmitted advice thereof to the Hague. Whereupon the Dutch plenipotentiaries at Utrecht had orders to complain to the bishop of Bristol, in the name of their masters, against these orders, which the duke said he had received, as they were given without their concurrence: to which that prelate made answer, that he was instructed to intimate to the States-general, that as their High Mightinesses had not thought proper to concur with her majesty in the measures she had taken for procuring a salutary peace, they ought not to be surprised if she now thought herself at liberty to procure that convenience for herself. The plenipotentiaries of the States then remonstrating, that such a step would be contrary to all the alliances between the queen and the States-general; the bishop said, his instructions farther imported, “That, considering the conduct of the States towards her majesty, she thought herself disengaged from all alliances and engagements with their High Mightinesses”

The States-general hereupon sent over a letter to the queen, and ordered their envoy at London to deliver it into her own hand. It contained an excuse for the backwardness they had shewn to act in concert with her majesty: “That all the difference between her majesty and them was a disparity of sentiments; and if for such a cause, confederates united by the strongest ties, might quit their engagements, no engagements could be relied on for the time to come.” It seems the States-general, at the time of sending over this letter, had given orders to their envoy (with what view may be easily guessed) to publish copies of it in the public papers, which he did; and they were printed and dispersed in England at the very instant, if not before, the letter came to the queen's hands.

The queen was so highly incensed at this procedure of the Dutch, which she considered as a remonstrance rather than a representation, and an appeal to the people rather than an address to the sovereign, that she wrote them a very sharp answer thereupon: nor was this all; the commons took it under consideration, and voted an address to her majesty, wherein they assured her “of the just sense the house had of the indignity offered to her by printing and publishing a letter from the States-general to her majesty; and humbly desired her that she would so far relent such indignities, as to give no answer for the future to any letters or memorials that should be so printed and published." Nevertheless, her majesty, hoping she might at length bring the confederates to join with her in procuring a general peace, did condescend to permit the duke of Ormond to concur with the confederates in a siege, who thereupon invested Quesnoy on the eighth of June †.

Great efforts, however, were made in the house of lords, to procure the censure of that illustrious assembly upon the orders given to the duke of Ormond, not to act offensively. The friends of the Marlborough family, and the Whig party in general, clubbed their united strength on this occasion. Lord Halifax made a motion for this purpose: many and harsh were the reflections thrown out by both parties against each other, which at length went so far, that the duke of Marlborough, on coming out of the house, sent a challenge to earl Powlett, for certain expressions of his highly reflecting upon his grace; but the government interposed, and prevented any ill consequences; and the Whig faction had the mortification to find their attempts baffled on this occasion, and the motion was rejected ‡.

A motion of the same nature being made in the house of commons, it was not only rejected by a great majority (viz. two hundred and three against thirty-seven), but they came to this resolution, namely, "that this house hath an entire confidence in her majesty's most gracious promise, to communicate to her parliament the terms of the peace, before the same shall be concluded; and that they will support her majesty in obtaining an honourable and safe peace, against all such persons, either at home or abroad, who have endeavoured, or shall endeavour, to obstruct the same." To this address the queen returned the following most gracious answer: "That she thanked her faithful commons very heartily for this resolution, as being dutiful to her, honest to their country, and very seasonable, at a time when so many artifices were used to obstruct a good peace, or force one disadvantageous to Great Britain."

The articles of the treaty being now in some measure adjusted, the queen thought fit to propose a cessation of arms to the allies. On the fifth day of June her majesty came to the house of peers, and communicated the plan of peace ||, according to the promise she had made; upon which an address of thanks and approbation was immediately voted, and presented to the queen by the commons in a body. But the lords were not so acquiescent, the Whig party predominating in that house. The Tories had embarrassed them in their administration during the last year of the war, and the Whigs in return were resolved to make the Tories as uneasy as possible: both parties were, in their turns, gainers by this manner of acting; but both parties were gainers at the expence of the nation, and therefore they had no reason, they had no right, to reproach each other. When the house of lords took the speech into consideration, the duke of Marlborough asserted, that the measures pursued for a year past were directly contrary to her majesty's engagements with the allies; that they sullied the glories and triumphs of her reign, and would render the English name odious to all nations. To this the earl of Strafford, who was lately returned from Utrecht, answered, that the allies would not have shewn such backwardness to a peace, had not they been persuaded and encouraged to carry on the war by a member of that illustrious assembly, who had fed them with hopes of being supported by a strong party in England; but if England had it not in her power, without infringing the laws of justice and honour, to withdraw herself from a confederacy which she could no longer support, and treat for peace on her own bottom, then was she not an associate, but a slave to the alliance. In fine, after a great display of rhetoric, for and against the plan of a peace, the majority agreed to an address, in which they thanked the queen for her extraordinary condescension in communicating the conditions to her parliament, and expressed an entire satisfaction in her conduct.

On the twenty-first of June, the queen thought fit to put an end to the session by prorogation, after having made a short speech to both houses, in which she expressed her satisfaction at the addresses and supplies she had received; observed, that should the treaty be broke off, many mischiefs would ensue; their burdens would be continued, if not increased; Britain would lose the present opportunity of improving her own commerce, and establishing a real balance of power in Europe; and, though some of the allies might be gainers by a continuance of the war, the rest would suffer in the common calamity *.

In the mean time the duke of Ormond, pursuant to the directions he had received from court, declared to prince Eugene, that if he purposed to carry on the siege of Quesnoy, he could no longer continue to co-operate therein, as he should, within three days, publish a suspension of arms between his army and that of the French; and should send off a detachment to take possession of Dunkirk, which place the king of France had offered to put into the hands of the English, as a security for the performance of his promises; and that he himself must march off with the rest of his army in three days: and proposed that the suspension of arms should be generally published by the whole confederate army. Prince Eugene, and the deputies of the States, desiring some time to write about this to their respective sovereigns, the duke of Ormond suspended the march of his troops some days beyond which he had limited, to give time to the rest of the allies to come into the cessation of arms ¶.

The bishop of Bristol executed his instructions at Utrecht with no less punctuality than the duke of Ormond had done in the army. A meeting of the ministers being held, he communicated to the other plenipotentiaries the concessions which France would make to the allies; and proposed a cessation of arms for two months, that they might confer in a friendly manner, and adjust the demands of all the confederates. To this proposal they made no other answer, but that they had no instructions on this subject.

On the twenty-eighth of June, N. S. the duke of Ormond sent his adjutant with a written order to the generals of the foreign troops in the British pay, to hold their forces in readiness to march; but, to his grace's unspeakable surprize, they all refused to obey his orders, except four squadrons and a battalion of the troops of Holstein Gottorp, and a regiment of dragoons of the troops of Liege. This refusal, on the part of the others, was owing to prince Eugene's having before tampered with them: and, indeed, it was not in the least to be wondered at, that these mercenaries should prefer their trade of war to any peace whatever. But to proceed: on the third of July, Quesnoy surrendered to the allies, the armies not being yet separated, and the garrison being made prisoners of war, were sent home. The earl of Strafford, having returned to Holland after the prorogation of the parliament, proposed a cessation of arms to the States-general, by whom it was rejected: then he repaired to the army of the duke of Ormond, where he arrived a few days after the surrender of Quesnoy. The duke of Ormond, on the sixteenth of July, marched off with his forces towards Ghent and Bruges; while prince Eugene marched from his camp at Haspre, and was followed by all the auxiliaries in the British pay, except those already mentioned. The elector of Hanover himself, who was to succeed queen Anne on the throne of England, notwithstanding her remonstrances, continued his troops in the pay of the allies, which plainly shewed that he did not think the pretensions of his family to the British crown depended upon the queen's will†.

Prince Eugene, though deprived of the assistance of the English, was still superior by twenty thousand men to marshal Villars, as likewise by his position, and by his numerous and well-furnished magazines; so that Villars could not prevent him from laying siege to Landrecy, from whence he detached several considerable bodies, who entered Champagne, ravaged the country, and advanced as far as the gates of Rheims. The alarm produced by this irruption reached as far as Paris; all France was seized with consternation. The death of the king's only son, which fell out this year; the duke of Burgundy, the duchess his wife, and their eldest son, all carried to their graves the same day, and the only remaining child at the point of death; all these domestic misfortunes, added to those from without, and the sufferings of the people, made the close of Lewis XIV.'s reign considered as a time pointed out for calamities. Precisely at this period the duke of Vendôme died in Spain: the general dispiritedness which seized the French nation upon this occasion is hardly to be expressed; they placed no great dependence on the conferences at Utrecht, which might be all overthrown by the successes of prince Eugene. Lewis therefore sent notice to queen Anne, that notwithstanding the allies refused to concur with Great Britain in a general cessation of arms; yet, to shew his sincere intentions for peace, and the confidence he reposed in her majesty, he was ready to deliver up Dunkirk into her hands, not doubting of her endeavours to bring the allies into the plan of peace concerted between the crowns of France and Great Britain. Hereupon Sir John Leake, and brigadier Hall, with a body of troops, sailed from the Downs on the seventh of July, and the same day came to an anchor before Dunkirk; and the next day, the troops being landed, the French marched out of the citadel, and all the other forts, of which the English took possession, and placed guards at all the gates; after which the count d'Aumont, the French governor, delivered to brigadier Hall the keys of the town. Notice of this being sent to the duke of Ormond, who with the English forces now lay in camp at Avelne le Sec, in the road to Ghent, his grace proclaimed by sound of trumpet a cessation of arms for two months between the French army and ours; and the same day marshal Villars did the like in his camp‡.

Some little time before the separation of the confederate troops, the deputies of the States-general did not scruple to say publicly, that they hoped the duke of Ormond did not intend to march thro' any of their towns (would any one imagine that they meant the towns that had been conquered for them by the English arms? but so it was); and now, being farther exasperated by the cessation of arms lately published, they sent orders to the respective governors not to allow the earl of Strafford to enter Bouchaine, nor the British troops to pass through Doway, though in the latter of these towns we had left a great quantity of stores, together with our principal hospital. The duke of Ormond hereupon, in order to reduce their High Mightinesses to reason, bent his march immediately for the city of Ghent, where part of his artillery and stores were laid up. Prince Eugene, and the deputies, sensible that his grace would soon have it in his power to revenge the affront that had been put upon the English, dispatched count Nassau Woodenburgh to excuse the insolent behaviour of the commandants of Bouchain and Doway, pretending that what had been done was without their authority or privity. The duke, however, continued his march, and, with the earl of Strafford, arrived at Ghent the twenty-third of July; which place, together with Bruges, he took possession of for the queen of England, and then detached six battalions to reinforce the garrison of Dunkirk, with a train of artillery and ammunition.

It was not long before the confederates felt the fatal effects of separating themselves from the British troops, and refusing to come into the queen's measures. Prince Eugene had formed the siege of Landrecy, without having consulted the duke of Ormond; however, he continued to push the siege with vigour: but he committed some essential faults, which ended in his disgrace; for his lines were too much extended, and his magazines at Marchiennes were at too great a distance; so that the earl of Albemarle, who was posted at Denain on the Scheld, to secure the communication with Marchiennes and the prince's camp, was not within reach of the latter's assisting him soon enough in case he was attacked. Marshal Villars saw this error, and like a skilful general made a proper advantage of it; he put a deceit upon prince Eugene. A body of dragoons was ordered to advance in sight of Landrecy, as if going to attempt the relief of that place: in the mean time the marshal himself marched towards Denain, with his army drawn up in five columns, forced the earl of Albemarle's entrenchments, defended by thirteen battalions, and thirty squadrons, who were all killed or made prisoners. The general himself surrendered prisoner of war, with five princes of the house of Nassau, the prince of Holstein Gottorp, the prince of Anhalt, and all the officers of the detachment; and the French found in the camp twelve brass cannon, great quantities of horses, and a very considerable booty. Prince Eugene, on the first news of this attack, marched in haste to the assistance of the earl, but did not come up till the action was over; and in endeavouring to get possession of a bridge that led to Denain, he lost a number of his men, and was obliged to return to his camp, after having been witness of a defeat which was big with fatal consequences to the interest of his master. This action happened on the twenty-fourth of July, 1712.

Landrecy, which still continued invested, had not ammunition for holding out a week longer, while the army of the besiegers were provided for twice that length of time; notwithstanding which, prince Eugene thought proper to abandon the siege with precipitation, while marshal Villars carried all the posts belonging to the confederates upon the Scarpe, as far as Marchiennes, one after another, with the utmost rapidity. He then pushed for Marchiennes itself, which was defended by four thousand men: the French carried on the siege with the greatest vigour, and in three days time the garrison were made prisoners of war. All the ammunition and provision that the confederates had laid up for the whole campaign, fell into the hands of the enemy. The superiority was now wholly on the side of Villars; the confederates in despair retreated every where before those very troops whom they had so lately held in contempt; and soon afterwards saw Douay, Quesnoy, and Bouchain, retaken by the French. Lewis XIV. now beheld his frontiers in safety. Prince Eugene drew off his army, after having lost near fifty battalions, forty of whom were made prisoners between the fight of Denain and the end of the campaign. All the compensation they obtained for this great loss, was the conquest of Fort Knocque, which was surprised by de Rue, a famous partisan in the allied army. About the end of October, both sides put their troops into winter quarters*.

While these military transactions were going on, the British ministers at Utrecht continued to press the Dutch and other allies to join in the suspension of arms; but they declared their resolution to continue the war with the utmost vigour. It was then proposed to admit the plenipotentiaries of king Philip to the congress; but this the other ministers would not hearken to. Upon which the queen, and her ministry, finding that the allies were determined to pursue their own measures, thought she had equal right to do the same; and in the beginning of August, secretary St. John (now created viscount Bolingbroke) was dispatched to the court of Versailles, to put a finishing hand to the treaty between France and Great Britain. He was received at the French court with the most distinguished marks of respect; and having adjusted, with the marquis de Torcy, the principal interests of the duke of Savoy, and the elector of Bavaria, he fixed the time and manner of the renunciations that were to be made, and consented to a renewal of the suspension of arms between the crowns of France and England, for four months longer, viz. from the twenty-second of August to the twenty-second of December. His lordship then returned to England, leaving behind him Mr. Prior, in the character of resident at the French court†.

The British ministers at Utrecht had insisted that Philip V. now settled on the throne of Spain, should renounce his right to the crown of France, which he had hitherto constantly maintained, and that the duke of Berry, his brother, presumptive heir to that crown, after the only remaining great-grandson of Lewis XIV. then at the point of death, should likewise renounce all pretensions to the crown of Spain, in case he should come to be king of France. They likewise exacted the same of the duke of Orleans. These conditions being all accepted by the several parties concerned, lord Lexington was sent from England to Madrid, in the month of September, to be present at the renunciation of king Philip, which was drawn up in form, and signed by that monarch on the fifth of November, N. S. the cortes or states of Spain being assembled on that occasion, to add greater force to it. Philip in that assembly formally renounced all pretensions which he or his descendants might have to the crown of France, and desired the concurrence of the states therein‡.

In Catalonia there was little action this year. On the eighth of September brigadier Pierce, who commanded the British troops there, notified to count Staremberg, that a cessation of arms having been agreed upon between England and France, he should separate from the army with his troops. Accordingly he marched to Sitias, on the coast between Barcelona and Terragona; and soon after the Germans as well as the Spaniards went into winter-quarters.

The Portuguese had hitherto continued obstinately to refuse their concurrence with the pacific measures going forward; but at length, consulting their own interest, they thought fit to come into the cessation of arms; and a treaty to that effect was signed between their ministers and those of France at Utrecht, on the seventh of November, which put an end to the war on that side. Much about the same time the duke of Argyll was sent from England to take possession of Port Mahon, and the island of Minorca, for her Britannic majesty, which he accordingly did. The campaign in Flanders being over, the duke of Ormond returned to England, and on the fourth of November was graciously received by her majesty.

On the fifteenth of November, a duel was fought between his grace the duke of Hamilton and the lord Mohun, principals, and colonel Hamilton and colonel Macartney, their seconds. The two principals died upon the spot; Macartney disappeared, and found means to escape in disguise to the continent; colonel Hamilton surrendered himself to a committee of the council, and made a deposition, in which he charged Macartney with having stabbed the duke of Hamilton, after he had fallen by the sword of his antagonist, and lay wounded on the ground. Hereupon a reward of five hundred pounds was offered by the government for apprehending Macartney, to which the duchess of Hamilton added a promise of three hundred pounds. The falseness of this report, however, appeared sufficiently in the sequel: Macartney submitted to a fair trial, and, upon the clearest evidence, was acquitted of the crime laid to his charge; and colonel Hamilton incurred such disgrace by his behaviour, that he was obliged to sell his company in the guards. As this had been a party-duel, several severe reflections were thrown out against the duke of Marlborough, who was said to have taken all opportunities of fomenting the animosities between the two factions; upon which account, as also seeing that his enemies became every day more powerful, his grace thought fit to retire to the continent, whither he was followed by his duchess; and they took up their residence at Aix la Chapelle, and returned no more to England till the day the queen died. His friend Godolphin, the late treasurer, had died in September, with the character of an upright and honest statesman. This year was also distinguished by the death of Richard Cromwell, once lord protector, and son of the great Oliver, in an advanced age.

The British ministry considering themselves as answerable to their country, and to all Europe, for their actions at this critical conjuncture, neglected nothing that concerned the interest of England and its allies, and the safety of the public weal. In the month of November, a new plan of peace was transmitted to the earl of Strafford in Holland, who presented it to the States-general, for their approbation. In this new plan the queen promised to procure to the States-general the city of Tournay, and some other places, which they could not expect to possess, should she conclude a separate treaty. Their High Mightinesses having considered the new plan proposed, and sensible of the circumstances they had reduced themselves to, by haughtily contemning all former propositions made them by her majesty, determined at length to reconcile themselves to her; and on the twenty-ninth of December, N. S. wrote a very submissive letter to her majesty, wherein they told her, "They thought themselves obliged to return her majesty thanks for the overtures she caused the earl of Strafford to lay before them, and for the assurances, no less obliging than strong, she had added to them both of her majesty's desire to procure a good peace for all Europe, and to provide for the safety, and even augmentation of their state: and declared, they were resolved to join with her majesty in the measures she had taken, and to conclude and sign the peace at the same time jointly with her; also to enter into a new treaty with her majesty, about the succession and barrier, and to conclude and sign it before the peace."

For the better understanding the latter part of this letter, it will be necessary to inform the reader, that when the earl of Strafford presented the new plan of peace, he at the same time told the States-general, that he had also brought with him a plan of a new treaty of succession and barrier, and must insist that this treaty might be signed before the peace; for in the present treaty of barrier, made in 1709, many things were inserted disadvantageous to Great Britain, and which could not be reconciled either to the letter or spirit of the grand alliance.

The cessation of arms being near expiring, it was again continued for four months longer, viz. from the twenty-second of December to the twenty-second of April, N. S.

On the fifth of December, the marquis de Monteleone, whom king Philip appointed to be one of his plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, arrived at London, in his way thither, when he had an audience of her majesty, to whom he addressed the following short compliment (which was most graciously received by her majesty):

"Madam,

"The Catholicking, my master, hath sent me to give your majesty a thousand thanks for the great pains you have been pleased to take to procure peace to Europe; the whole Spanish nation in particular, owe their lives to your majesty; for had the war continued, there is not one faithful Spaniard who would not have spent the last drop of blood in my master's quarrel.

Her majesty having named the duke of Shrewsbury, lord chamberlain of her household, to be her ambassador to the court of France, in the room of the duke of Hamilton, deceased, his grace set out for that kingdom on the fourteenth of December; and before the end of the month the duke d'Aumont arrived at London, as ambassador from the French king.

The queen, extremely well pleased with the compliment the Dutch had made her, and their promise of coming into her measures, sent a letter to the States, expressing her satisfaction on that head: and the Dutch having received advice that the Turks threatened to revive the troubles in Hungary, in which case they knew the emperor would recall great part of his troops from the Netherlands, and leave the burthen of the war upon their shoulders, they resolved to come into the new treaty of barrier and succession proposed by queen Anne, which was accordingly signed on the nineteenth of January, 1713, and sent over to England to be ratified. By this treaty, to which the Dutch were indebted for a mighty accession of territory, and a very great increase of power, "the States engage to assist and defend the succession of the crown of Great Britain, according to the act of settlement, against all opposers; and her majesty stipulated and agreed, that the States should garrison Furnes, Fort Knocque, Ypres, Menin, the town and citadel of Tournay, Mons, Charleroy, the town and castle of Namur, the castle of Ghent, the forts La Perle, Philip, and Damme; and fort Rodenhugfen by Ghent should be demolished, and that the revenues of those towns which had been taken from France (over and above what was necessary for the support of the civil government, should belong to the States, for the maintenance of their garrisons: that a million of florins yearly, or an hundred thousand crowns every three months, should be paid also to the States, out of the clearest and most certain revenues of the Spanish Low Countries, which the late king Charles was in possession of at the time of his death, towards the expence of the other garrisons.

“ That the English and Dutch shall be upon the same foot in point of trade in the Netherlands.

“ That England shall assist the Dutch with ten thousand men, and twenty men of war, in case they should be attacked: and the States shall assist the English with six thousand men and twenty men of war; and if this should not be sufficient, they shall assist each other with their whole forces.”

The coming in of the Dutch to the measures of the British court seems to have had a considerable influence upon the other powers; even the emperor's plenipotentiaries seemed to talk in more moderate terms. Count Zinzendorf declared, that his master was well disposed to promote a general peace, and no longer insisted on a cession of the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria; he also consented to evacuate Catalonia, and accept of a neutrality for Italy, under the guaranty of her Britannic majesty. Philip's ministers, together with those of Bavaria and Cologne, were admitted to the congress, and now the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain acted as mediators for the rest of the allies. On the first of March the instruments relating to Catalonia and Italy were executed; and on the fourth of the same month the dukes of Berry and Orleans renounced their right to the crown of Spain in the parliament of Paris, to which renunciation the duke of Shrewsbury and Mr. Prior, her Britannic majesty's ministers, and the duke d'Offuna, minister from the court of Spain, were witnesses. These preliminaries being thus settled, the great work of peace advanced more briskly, and by the end of the month was brought to its conclusion*.

On the first of April, O. S. the famous treaty of Utrecht was signed, as some would have it believed in a clandestine manner: the fact, however, stood thus. The British ministers having the day before presented a memorial to the plenipotentiaries of France, in behalf of the French protestants, they went to count Zinzendorf, the Imperial minister, to communicate to him the plan of peace they had agreed on with France for the emperor and empire, which his Imperial majesty was to have time to consider of till the first of June, and declared again they were going to sign the peace between Great Britain and France; and they afterwards made the like declaration to the ministers of the rest of the allies, but without notifying the precise time, to prevent disputes and protests, which might have furnished matter for factious and dangerous disputes at home: with the same view it was resolved to sign the treaty privately, at the house of the bishop of Bristol, lord privy-seal, which was accordingly done, under pretence of a conference, which being a thing frequent during that congress, rendered the matter the less suspected. The earl of Strafford and the bishop of Bristol signed first, then the ministers of the duke of Savoy (declared king of Sicily by that treaty), those of the king of Portugal after them, then the plenipotentiaries of the king of Prussia, and those of the States-general last of all: the whole was over about two in the morning, occasioned by the length of the treaties that were to be read before they were signed; and when the business was over, the respective ministers withdrew to their own places, and expresses were dispatched by them to notify this transaction to their respective courts†.

Peace being thus happily concluded between France and all the allies, except the emperor and empire, I shall here give an abstract of the most material articles in the several treaties, passing over matters of mere form, and such other particulars as have no relation to Great Britain.

By this treaty the French king acknowledged the protestant succession of the house of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, and engaged, for himself and his heirs and successors, not to suffer the pretender to return into France, nor any way to succour or assist him.

“ That the crowns of France and Spain should never be united under one head, and renunciations made on both sides in due form; and that they should never be united under any pretence whatsoever.

“ That the trade between France and Spain shall be on the same foot as in Charles II's time.

“ That the fortifications of Dunkirk should be demolished, and the harbour filled up, never to be repaired. That the queen and kingdom should be fully restored to the Bay and Straights of Hudson, and satisfaction made to that company for damages sustained.

“ That the whole Island of St. Christopher be only hereafter possessed by the English, and also Nova Scotia or Acadia, with the port now called Annapolis Royal.

“ That the Island of Newfoundland should belong of right wholly to Great Britain; the French to have only huts to dry their fish, and liberty to fish only from Cape Bonavista to the northern point of that island, and so down to the western side as far as port Riche; only they were to retain Cape Breton and the other islands in the mouth of the river St. Lawrence.

“ The French in Canada not to molest the Five Nations of the Indians subject to Great Britain; and we to do the same by them.

“ That justice should be done to the Hamilton family concerning the duchy of Chatelrault; to the duke of Richmond, concerning such requests as he had to make in France; and to Charles Douglas, concerning certain lands to be reclaimed by him.

As for the allies, Portugal and Savoy were satisfied; the latter had the island of Sicily given him, with the title of king, and on the continent the towns of Fenestrelles and Exilles, with the valley of Pragelas; so that they took from the house of Bourbon to aggrandize him. The title of King was allotted to the elector of Bavaria, together with the island of Sardinia, as an indemnification for his losses. The Dutch had a considerable barrier given them, which they had always been aiming at: and if the house of Bourbon was despoiled of some territories, in favour of the duke of Savoy, the house of Austria was on the other hand stripped to satisfy the Dutch, who were become, at its ex-pençe, the guarantees and masters of the strongest cities in Flanders. Due regard was paid to the interest of the Dutch with respect to trade; and there was an article stipulated also in favour of Portugal. The sovereignty of the ten provinces of the Netherlands was reserved for the emperor, together with the advantageous lordship of the barrier-towns: they likewise guaranteed to him the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with all his possessions in Lombardy, and the four ports on the coast of Tuscany. But the court of Vienna would not subscribe to those conditions, as thereby the emperor had not sufficient justice done him; and the Imperial ministers gave out, that they would still carry on the war, and hazard all rather than submit to such usage. The king of Prussia had Upper Gueldres, in lieu of Orange and the other estates belonging to his family in Franche Compté. For France, who demolished Dunkirk, and gave up so many places in Flanders that her arms had formerly conquered, and that had been secured to her by the treaties of Nimeguen and Ryswick, she got back Lille, Aire, Bethune, and St. Venant. Thus did the English ministry, to all appearance, do justice to every one; but this was denied them by the Whigs, who reviled the memory of queen Anne for having done the greatest good that a sovereign could possibly do, in giving peace to so many nations. Every unprejudiced person, however, attributed their clamours to the true source from whence they sprung, madness and resentment at being excluded from the management of public affairs, and not from any principle of real patriotism or love for their country. We must not forget to take notice of one glorious act of her's in this treaty of peace; I mean her having engaged Lewis XIV. to consent to set at liberty a great number of his protestant subjects, who were confined in prison and in the galleys on account of their religion: this was dictating laws, but laws of a very respectable nature.

At the same time with the treaty of peace the English plenipotentiaries concluded another of navigation and commerce with France, by which a free trade was established, according to the tariff of 1664, except in some commodities that were subjected to new regulations in the year 1699. It was agreed, that no other duties should be imposed on the productions of France, imported into England, than those that were laid on the same commodities from other countries; and that commissaries should meet at London to adjust all matters relating to commerce. As for the tariff with Spain, it was not yet finished. This treaty might not, perhaps, be so advantageous to Great Britain, in point of commerce, as might have been established; but to say that the treaty of Utrecht did nothing, and that all our expences, and all our victories, in this long war, were absolutely thrown away, is paying no regard to truth: but that a better treaty might have been made, I shall not take upon me to dispute.

The parliament, after many prorogations, was at length permitted to sit on the ninth of April, 1713, when the queen, in her speech, acquainted the two houses, that the treaty of peace was signed, and that in a few days the ratifications would be exchanged: she hoped, she said, that what she had done for the protestant succession, and the perfect friendship that subsisted between her and the house of Hanover, might convince such who wished well to both, and had the quiet and safety of their country at heart, how vain all attempts were to divide them. Addressing herself to the commons in particular, she said, she left it entirely to them to determine what force might be necessary for the security of trade by sea, and for guards and garrisons: "Make yourselves easy (continued this excellent princess), and I shall be satisfied: next to the protection of divine Providence, I depend upon the loyalty and affection of my people: I want no other guaranty." She then recommended to their care those brave men who had served well by sea and land, during the war, and could not be employed in time of peace. Then, directing herself to both houses, she said, she hoped they would concert proper measures for easing the foreign trade of the kingdom; for improving and encouraging manufactures and the fishery; for employing the hands of idle people; for suppressing the scandalous and seditious libels that were every day published; and for putting a stop to the impious practice of duelling: concluding with this pathetic exhortation: "Now we are entering upon peace abroad, let me conjure ye all to use your utmost endeavours for calming mens minds at home, that the arts of peace may be cultivated. Let no groundless jealousies, contrived by a faction, and fomented by party-rage, effect that which our enemies could not. I pray God to direct all your consultations for his glory, and the welfare of my people."

Addresses of thanks and congratulation were immediately presented by both houses of parliament, and their example was followed by the houses of convocation, and all the principal corporations in the kingdom. The ratifications of the treaty being exchanged, the peace was proclaimed on the fifth day of May, the very day the war had been declared, eleven years before. It was about this period that the chevalier de St. George caused a printed remonstrance to be conveyed, under covers, to the several ministers at the congress, protesting against whatever might be transacted there to his prejudice.

Mean while, in pursuance of the convention for evacuating Catalonia, sir John Jennings was commanded to carry the empress (consort of the late Charles III. of Spain, now the emperor Charles VI.) from Barcelona to Italy; and accordingly he set sail with her Imperial majesty from Barcelona, and landed her safely at Genoa, from whence she afterwards proceeded to Milan, whither admiral Jennings followed her; and having had several conferences with the ministers there, about the transportation of the German troops from Catalonia, he afterwards proceeded to the court of Turin, to confer with the duke of Savoy concerning his taking possession of the kingdom of Sicily, in which service the British fleet was to be employed*.

The commons having presented an address, entreating her majesty to communicate to the house, in due time, the treaties of peace and commerce with France, her majesty on the ninth of May, sent a message to them, which, by several, was censured as rather too authoritative, though in itself true, viz. "That as it was the undeniable prerogative of the crown to make peace or war, she had ratified the treaties of peace and commerce with France, which had been signed by her orders; and had concluded a treaty with Spain, which would be signed as soon as the Spanish ministers were arrived: that she determined from the first, on this extraordinary occasion to communicate these treaties to her parliament, and had therefore now ordered them to be laid before the house." This message was delivered to the house by Mr. Benson, chancellor of the Exchequer, who at the same time presented to the house the copies of the treaties of peace and commerce made at Utrecht, with translations of the same*.

The treaties being read, a day was appointed to consider of the treaty of commerce; when it appeared that the ministry had not paid all the attention to the commercial interests of the kingdom which might have been expected from men of their talents and abilities. By the VIIIth and IXth articles, for instance, it was agreed that Great Britain and France should mutually enjoy all the privileges in trading with each other, that either granted to the most favoured nation: and that no higher customs should be exacted on the commodities of France than what were drawn from the same productions of any other people. After a violent dispute, in which some insisted upon the advantages which would accrue to the nation by a free trade with France, and others as stiffly upon the prejudices of it, it was resolved, however, by a great majority, that a bill should be brought in, to render this treaty more effectual. The Portuguese minister, alarmed at this resolution, presented a memorial, declaring, that should the duties on French wines be reduced to a level with those that were laid on the wines of Portugal, his master would prohibit the importation of the woollen manufactures and other commodities of Great Britain. The whole trading part of the nation exclaimed also against this treaty, which was universally allowed by all, who understood the subject, to be a wretched piece of politics, inasmuch as the said VIIIth and IXth articles did in general terms put France on an equal footing with Portugal, or any of our best allies, in point of commerce: but the IXth article struck more directly at the very root of our Portugal trade, since by introducing the tariff of 1664, the wines and brandies of France would be poured in upon us in lieu of those of Portugal, which latter country took off great quantities of our woollen cloth, iron, and other manufactures, and sent us in return a large yearly balance of money in our favour, over and above all the wines, oil, and fruits, which we took from them.

In fine, the clamour against this treaty grew so loud, that it was no longer to be slighted; and although a great majority of the house of commons was, in other respects, closely attached to the ministry, the bill for agreeing to the purport of the said two articles was rejected by a majority of nine voices, after the most eminent merchants had been heard at the bar of that house, to the great joy of the whole trading part of the nation, and indeed of all other impartial people. Thus the commerce between us and France has ever since remained in a

Bad as our ministry managed at this time with respect to commerce, we ought, however, to do them the justice to acknowledge their circumspection in regard to our then treaty with king Philip of Spain, which was signed at Utrecht, on the twenty-second of July, O. S. by the bishop of Bristol, the lord privy seal, and the earl of Strafford, her majesty's plenipotentiaries, and the duke d'Osuna and the marquis de Monteleone, plenipotentiaries from his catholic majesty. As a proof of this, I shall here give an abstract of what is material in that treaty. By this agreement, the kingdoms of France and Spain were separated for ever; Philip acknowledged the protestant succession, and renounced the pretender. By the Xth article, "The full and entire property of the town and castle of Gibraltar, with all things thereto belonging, are given up to the crown of Great Britain in property, to be held and enjoyed absolutely with all manner of right for ever, without any impediment or exception whatsoever." By the IXth article, "His catholic majesty doth in like manner, for himself, his heirs, and successors, yield to the crown of England the whole island of Minorca, transferring to the said crown for ever all right and most absolute dominion over the said island, and in particular over the town, castle, and fortifications of Port Mahon; all that Spain reserved to itself being no more than the right of pre-emption, in case the crown of Great Britain shall at any time think fit to alienate or dispose of the said fortress of Gibraltar or island of Minorca." The XIIth article grants "to her Britannic majesty, and to the company of her subjects appointed for that purpose [i. e. the South Sea company] (as well the subjects of Spain as all others being excluded), the contracts for introducing of negroes into several parts of the dominions of his Catholic majesty in America (commonly called el Pacto del Asiento de Negros), at the rate of four thousand eight hundred negroes yearly, for the space of thirty years successively, beginning from the first of May, 1713, on the same conditions on which the French company had formerly enjoyed it."

As it has been peremptorily asserted, that queen Anne, after having drawn the Catalans into a war, in support of the interest of Charles III. did, by this treaty with king Philip, leave them wholly at the mercy of their enraged sovereign, without stipulating any thing in their behalf; therefore, once for all, to confute this groundless and impudent calumny, I shall here recite verbatim the XIIIth article of this treaty of peace between her Britannic majesty and king Philip, viz.

"Whereas the queen of Great Britain has continually pressed, and insisted with the greatest earnestness, that all the inhabitants of the principality of Catalonia, of whatsoever state or condition they may be, should not only obtain a full and perpetual oblivion of all that was done in the late war, and enjoy the entire possession of all their estates and honours, but should also have their ancient privileges preserved safe and untouched; the Catholic king, in compliance with the said queen of Great Britain, hereby grants and confirms to all the inhabitants of Catalonia whatsoever not only the amneſty deſired, together with the full poſſeſſion of all their eſtates and honours, but alſo gives and grants to them all the privileges which the inhabitants of both Caſtilles, who, of all the Spaniards, are moſt dear to the Catholic king, have and enjoy, or hereafter may have and enjoy."

The Scots, during this ſeſſion of parliament, ſhewed themſelves very uneaſy, and particularly on account of the duty upon malt, which, after the peace, was to extend to that kingdom. Their nobility and gentry had ſeveral conſultations in London upon this affair, during the adjournment of parliament on account of the Whiſun holidays, when the duke of Argyll, the earl of Mar, Mr. Lockhart of Carnwath, and Mr. Cockburn of Ormſtoun, were deputed to lay their grievances before the queen. A remonſtrance was accordingly drawn up, and preſented to her majeſty, importing, that their countrymen, with great impatience, bore the violation of ſome of the articles of Union, and that the laying ſuch an inſupportable burthen as the malt-tax upon them, was like to raiſe their diſcontent to ſuch an height as to prompt them to declare the Union diſſolved. Her majeſty answered this addreſs by ſaying, that this was a precipitate reſolution, and ſhe wiſhed they might not have reaſon to repent it; but, however, ſhe would endeavour to make all things eaſy.

The Scots, not content with this answer, reſolved to lay their grievances before the houſe of lords; and accordingly, on the twenty-eighth of May, the earl of Finlater (one of the ſixteen peers for Scotland) made a motion in the houſe of peers, that ſome day might be appointed to conſider of the ſtate of the nation; and the firſt of June being fixed upon, he then made a representation of the grievances of the Scots, which he reduced to theſe four heads, viz. "I. That they were deprived of a privy-council. II. That the laws of England, in caſes of high-treaſon, were extended to Scotland. III. That the Scots were made incapable of being peers of Great Britain, as was adjudged in the caſe of the duke of Hamilton. And IV. That the Scots were hardly dealt with in being ſubject to the malt-tax, in time of peace, when they had reaſon to expect to enjoy the benefits of peace; and it was the more inſupportable now, in that they had never borne it during the war."

He then concluded with ſaying, that ſince the Union between the two nations had not been attended with thoſe good effects that were expected and hoped from it, he therefore moved, that leave might be given to bring in a bill for diſſolving the ſaid Union, and ſecuring the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover, eſtabliſhing the queen's prerogative in both kingdoms, and preſerving an entire amity and good correſpondence between the two nations." Hereupon aroſe a very great and memorable debate; the Scots lords, and thoſe who had been moſt zealous in promoting the Union, now urging many arguments for the diſſolution of it. Upon the whole, the court lords were all againſt diſſolving the Union, arguing, that the very moving of ſuch a thing was of very ill conſequence, and therefore deſired ſuch an effectual ſtop might be put to it, that no one ſhould ever offer the like again; and ſo the matter ended*.

There was another affair which gave the queen no leſs uneaſineſs than the buſineſs of Scotland: it ſeems, great part of the revenue, which uſed to be applied to the civil liſt, having been by a former parliament appropriated to other uſes, her majeſty found herſelf under very great difficulties in paying her ſervants, and ſome other private demands; and this was more grievous to that princeſs, having been always remarkable for her œconomy, and regular and punctual payments; whereupon ſhe ſent a meſſage to the commons, in conſequence of which that houſe reſolved, that the ſum of five hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed on the civil liſt revenue. About this time advice being received that the chevalier St. George had for ſome time taken up his reſidence in Lorrain, the two houſes of parliament ſeverally addreſſed her majeſty, that ſhe would uſe the moſt preſſing inſtances with the duke of Lorrain, and with all the princes and ſtates in amity with her majeſty, that they would not receive or ſuffer the pretender to her crowns to continue in any of their dominions; which ſhe promiſed them ſhe would do.

Some little time before, the commons had addreſſed the queen to let them know what equivalent ſhould be given for the demolition of Dunkirk; and ſhe gave them to underſtand, that this was already in the hands of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty: what it was, however, ſhe did not think proper to explain, ſo that the commons were left as much in the dark as ever. They afterwards beſought her majeſty, that ſhe would not evacuate the towns in Flanders, which were in her poſſeſſion, until thoſe who were entitled to the ſovereignty of the Spaniſh Netherlands, ſhould agree to ſuch articles for regulating trade, as might place the ſubjects of Great Britain upon an equal footing with thoſe of other nations: to which her majeſty returned a favourable answer†.

On the ſixteenth of July her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, which was not at all agreeable to the violent Whigs, becauſe it did not contain a word about the pretender and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, from whence they inferred that ſhe was biſſed in favour of the chevalier de St. George. The lord-chancellor, by her majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, but it never ſat more; for on the eighth of Auguſt a proclamation was iſſued for diſſolving the preſent parliament, and declaring her majeſty's intention of calling a new one. Accordingly, on the eighteenth of the ſame month, writs were iſſued in due form, and the new parliament appointed to meet on the twelfth of November.

This ſummer the magiſtracy of Dunkirk ſent a deputation with an addreſs to the queen, humbly imploring her majeſty to ſpare the port and harbour of that town, and repreſenting that they might be uſeful to her own ſubjects. To this addreſs lord Bolingbroke, by her majeſty's order, returned this answer; "That the queen had read, with attention, the addreſſes he had preſented to her in the name of the magiſtrates of the town of Dunkirk, and ſhe had commanded him to tell them, that ſhe beheld with ſorrow the damages which the inhabitants of that town would sustain by the demolishing of its ramparts and harbour; but that she did not think it convenient to make any alteration in a thing agreed on and determined by a treaty." Hereupon mons. Fugghe, the principal deputy, presented a second address or memorial to her majesty on the same subject, which he caused to be printed and published. The arguments it contained were answered and refuted by Addison, Steele, and Mainwaring. Commissioners were sent to see the fortifications of Dunkirk entirely demolished. They were accordingly razed to the ground, and the harbour was filled up. On the other hand, the queen, by her instances at the court of Versailles, had procured the enlargement of one hundred and thirty-six protestants from the galleys; but hearing that one hundred and eighty-five more were detained on the same account (that of religion), she made such application to the French ministry, that they too were released, and thus by her powerful influence restored to the greatest of all human blessings, liberty, they proclaimed her majesty's piety and goodness through the world.

On the twenty-fourth of August, the queen was seized with a violent ague-fit, which at first proved alarming; but her majesty soon appeared abroad again, to the great joy of all her subjects.

I shall here take notice of some promotions that were made in the course of this year. In February, Dr. Offly was made bishop of St. Davids, in the room of Dr. Blis, who was translated to the see of Hereford; in April, the lord-keeper Harcourt was made lord-chancellor of Great Britain; on the eighth of June, sir Thomas Powys took his place as one of the judges of the Queen's Bench; and sir John Bannister sat the first time as baron of the Exchequer: and about the same time the Rev. Dr. Atterbury was made bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster; Robert Benson, esq. chancellor of the Exchequer, was created baron Bingley; Dr. Robinson, bishop of Bristol, late plenipotentiary at the congress of Utrecht, was translated to the see of London; and the lord Willoughby of Brooke, was made dean of Windsor. Her majesty was also pleased to bestow some marks of her favour on the earl of Peterborough, by creating him knight of the Garter, in the room of the late duke Hamilton, and appointed him to go ambassador to the new king of Sicily.

After the peace there were nothing but quarrels and contentions among the ministers: Bolingbroke was for undermining the treasurer, as not enduring to be second in the administration; and, the better to gratify his ambition, was for pushing matters to extremity against the Whigs, and was even suspected of designs against the protestant succession. Bolingbroke found means to insinuate himself into the confidence of lady Masham, to whom the earl of Oxford had given some cause of disgust: by the intrigues of this favourite he daily gained ground in the good opinion of his sovereign, while the treasurer lost in the same proportion. Bolingbroke had formed a scheme to put himself and chancellor Harcourt at the head of the High-church party, and had opposed the duke of Shrewsbury's being sent over to France. The lord-treasurer, however, brought his own scheme to bear, which was, "That the duke of Ormond should stay in England to attend the army-affairs, which was necessary at the time of disbanding; that the duke of Shrewsbury should go to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, upon his return from France; that the earl of Finlater should be chancellor of Scotland; the earl of Mar, third secretary of state; the lord Dartmouth, privy-seal; Mr. Speaker Bromley, secretary of state; and sir William Wyndham, chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of Robert Benson, esq. lately created lord Bingley, and named ambassador extraordinary to the court of Madrid. This new scheme perfectly defeated that of lord Bolingbroke and his friends, which threw them into a great rage; and the lord chancellor declared the promotion of the earl of Finlater to be against law, and would not treat that nobleman with decency; and lord Mar and secretary Bromley received many instances of ill usage. Most of these changes were declared from the middle of August to the middle of September; and about that time Thomas Foley was appointed auditor of the imprest accounts, in the room of Mr. Maynwaring deceased; the lord Lansdown, treasurer of the household, in the room of the earl of Cholmondeley, formerly removed; sir John Stonehouse, comptroller of the household, in the room of the lord Lansdown; the lord Delaware, treasurer of the chamber, in the room of the lord Fitzharding, deceased; Francis Gwin, secretary of war, in the room of sir William Wyndham; and Thomas Moore, brother to Arthur Moore, pay-master of the land-forces abroad, in the room of Mr. Bridges. About this time likewise the duke of Northumberland and sir John Stonehouse were sworn of the privy-council; and the earl of Denbigh made one of the tellers of the Exchequer*.

The duke of Shrewsbury being appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, convoked the parliament of that kingdom on the twenty-fifth day of November, when it soon appeared that the divisions in England had affected that island. Prodigious riots were made at the elections, and one in particular at Dublin, which could not be appeased without the soldiery: however, by the choice of a speaker (Mr. Allan Broderick), chairman of the committee of elections, and other methods, the Whigs got the majority in the house of commons, who began the business of the session by ordering a prosecution against one Edward Lloyd, for publishing a book entitled, "Memoirs of the Chevalier de St. George." Then they fell upon sir Constantine Phipps, the chancellor, one of the violent Tory party, and voted an address to the queen, to remove him. This gentleman's conduct had, indeed, been very exceptionable; and it was no secret, that he had an attachment to the exiled family. The house of lords, however, who were chiefly Tories, opposed the commons by a counter-address to the queen, in favour of the chancellor, as did likewise the convocation. During these convulsions, the duke of Shrewsbury behaved with wonderful temper and prudence; and left nothing undone to keep things in some order; but finding that the commons were resolved to oppose all the measures of the court, he thought proper to prorogue the parliament; and leaving chancellor Phipps, with the archbishops of Armagh and Tuam, justices of the kingdom, he returned to England in the beginning of the year 1714.

All this while the party-writers and managers on both sides were extremely busy in England in preparing the minds of the people to favour their respective interests in the new elections for parliament; but, notwithstanding the weight and influence of the court, and the visible partiality of some returning officers, a far greater number of Whigs were chosen than was by many expected: the meeting of the parliament, however, was delayed by repeated prorogations to the tenth day of December, a delay partly owing to the queen's ill state of health, partly to the contests that prevailed among her ministers, which were frequently carried to very indecent lengths even in the royal presence. Bolingbroke was powerfully supported by the lord-chancellor Harcourt, sir William Wyndham, and Mr. secretary Bromley: Oxford perceived the decline of his own influence, and began to think of retirement.

In the mean time, the queen was, on the twenty-fourth of December, taken very ill at Windsor. It was given out to be no more than an ague-fit, for which she took the bark, which had its effect; but, whatever the distemper was in reality, it was so sudden and violent, that for some minutes she was thought to be dead. The Jacobites appeared greatly elated at this period, while those who were friends to the protestant succession in the illustrious house of Hanover, trembled at the prospect of what might happen. The public funds immediately fell, and a great run was made upon the Bank: the queen, being made acquainted with these circumstances, signed a letter to sir Samuel Stanier, lord-mayor of London, declaring that she was recovered of her late indisposition, and that she was determined to open the new parliament on the sixteenth day of February.

While England was harrassed by these intestine commotions, the emperor Charles III. now left to contend singly with all the power of France, wrote circular letters to all the princes of the empire, to acquaint them with the reasons why his ministers could not concur in the peace, and soliciting their aid: to which the diet of the empire returned for answer, that they had resolved to support his imperial majesty, in the prosecution of the war, with all possible vigour, not doubting, they said, but by the effects of this resolution, so unanimously taken by the whole body of the empire, and their united forces, to reduce the exorbitant power and intolerable ambition of France, and restore Germany to its former flourishing condition. But they found themselves miserably mistaken; for marshal Villars having (as I have already related) secured the rest of French Flanders, marched towards the Rhine, and, after making himself master of Spire, Worms, and all the circumjacent country, he took Landau, which the emperor might have kept by acceding to the peace; forced the lines which prince Eugene had ordered to be drawn from Brisgau; defeated marshal Vaubanne who defended those lines; and lastly besieged Friburg, the capital of Upper Austria, which surrendered on the thirtieth of October, 1713. The court of Vienna pressed the circles of the empire to send the succours they had promised, but no succours came. The emperor now began to be sensible, that without the assistance of England and Holland he could never prevail against France, and resolved upon peace when it was too late. Accordingly conferences were opened, at the instances of the electors of Cologne and Palatine, at the castle of Al Rastadt, between marshal Villars and prince Eugene, on the twenty-sixth of November. In the beginning of February, 1714, they separated, without seeming to have come to any conclusion; but all the articles being settled between the courts of Vienna and Versailles, they met again at the latter end of the month; the treaty was signed on the third of March; and orders were sent to the governors and commanders on both sides to desist from all hostilities.

There was no notice taken in this treaty of the pretensions which the emperor still maintained to the Spanish monarchy, nor of the empty title of Catholic King which he continued to bear after Philip V. was in quiet possession of that kingdom. Lewis XIV. however agreed to yield to the emperor Old Brisac, with all its dependencies, Friburg, the forts in the Brisgau and Black Forest, together with fort Kehl. He engaged to demolish the fortifications opposite to Hunningen, the fort of Sellingen, and all between that and fort Louis. The town and fortress of Landau were yielded to the king of France, who acknowledged the elector of Hanover. The electors of Bavaria and Cologne were restored to all their dignities and dominions. The emperor was put in immediate possession of the Spanish Netherlands; and the king of Prussia was permitted to retain the high quarter of Gueldres. In conclusion, the contracting parties agreed, that a congress should be held in the month of May at Baden in Switzerland, for terminating all differences; and prince Eugene and marshal de Villars were declared their first plenipotentiaries*.

Her majesty, as soon as she was able, came from Windsor to St. James's, when she was pleased to translate sir William Dawes from the see of Chester to the archbishopric of York. On the sixteenth of February, 1714, the new parliament (the fourth of Great Britain), was opened by commission, and sir Thomas Hanmer, who had distinguished himself in the last session by his opposition to the bill for rendering effectual the treaty of navigation and commerce with France, was chosen speaker of the house of commons: then the house adjourned to the second of March. During this adjournment, the ratifications of the treaty between Great Britain and Spain (of which I have already taken notice) being exchanged, the peace was proclaimed in London, and the articles were approved by the greatest part of the nation. On the second of March, the queen, who still continued in a bad state of health, was carried in a chair to the house of lords, when she made a speech to both houses, importing, "that she had obtained an honourable and advantageous peace for her own people, and for the greatest part of her allies; and she hoped her interposition might prove effectual to complete the settlement of Europe: that some persons had been so malicious as to insinuate, that the protestant succession in the house of Hanover was in danger under her government; but those, who endeavoured to distract the minds of men with imaginary dangers, could only mean to disturb the public tranquillity: that, after all she had done to secure the religion and liberties of her people, and to transmit them safe to posterity, she could not mention such proceedings without some degree of warmth; and she hoped her parliament would agree with her that attempts to weaken her authority, or render the possession of the crown uneasy to her, could never be proper means to strengthen the protestant succession."

It is not very easy to account for the queen's expressing her hope, that her interposition might prove effectual to complete the settlement of Europe, seeing that the emperor, who was at this very time engaged in a treaty with France, would neither admit her ambassador to the conferences, nor even acquaint her with the substance of the negotiation. But this, and some other inconsistencies which were contained in this speech, were overlooked by the parliament; and both houses, together with the convocation, concurred in very affectionate addresses to the queen, who returned most gracious answers*.

It was not long, however, before the lords presented another address to her majesty, against a pamphlet, entitled, "The Public Spirit of the Whigs," which was principally levelled against the duke of Argyll, though, through him, the sixteen Scottish peers who sat in the house, were reflected upon, and the Union treated with great contempt: Barber (afterwards lord-mayor of London), the printer, and Morphew, the publisher, were both taken into custody of the black-rod, and a proclamation was issued, offering a reward of three hundred pounds to any person for discovering the author†.

On the other hand, a complaint was made in the house of commons, by Mr. auditor Foley, against the author of certain scandalous papers called "The Englishman," and "The Crisis," as containing several paragraphs tending to sow sedition, reflecting upon her majesty, and arraigning her administration and government. Mr. Richard Steele, a member of the house, acknowledging himself the author of those pieces, a day was appointed for his trial. On the thirteenth of March Mr. Steele made a very long defence, in which he was assisted by his friends, Mr. Addison, general Stanhope, and Mr. Walpole. The attack against him was managed by sir William Wyndham, Mr. Foley, and the attorney-general. In a word, he was cast by a great majority of two hundred and forty-five against one hundred and fifty-two, and it was voted that he should be expelled the house.

The lords taking into consideration the state of the nation, addressed her majesty to acquaint them with the steps that had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain; that she would communicate to them an account of the negotiations of peace; an account of the instances that had been made in favour of the Catalans; and an account of the moneys granted by parliament since the year 1710, for carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal. They afterwards agreed to other addresses, beseeching her majesty to lay before them the debts and state of the navy, the particular writs of "Noli prosequi" granted since her accession to the throne, with several other matters; and then the house adjourned itself to the last day of March.

A report being industriously propagated about this time, of a design undertaken by France in behalf of the pretender, the ambassador of that crown at the Hague disowned it in a public paper, by command of his most Christian majesty. Nevertheless, the minds of the people had been too deeply practised upon to be convinced by this or any other declaration; and what seemed to rivet their apprehensions, was the great alteration now made in military and civil posts, which were bestowed upon professed Tories, some of whom were at the bottom attached to the pretender. This measure, however, is to be imputed rather to Bolingbroke than the treasurer, who advised moderate measures, and who is said to have made advances towards a reconciliation with the leaders of the Whig party, who, alarmed at a change so much to their disadvantage, and either apprehending, or affecting to apprehend, that a design was formed to secure the pretender's accession to the throne of Great Britain, held secret consultations with baron Schutz, the resident from Hanover. They also maintained a correspondence with that elector and the duke of Marlborough, who, in case of necessity, would have easily procured the States-general to support any design he thought proper to form. Not content with this, they actually formed a plan for seizing the Tower, upon the first appearance of danger in regard to the queen's life (who now visibly decayed from day to day), and confining in it such persons as were obnoxious to them. This conduct of the Whigs was resolute, active, and would have been laudable, had their zeal been confined within the bounds of truth and moderation; but they were moreover guilty of unpardonable falsehoods, to excite and encourage the fears and jealousies of the people.

The house of lords being again met, the distressed state of the Catalans, the pretender, and the danger that threatened the protestant succession, furnished a variety of changes upon the alarm-bell of sedition and party malevolence; but nothing so much disgraced this illustrious assembly as that spirit of persecution and rancorous hatred, which they exerted with respect to the pretender. Not contented with hunting him from one country to another, they seemed earnestly bent to extirpate him from the face of the earth, as if it had been a crime in him to be born; they even proceeded so far as to address the queen to set a price upon his head. To this address, which was delivered by the chancellor and the Whig lords only, the queen replied in these words: "My lords, it would be a real strengthening to the succession in the house of Hanover, as well as a support to my government, that an end was put to those groundless fears and jealousies, which have been so industriously promoted: I do not, at this time, see any occasion for such a proclamation: whenever I judge it to be necessary, I will give orders for having it issued: with regard to the other particulars of this address, I will take care to give the proper directions‡."

† Proceed. of the House of Lords.

‡ About this time an agent of the late king James's queen offered to file a bill in chancery, wherein he demanded in her name, the sum of six hundred and fifty thousand pounds due to her by the crown of England, for the dowry of fifty thousand pounds per annum, since the death of king James; but the agent having in the bill, given her the title of "Queen-mother,"

The Whig party were not a little dissatisfied with this answer; and in order to give her all the mortification possible, the earl of Wharton proposed this question in the house of lords, Whether the protestant succession was in danger under the present administration? A warm debate ensued, but at length the succession was voted out of danger, by a majority of voices.

About this period an accident happened, which was not a little surprising, and occasioned many speculations at this time. Baron Schutz, the Hanoverian envoy, demanded of the lord chancellor a writ for the electoral prince to sit in the house of peers, as duke of Cambridge. The chancellor, in some surprize, said it was a matter that demanded some consideration, to make out writs for peers who did not reside in the kingdom; however, he would immediately acquaint the queen with it. The envoy replied in a menacing tone, that he doubted not but his lordship knew the nature of his office; but as to the difficulty by the prince's absence, he was resolved to come over, and very possibly might be landed before the writ was made out. The queen was so offended with the baron's applying to the chancellor, without first signifying his intention to her, that she forbade him the court; and, resolved not to afford her enemies the malicious pleasure of turning their backs upon her in her life-time, to worship the rising sun, she wrote the following letter to the princess Sophia, which, from the good sense and spirit that display themselves in the composition, well deserves a place in this work.

"Madam, sister, aunt,

"Since the right of succession to my kingdoms has been declared to belong to you, and your family, there have always been disaffected persons, who, from particular views of their own interest, have entered into measures to fix a prince of your blood in my dominions, even while I am yet living. I never thought, till now, that this project would have gone so far, as to have made the least impression on your mind. But, as I have lately perceived, by public rumours, which are industriously spread, that your electoral highness is come into this sentiment, it is of importance, with respect to the succession of your family, that I should tell you, such a proceeding will infallibly draw along with it some consequences, that might be dangerous to the succession itself, which is not secure any other way than as the prince, who actually wears the crown, maintains her authority and prerogative. There are here (such is our misfortune) many persons, who are seditiously disposed. So I leave you to judge, what tumults they may be able to raise, if they should have a pretext to begin a commotion. I persuade myself, therefore, you will never consent, that the least thing should be done, which may disturb the repose of me and my subjects.

"Open yourself to me with the same freedom I do to you, and propose whatever you think may contribute to the security of the succession. I will come into it with zeal, provided it do not derogate from my dignity, which I am resolved to maintain. I am, with great affection, &c."

At the same time, she wrote a letter to the duke of Cambridge, in these terms:

"Cousin,

"An accident, which has happened in my lord Paget's family, having hindered him from setting forward so soon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with respect to the design you have of coming into my kingdoms. As the opening of the matter ought to have been made to me, so I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendship I have for you, and the electoral house to which you belong, that I should tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquility of my dominions, and the right of succession in your line, and consequently more disagreeable to me, than such a proceeding at this juncture. I am, with great friendship,

"Your very affectionate cousin,

"ANNE R."

Another letter was written to the elector himself, the contents of which were never communicated to the public.

The lord-treasurer took this opportunity, by his brother, Mr. Thomas Harley, to assure the elector of his inviolable attachment to the house of Hanover. The electoral prince, who, in all probability, had been wrong advised by some of the Whig party, who wanted to make him an instrument to compass their own ends, was so convinced, by the queen's letter, of the impropriety of coming to England during her life-time, that, though he obtained the writ, he never thought proper to use it. Towards the latter end of April, the lords took into consideration the treaties of peace and commerce, to which many exceptions were taken; but at length the majority carried the question in favour of an address, "acknowledging her majesty's goodness in delivering them, by a safe and advantageous peace with France, from a burthen of a consuming land-war, unequally carried on, and become at last impracticable*."

In the beginning of May, the rev. Mr. Bedford, who had been convicted of publishing a book, shewing the monarchy of England to be hereditary, was sentenced in the court of Queen's Bench to pay a fine of one thousand marks, and to remain in prison for three years, and afterwards to be bound in a recognizance, with four sufficient sureties, in the sum of five thousand pounds, for his good behaviour during life; and he was ordered to be brought to all the courts in Westminster-hall, with a paper on his breast signifying his offence: but the latter part of his sentence her majesty was pleased to remit, out of regard to the delinquent's sacerdotal character.

On the demand of the duke of Cambridge's writ, by the baron Schutz, a consultation had been held by the ministry, wherein it was debated, Whether the queen should invite over the duke?

the officer refused to file it, upon which the agent changed the title, and presented it in the name of "the most illustrious princess Maria, relict of James II. king of England." Though no notice was taken of this formal demand, yet, pur-

public tranquillity: that, after all she had done to secure the religion and liberties of her people, and to transmit them safe to posterity, she could not mention such proceedings without some degree of warmth; and she hoped her parliament would agree with her that attempts to weaken her authority, or render the possession of the crown uneasy to her, could never be proper means to strengthen the protestant succession.*

It is not very easy to account for the queen's expressing her hope, that her interposition might prove effectual to complete the settlement of Europe, seeing that the emperor, who was at this very time engaged in a treaty with France, would neither admit her ambassador to the conferences, nor even acquaint her with the substance of the negotiation. But this, and some other inconsistencies which were contained in this speech, were overlooked by the parliament; and both houses, together with the convocation, concurred in very affectionate addresses to the queen, who returned most gracious answers*.

It was not long, however, before the lords presented another address to her majesty, against a pamphlet, entitled, "The Public Spirit of the Whigs," which was principally levelled against the duke of Argyll, though, through him, the sixteen Scottish peers who sat in the house, were reflected upon, and the Union treated with great contempt: Barber (afterwards lord-mayor of London), the printer, and Morphew, the publisher, were both taken into custody of the black-rod, and a proclamation was issued, offering a reward of three hundred pounds to any person for discovering the author†.

On the other hand, a complaint was made in the house of commons, by Mr. auditor Foley, against the author of certain scandalous papers called "The Englishman," and "The Crisis," as containing several paragraphs tending to sow sedition, reflecting upon her majesty, and arraigning her administration and government. Mr. Richard Steele, a member of the house, acknowledging himself the author of those pieces, a day was appointed for his trial. On the thirteenth of March Mr. Steele made a very long defence, in which he was assisted by his friends, Mr. Addison, general Stanhope, and Mr. Walpole. The attack against him was managed by sir William Wyndham, Mr. Foley, and the attorney-general. In a word, he was cast by a great majority of two hundred and forty-five against one hundred and fifty-two, and it was voted that he should be expelled the house.

The lords taking into consideration the state of the nation, addressed her majesty to acquaint them with the steps that had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain; that she would communicate to them an account of the negotiations of peace; an account of the instances that had been made in favour of the Catalans; and an account of the moneys granted by parliament since the year 1710, for carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal. They afterwards agreed to other addresses, beseeching her majesty to lay before them the debts and state of the navy, the particular writs of "Noli prosequi" granted since her accession to the throne, with several other matters; and then the house adjourned itself to the last day of March.

A report being industriously propagated about this time, of a design undertaken by France in behalf of the pretender, the ambassador of that crown at the Hague disowned it in a public paper, by command of his most Christian majesty. Nevertheless, the minds of the people had been too deeply practised upon to be convinced by this or any other declaration; and what seemed to rivet their apprehensions, was the great alteration now made in military and civil posts, which were bestowed upon professed Tories, some of whom were at the bottom attached to the pretender. This measure, however, is to be imputed rather to Bolingbroke than the treasurer, who advised moderate measures, and who is said to have made advances towards a reconciliation with the leaders of the Whig party, who, alarmed at a change so much to their disadvantage, and either apprehending, or affecting to apprehend, that a design was formed to secure the pretender's accession to the throne of Great Britain, held secret consultations with baron Schutz, the resident from Hanover. They also maintained a correspondence with that elector and the duke of Marlborough, who, in case of necessity, would have easily procured the States-general to support any design he thought proper to form. Not content with this, they actually formed a plan for seizing the Tower, upon the first appearance of danger in regard to the queen's life (who now visibly decayed from day to day), and confining in it such persons as were obnoxious to them. This conduct of the Whigs was resolute, active, and would have been laudable, had their zeal been confined within the bounds of truth and moderation; but they were moreover guilty of unpardonable falsehoods, to excite and encourage the fears and jealousies of the people.

The house of lords being again met, the distressed state of the Catalans, the pretender, and the danger that threatened the protestant succession, furnished a variety of changes upon the alarm-bell of sedition and party malevolence; but nothing so much disgraced this illustrious assembly as that spirit of persecution and rancorous hatred, which they exerted with respect to the pretender. Not contented with hunting him from one country to another, they seemed earnestly bent to extirpate him from the face of the earth, as if it had been a crime in him to be born; they even proceeded so far as to address the queen to set a price upon his head. To this address, which was delivered by the chancellor and the Whig lords only, the queen replied in these words: "My lords, it would be a real strengthening to the succession in the house of Hanover, as well as a support to my government, that an end was put to those groundless fears and jealousies, which have been so industriously promoted: I do not, at this time, see any occasion for such a proclamation: whenever I judge it to be necessary, I will give orders for having it issued: with regard to the other particulars of this address, I will take care to give the proper directions‡."

† Proceed. of the House of Lords.

‡ About this time an agent of the late king James's queen offered to file a bill in chancery, wherein he demanded in her name, the sum of six hundred and fifty thousand pounds due to her by the crown of England, for the dowry of fifty thousand pounds per annum, since the death of king James; but the agent having in the bill, given her the title of "Queen-mother,"

The Whig party were not a little dissatisfied with this answer; and in order to give her all the mortification possible, the earl of Wharton proposed this question in the house of lords, Whether the protestant succession was in danger under the present administration? A warm debate ensued, but at length the succession was voted out of danger, by a majority of voices.

About this period an accident happened, which was not a little surprising, and occasioned many speculations at this time. Baron Schutz, the Hanoverian envoy, demanded of the lord-chancellor a writ for the electoral prince to sit in the house of peers, as duke of Cambridge. The chancellor, in some surprize, said it was a matter that demanded some consideration, to make out writs for peers who did not reside in the kingdom; however, he would immediately acquaint the queen with it. The envoy replied in a menacing tone, that he doubted not but his lordship knew the nature of his office; but as to the difficulty by the prince's absence, he was resolved to come over, and very possibly might be landed before the writ was made out. The queen was so offended with the baron's applying to the chancellor, without first signifying his intention to her, that she forbid him the court; and, resolved not to afford her enemies the malicious pleasure of turning their backs upon her in her life-time, to worship the rising sun, she wrote the following letter to the princess Sophia, which, from the good sense and spirit that display themselves in the composition, well deserves a place in this work.

"Madam, sister, aunt,

"Since the right of succession to my kingdoms has been declared to belong to you, and your family, there have always been disaffected persons, who, from particular views of their own interest, have entered into measures to fix a prince of your blood in my dominions, even while I am yet living. I never thought, till now, that this project would have gone so far, as to have made the least impression on your mind. But, as I have lately perceived, by public rumours, which are industriously spread, that your electoral highness is come into this sentiment, it is of importance, with respect to the succession of your family, that I should tell you, such a proceeding will infallibly draw along with it some consequences, that might be dangerous to the succession itself, which is not secure any other way than as the prince, who actually wears the crown, maintains her authority and prerogative. There are here (such is our misfortune) many persons, who are seditiously disposed. So I leave you to judge, what tumults they may be able to raise, if they should have a pretext to begin a commotion. I persuade myself, therefore, you will never consent, that the least thing should be done, which may disturb the repose of me and my subjects.

"Open yourself to me with the same freedom I do to you, and propose whatever you think may contribute to the security of the succession. I will come into it with zeal, provided it do not derogate from my dignity, which I am resolved to maintain. I am, with great affection, &c."

At the same time, she wrote a letter to the duke of Cambridge, in these terms:

"Cousin,

"An accident, which has happened in my lord Paget's family, having hindered him from setting forward so soon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with respect to the design you have of coming into my kingdoms. As the opening of the matter ought to have been made to me, so I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendship I have for you, and the electoral house to which you belong, that I should tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquility of my dominions, and the right of succession in your line, and consequently more disagreeable to me, than such a proceeding at this juncture. I am, with great friendship,

"Your very affectionate cousin,

"ANNE R."

Another letter was written to the elector himself, the contents of which were never communicated to the public.

The lord-treasurer took this opportunity, by his brother, Mr. Thomas Harley, to assure the elector of his inviolable attachment to the house of Hanover. The electoral prince, who, in all probability, had been wrong advised by some of the Whig party, who wanted to make him an instrument to compass their own ends, was so convinced, by the queen's letter, of the impropriety of coming to England during her life-time, that, though he obtained the writ, he never thought proper to use it. Towards the latter end of April, the lords took into consideration the treaties of peace and commerce, to which many exceptions were taken; but at length the majority carried the question in favour of an address, "acknowledging her majesty's goodness in delivering them, by a safe and advantageous peace with France, from a burthen of a consuming land-war, unequally carried on, and become at last impracticable*."

In the beginning of May, the rev. Mr. Bedford, who had been convicted of publishing a book, shewing the monarchy of England to be hereditary, was sentenced in the court of Queen's Bench to pay a fine of one thousand marks, and to remain in prison for three years, and afterwards to be bound in a recognizance, with four sufficient sureties, in the sum of five thousand pounds, for his good behaviour during life; and he was ordered to be brought to all the courts in Westminster-hall, with a paper on his breast signifying his offence: but the latter part of his sentence her majesty was pleased to remit, out of regard to the delinquent's sacerdotal character.

the lord-treasurer, the lord-chancellor, the lord privy-seal, and another privy-counsellor, were for it; but the lord Bolingbroke having opposed it, and carried the negative, resolved to push his point, and, by his subsequent behaviour, gave but too much reason to suspect him of a design to defeat the protestant succession. However that might be, from this time he broke all measures with the treasurer. On the twelfth of May, sir William Wyndham made a motion for a bill "to prevent the growth of schism, and for the farther security of the church of England, as by law established." The design of it was to prevent dissenters from teaching in schools and academies. It was accordingly prepared, and eagerly opposed in each house, as a species of persecution, which in truth it was: nevertheless, it made its way through both houses, and received the royal assent; but the queen dying before it took place, this law was rendered ineffectual.

On the twenty-ninth of June, baron Bothmar, envoy extraordinary from the elector of Hanover, arrived in London, and having had a private audience of her majesty, he notified the death of the princess Sophia. This princess, walking in the gardens of Herenhausen, on the eighth of June, in the evening, was taken with an apoplectic fit, and died in the arms of the electoral princess (afterwards queen Caroline), before any one could come to her assistance. She was the fourth and youngest daughter of Frederic, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth his consort, daughter of king James I. and was born at the Hague, on the third of October 1630. Upon her death the court of England appeared in deep mourning, and the elector of Brunswick was ordered to be prayed for by name, in the Liturgy of the church of England.

About this time the house of commons concurred with the lords in voting the protestant succession out of danger. The Whigs, however, had great advantage over the Tories in the upper house, in reference to the treaty of commerce with Spain; and all that could be said in defence of the ministry availed very little. Sir William Hodges, Mr. Mead, and about thirty more eminent merchants trading to Spain being called into the house of lords, unanimously averred, that unless the explanation of the third, fifth, and eighth articles were rescinded, they could not carry on their commerce without losing twenty or twenty-five per cent. These explanations had been made at Madrid, after signing the treaty at Utrecht. It was observed the treasurer joined with the lords who insisted on hearing the Spanish merchants, which was strenuously opposed by the lord Bolingbroke. But, after a long debate, it was resolved to address the queen "to cause all the papers relating to the negotiation of the treaty of commerce with Spain, to be laid before the house, together with the names of the persons who advised her majesty to that treaty." The ministry were so confounded at this sudden attack, that they could think of no better answer to put into the queen's mouth, than "that she had been given to understand the three explanatory articles of the treaty of commerce with Spain were not detrimental to the trade of her subjects, and therefore she had consented to their being ratified with the said treaty."

This answer was excepted to by several members, as unsatisfactory; and, among the rest, the earl of Wharton and lord Halifax said openly, "that if so little regard was shewn to the addresses and applications of that august assembly to the sovereign, they knew not what business they had in that house." The same lords then moved for a representation to the queen, to lay before her the insuperable difficulties that attended the Spanish trade upon the foot of the late treaty; which being agreed to, and presented, the queen returned this general answer, "that it had been her care to procure all possible advantages for her subjects in trade, and that she should continue her endeavours to obtain farther benefits, and particularly in the trade with Spain, which was so useful to her people." The lords were as little pleased with this answer as with the last, and some of them took occasion to complain of her majesty's silence in relation to the desire of the house, that she would be pleased to name the persons who had advised her to ratify the treaty of commerce with Spain; and it was moved that another address might be presented, in which the house should insist in stronger terms on her majesty's naming the persons who had advised her to ratify the three explanatory articles, and some hot speeches were made on both sides on that affair; but the lottery bill being ready for the royal assent, the queen came the very next day (July 9) to the house of peers, and put an end to the session. It was the general opinion, that if the parliament had sat one day longer, the lords would have ordered a prosecution against Mr. Arthur Moore, a member of the lower house, who was an agent of lord Bolingbroke's, and had the chief management of the treaty, and who by several circumstances appeared to have been corrupted by the Spanish court: nay, many expected that their lordships would have carried their resentment of his and Bolingbroke's conduct in relation to this treaty, so far as to commit them both to the Tower.

Her majesty, in her speech to the two houses at the end of this session, and which was the last she made in parliament, after thanking them for the supplies they had granted, assured them, that her chief care was to preserve the protestant religion, the liberty of her subjects, and to secure the tranquility of her kingdom: she then concluded in these words: "But I must tell you plainly, that these desirable ends can never be attained, unless you bring the same dispositions on your parts; unless all groundless jealousies, which create and foment divisions among you, be laid aside, and unless you show the same regard for my just prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have always expressed for the rights of my people." The parliament was then prorogued to the tenth of August; a day, however, the queen lived not to see.

Her majesty's constitution was now quite broken; one fit of sickness succeeded another; and what completed the ruin of her health, was the anxiety of her mind, occasioned partly by the discontents which had been raised and fomented by the enemies of her government, and partly by the dissensions among her ministers, which were now become intolerable; for, forgetting their duty to her, and regard for their country, they consulted only their ambitious views, so that whenever they met in council, they studied rather to cross each other's proposals, than to settle or pursue any regular plan: and to such a monstrous extravagance did did these jealousies arrive at last, that it is believed a quarrel between the treasurer and lord Bolingbroke, in her presence, proved in some measure the cause of her death. In the mean time, the latter prevailed, and the earl of Oxford was, on the twenty-seventh day of July, divested of all his employments. This occasioned the dukes of Somerset and Argyll to come into the council, who were followed by some other privy-councillors, friends to the Hanover succession, which gave a turn to that board; and, by their advice, the queen, two days after, gave the white staff to the duke of Shrewsbury, tho' he was lord-chamberlain and lord-lieutenant of Ireland at the same time. This was no small mortification to Bolingbroke, who did not doubt of succeeding his rival as prime minister in the administration of affairs, and is said to have formed a design of a coalition with the duke of Marlborough, who at this very time embarked at Ostend for England. It has been asserted that Oxford had attempted the same expedient, but had met with a repulse from the duke, who had solemnly vowed never to be reconciled to that minister.

The general confusion that followed at court, upon the dismissal of the treasurer, and the fatigue of attending a long cabinet-council on the event, had such an effect upon the queen's spirits, that, on the twenty-ninth of July (being then at Windsor) she was seized with a lethargic disorder, and the next day, about seven in the morning, was struck with an apoplexy; and from that time continued in a dying condition. About three in the afternoon she recovered her senses a little, and then it was that, at the request of her privy-council, she gave the treasurer's staff to the duke of Shrewsbury, bidding him use it for the good of her people. This was the last act of her government, for the council now took upon themselves the direction of public affairs, appointing the earl of Berkeley to command the fleet, and sending general Witham to take the command of the troops in Scotland. Orders were dispatched to four regiments of horse and dragoons, quartered in remote counties, to march up to the neighbourhood of London and Westminster; seven of the ten British battalions in the Netherlands, were directed to embark at Ostend for England, with all possible dispatch: an embargo was laid upon all shipping; and directions were given for equipping all the ships of war that could soonest be got ready for service: in a word, no one step was omitted, that seemed likely to over-awe the Jacobite faction, and secure the peaceable accession of that illustrious prince on whom the crown of these realms was now about to devolve.

In the mean time the queen continued in the hands of her physicians and domestics, some of whom flattered themselves with false hopes to the last; but the blisters, which had been applied as the last resort, not rising, her majesty, about seven in the morning of the first of August, 1714, breathed her last, in the fiftieth year of her age, and the thirteenth of her reign.

Queen Anne was, in her person, of the middle stature, and well proportioned; her complexion and shape excellent, till her constitution was impaired by grief and sickness. She appeared to best advantage speaking, for she had a clear harmonious voice, great good sense, and a very happy elocution. Her piety was unaffected, her humility was sincere, her good-nature conspicuous: she was a pattern of conjugal fidelity and affection, a tender mother, a warm friend, and a munificent patron.

Her character, viewed in a political light, is sufficiently apparent from the transactions of her reign, the greatest part of which was glorious, and the whole might have been so, had she not been abused by those in whom she reposed her confidence. That there were several schemes formed to restore the pretender to the crown of these realms, during the latter part of her reign, cannot be doubted; but that she herself designed him to be her successor (as is to this day believed by many weak or prejudiced persons), does not appear from any part of her conduct. Besides, it will be very difficult to make any honest thinking person believe that, after so many repeated and solemn assurances from the throne, of her being entirely in the interest of the house of Hanover and its succession, there could be so much hypocrisy lodged in the breast of a princess, who was otherwise so conspicuous for her virtue and piety, and who had given such evident proofs of her zeal for the protestant religion, in the most dangerous and worst of times. It is not the least addition to the glory of her reign, that it may be called Bloodless, no person having been executed, at least beheaded for treason, during the course of it; which cannot be said of any one of her predecessors since the reign of Edward I. who died in 1307. To conclude, nothing was wanting to have made her administration the most illustrious of any in the annals of history, but to have had subjects more united among themselves, and more capable of discerning the tenderness and sincerity of her affection for them.

Her majesty had issue, by the prince of Denmark,

1. A daughter that was still-born, the twelfth of May, 1684.
2. Lady Mary, a second daughter, born June 2, 1685, and died in February, 1690.
3. Anne Sophia, born May 12, 1686, and died the February following.
4. William, duke of Gloucester, born July 24, 1689, who lived to be eleven years of age.
5. The lady Mary, born in October 1690, who lived no longer than to be baptized.
6. George, another son, who died also soon after he was born.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, FROM

The Accession of the Illustrious Family of BRUNSWICK LUNENBURG, or HANOVER, A. D. 1714, to the Ratification of the Peace of Versailles, A. D. 1763.

PART XIII.

GEORGE I. A. D. 1714.

I Am now to enter upon a new period of time, and a total change in the order of succession to the throne of these realms; a change, however, to which we owe innumerable blessings, and which stamps upon this part of our history a still greater value than even the important Revolution, with which we ushered in this volume. The birth of a son to king James II. having been judged an imposture, calculated to answer the ends of tyranny and popery, the pretended prince of Wales was solemnly abjured by act of parliament, and all access to the throne of Great Britain for ever shut against him. Hereupon the house of Savoy came to be next in claim to the British dominions, as they drew their right from the princess Henrietta, daughter of king Charles I. but all catholics having been declared incapable of succeeding to the crown, as the only effectual means to preserve the protestant religion and the liberties of the state, it devolved of course to the house of Hanover, as the nearest protestant family to the line of succession. Upon this foundation it was, that, upon the death of the duke of Gloucester, by a statute made in the twelfth year of king William III. for limiting the succession of the crown, it was provided, that after the death of the queen, then princess Anne, without issue, it was to pass to the princess Sophia, of the most illustrious house of Hanover, as the next protestant heir, and that princess was acknowledged for lawful heir to the imperial crown of Great Britain.

Sophia, electress-dowager of Hanover, was daughter to the queen of Bohemia, who, before she married Frederick, elector Palatine and king of Bohemia, was styled the Princess Elizabeth of Great Britain, daughter to James VI. of Scotland and I. of England, in whom united all the hereditary claims to the crown of these realms. But the princess Sophia dying a very little while before the queen, George Lewis, elector of Hanover, her son, became heir of this crown on the demise of queen Anne. The protestant succession in the house of Hanover had been so firmly established by several acts of parliament, that it happily took place immediately on the queen's death, August 1, 1714, and king George had an easy and peaceable accession to the throne.

This prince possessed every qualification requisite to form a great sovereign. Endowed by nature with an extensive genius, which had been cultivated by a liberal education, he was perfectly capable to support the weight of a crown; at the same time his mature age, being then fifty-four years old (for he was born May 28, 1660), his experience, and his personal qualities, were such as seemed to leave his new subjects nothing to apprehend from his conduct. He had waged war in person with success, and his valour had gained him the esteem of the English, even before he came to be their sovereign. Filled with those sentiments that distinguish great minds, he loved to render justice impartially to all men, and delighted in conferring benefits on the deserving: "My maxim (said he, soon after his arrival in England) is never to abandon my friends; to do justice to all men; and to fear no man." As he had been born and educated in the bosom of the protestant church, the bulk of the English nation had fixed their hopes on him for the preservation of the constitution both in church and state. In a word, if ever a king mounted a throne with a prospect of tasting all the sweets of royalty, without experiencing any of its chagrin, it was George I. But, however, he was not without his disturbances.

By an act of parliament in the last reign, the administration of the government was vested in lords-justices: those expressly appointed by the act were the archbishop of Canterbury and the great officers of state for the time being. These were,

Dr. Tennison, archbishop of Canterbury.

Lord-chancellor Harcourt.

John Sheffield, duke of Buckinghamshire, lord-president.

Charles Talbot, duke of Shrewsbury, lord-treasurer.

William Legge, earl of Dartmouth, lord privy-seal.

Thomas Wentworth earl of Strafford, first commissioner of the admiralty.

Sir Thomas Parker, lord chief-justice of the King's Bench.

Besides these, the successor was empowered, by the same act, to add what other regents he pleased, by three instruments, one of them to be deposited with the archbishop of Canterbury, another with the lord-chancellor, and the third with the Hanover resident, which were to be opened at the queen's death. Accordingly his grace of Canterbury, as soon as he heard that her majesty was expired, immediately repaired to court, where he had not been for some time, and with his colleagues, produced the instruments, wherein his electoral highness had, under his own hand, nominated the following lords to be added to the others in the regency, viz.

The duke of Shrewsbury.

The duke of Somerset.

The duke of Bolton.

The duke of Devonshire.

The duke of Kent.

The duke of Argyll.

The duke of Montrose.

The duke of Roxborough.

The earl of Pomfret.

The earl of Anglesey.

The earl of Carlisle.

The earl of Nottingham.

The earl of Abingdon.

The earl of Scarborough.

The earl of Orford.

The lord viscount Townshend.

The lord Hallifax.

The lord Cowper*.

The regency thus fixed, the form of a proclamation was ordered by the lords of the council, for proclaiming "The high and mighty prince, George, elector of Brunfwick Lunenburg, king of Great Britain, France and Ireland;" which was accordingly performed the same day, with the usual solemnity, in the cities of London and Westminster, and as soon as possible all over England. His majesty was likewise proclaimed at Edinburgh on the fifth of August, and the next day at Dublin; at the same time the lords justices of Ireland issued a proclamation for disarming papists and seizing their horses. There was not the least disturbance or interruption given in any place to the proclaiming the king, only at Oxford, where the mayor received from a person, in a bachelor's gown, a letter, requiring him to proclaim the pretender. This being communicated to the vice-chancellor, a copy of it was immediately transmitted to Mr. secretary Bromley, member of parliament for the university, and the vice-chancellor offered a reward of one hundred pounds to any person who should discover the author.

On the thirty-first of July, the queen being then declared by her physicians past all hopes of recovery, Mr. Craggs had been dispatched to Hanover with the news, and the next day baron Bothmar, the Hanoverian resident, sent Mr. Godick, his secretary, with advice that she was actually deceased, and that his majesty had been joyfully and peaceably proclaimed: the lords-justices also appointed the earl of Dorset to carry the king the news of his accession, and to wait on him in his journey to England. They soon after appointed Mr. Joseph Addison their secretary, and ordered the post-master to send to him all the letters and packets directed to the secretaries of state, whereby the management of affairs was entirely taken out of the hands of the lord viscount Bolingbroke.

The parliament being continued after the queen's demise, pursuant to the act for regulating the succession, met in the afternoon of the day she died, though it was Sunday; and four days after, viz. August 5, the lord-chancellor, in the name of his brethren the lords-justices, made a speech to both houses, suitable to the present occasion. Both houses immediately agreed upon addresses of condolence for the death of the queen, and congratulations for his majesty's happy accession, promising to support his undoubted right to the imperial crown of these realms against the pretender and all other persons whatsoever: and desiring his speedy presence amongst them. These addresses were transmitted to his majesty by their excellencies the lords justices, and received most affectionate answers. That to the lords was as follows:

"I take this first opportunity to return you my hearty thanks for your address, and the assurances you have given me therein. The zeal and unanimity you have shewn upon my accession to the crown, are great encouragements to me; and I shall always esteem the continuance of them, as one of the greatest blessings of my reign. No one can be more truly sensible than I am, of the loss sustained by the death of the late queen, whose extraordinary piety and virtues so much endeared her to her people, and for whose memory I shall always have a particular regard. My best endeavours shall never be wanting to repair this loss to the nation. I will make it my constant care to preserve our religion, laws, and liberties inviolable, and to advance the honour and prosperity of my kingdoms. I am hastening to you, according to your desire, so affectionately expressed in your address *."

The answer to the commons was much to the same effect.

On the thirteenth of August, Mr. Craggs arrived in London, with letters from his majesty to the lord-justices, who thereupon went to the house of lords, and acquainted the parliament therewith, when both houses resolved upon an address of thanks to his majesty for the satisfaction he expressed in the loyalty and affection of his subjects. After this, the commons having finished the bill for the civil list, and one for making some alterations in the act for a state lottery, which, with some other bills, received the royal assent from the regency, the two houses were by his majesty's command, prorogued to the twenty-third of September.

Mr. Prior having intimated the queen's death to the court of Versailles, Lewis XIV. declared that he would inviolably maintain the peace of Utrecht, particularly with regard to the settlement of the British crown in the house of Hanover. The earl of Strafford also having notified the same event to the States-general, and Mr. Klingraef having presented them with a letter, in which his master demanded the performance of their guaranty, they promised to fulfil their engagements, and congratulated his electoral highness on his accession to the throne of Great Britain, invited him, at the same time, to pass through their dominions, assuring him that his interests were as dear to them as their own.

On the twenty-eighth of August, Mr. Murray arrived express from Hanover, with an account that the king had deferred his departure for some days; and brought several orders for the lord-justices and council, particularly one for removing the lord viscount Bolingbroke from his post of secretary of state, which was done on the thirty-first, not without some marks of the royal displeasure; the dukes of Shrewsbury and Somerset, and the lord Cowper, three of the lords-regents taking the seals from him, and locking and sealing up all the doors of his office. The lord viscount Townshend was soon after appointed to succeed him.

It may be necessary to acquaint the reader, that by this time the duke of Marlborough was come over to England. He had been here some days sooner, had he not been detained at Ostend by contrary winds. He happened to land at Dover the very day the queen died: it is said he knew nothing of this event any more than the mayor and jurats of Dover, by whom he was received in their formalities, with the acclamations of the people, and with a discharge of a great number of guns. He had been invited over, first by the lord-treasurer Harley, when he thought to ingratiate himself with the Whigs, and lastly by lord Bolingbroke, who wanted a colleague to support him in power, and great promises were made to the duke. His grace, indeed, seemed to be so elated with the prospect of returning greatness, that he for once lost sight of that prudence which had hitherto been the invariable guide of his conduct: he affected to make a kind of public entry; about two hundred of the inhabitants of Southwark, with their member at their head, resolved to meet and attend him through the Borough; he was likewise escorted as he passed through the city by a like number on horse-back. He was deservedly censured by all moderate people for his conduct, which was a flagrant insult upon the queen's memory, who was but just dead, and to whose partial friendship, when living, he had owed perhaps as much as to his own merit (consummate as that was represented), the surprising pitch of grandeur and power to which he arrived. But to proceed.

The king having entrusted the administration of his German dominions to his brother, prince Ernest, and a council, and made all the necessary preparations for his journey, set out from Herenhausen† on the last day of August, with the prince royal his son. On the fifth of September he arrived at the Hague, where he was complimented on his accession, by a solemn deputation from the States, and by all the foreign ministers. On the sixteenth he embarked for England, under convoy of a squadron of British and Dutch men of war, commanded by the earl of Berkley, vice-admiral of the red‡, and arrived the next day in the Hope. On the eighteenth he landed, with the prince, at Greenwich, where they were attended by the lords of the regency, the great officers of state, and a vast number of nobility and gentry. Many were honoured with particular marks of respect, but the duke of Ormond, and others concerned in the late measures, were coldly received; and the next day his grace was removed from his office of captain-general, which was restored to the duke of Marlborough. On the twentieth, his majesty, attended by two hundred coaches and six, made his public entry through the city to St. James's, in the most grand and magnificent manner, amidst innumerable crowds of people, and the loudest acclamations of joy. In fine, as I have already observed, no king ever came to a throne with a greater prospect of an happy and tranquil reign; however, the event shewed, that George knew little of the real dispositions of his new subjects, which his ministers concealed from him, or were themselves imposed upon.

The reader may remember what has been said in several parts of this history in relation to the Whigs and Tories: it is well known, the mutual animosity and hatred of these two parties, which were carried to a degree of phrenzy, brought Charles I. to the scaffold, and operated a surprising revolution in affairs towards the latter part of the late queen's reign. The same causes continuing still to operate, made her successor totter on his throne before he was well seated in it. Till very lately the whole weight of authority had been in the hands of the Tories, while the Whigs remained without credit or influence, and had the additional mortification to see their chief patrons and supporters in disgrace or exile. The high-church men indulged themselves in an insolent triumph over their fallen enemies; while the low-church party, bereft of all means of revenge, were obliged to keep a respectful silence, which proceeded rather from conscious inability than motives of virtue or patriotism. The new government was less attentive to the religious causes of the hatred that subsisted between the two parties, than to the influence which either of those parties might have on the affairs of state. The king had taken a strong prepossession against the Tories, whom he had been misled to look upon as Jacobites, and thought the Whigs his only true friends; upon which he threw aside all reserve, and declared openly in their favour. An instantaneous and total change was effected in all offices of honour and advantage. I shall mention only some of the chief: lord Cowper (afterwards earl Cowper) was again made lord-chancellor; the earl of Wharton, lord privy-seal; the earl of Nottingham (who had opposed the measures of the late ministry), president of the council; the earl of Sunderland, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the duke of Devonshire, lord-steward of the household; James Stanhope, esq. (the general), and the duke of Montrose, secretaries of state, the former in the room of William Bromley, esq. and the latter in the room of the earl of Mar; the duke of Somerset, master of the horse; the duke of Argyll, general and commander in chief of the forces in Scotland; William Pulteney, esq. secretary of war; Robert Walpole, esq. pay-master-general of the army; and Allan Broderick, esq. lord-chancellor of Ireland, in the room of sir Constantine Phipps, who had rendered himself very obnoxious to the Whig party. On the twenty-ninth of September, his majesty dissolved the privy-council, and appointed a new one. Soon after, there were new commissions for the treasury, and admiralty: Charles, lord Halifax, was made first commissioner of the treasury; sir Richard Onslow, chancellor of the Exchequer; Edward, earl of Orford, first commissioner of the admiralty; and John Aislabie, esq. treasurer of the navy: the duke of Shrewsbury kept his post of lord-chamberlain. In a word, the whole nation was delivered into the hands of the Whigs, and the Tories were in their turn reduced to the same state of humiliation in which they had so lately exultingly beheld their adversaries.

His majesty having assembled his privy-council two days after his arrival in town, was pleased to make a declaration to the following effect: "That it was his firm purpose to do all that was in his power for the supporting and maintaining the churches of England and Scotland, as they were severally by law established, which, he was of opinion, might be effectually done, without the least impairing the toleration allowed by law to protestant dissenters, so agreeable to Christian charity, and so necessary to the trade and riches of this kingdom."

The prince-royal George Augustus (afterwards our most gracious sovereign George II.) was now declared prince of Wales; and addresses, congratulating his majesty's accession, were presented by the two universities, and by all the counties, cities, boroughs, and corporations of the kingdom. On the 11th of October arrived the princess of Wales (afterwards queen Caroline) with her two eldest daughters, the princesses Anne (afterwards princess of Orange) and Amelia; the princess Caroline came over some time after.

On the twentieth of October his majesty was crowned at Westminster with the usual solemnity, at which the earl of Oxford and lord Bolingbroke assisted. Previous to this ceremony his majesty was pleased to create some new peers, and others were promoted to higher titles, as may be seen in the note *.

As the demolition of Dunkirk was represented not to go on so fast nor so effectually as had been stipulated by the treaty of Utrecht, Mr. Prior, our resident at the French court, was ordered to present a memorial to hasten this work; as also to prevent the canal of Mardyke from being finished. Lewis having returned an equivocal answer, Mr. Prior was recalled, and the earl of Stair appointed ambassador to the court of Versailles, where he prosecuted this affair with great vigour. At the same time as the barrier-treaty, which was now on the carpet between the emperor and the States-general, was of great consequence to the trade of this nation, general Cadogan, an intimate friend of the duke of Marlborough, was sent to Antwerp to assist at the conferences.

All this time, the manifest partiality shewn by the court to the Whig party, greatly inflamed the minds of those who were already but too much discontented at the late changes; and the Jacobites, impatient at a revolution that took from them all hopes of having the family of the Stuarts again to rule over them, joined the malcontents. The royal party were in many places interrupted in their rejoicings on account of the coronation, by disorderly and tumultuous rabbles, who, setting up the cry of "Down with the Whigs, Sacheverel for ever!" proceeded to numberless disorders. At Bristol in particular the mob was quite outrageous; and it was not long before London itself was infected with riots and tumults. Seditious pamphlets were written and dispersed without number or decency: breaking windows and pulling down meeting-houses was now again practised; and the Whig faction thought themselves hardly secure, even under the shadow of royal protection.

The pretender being informed of these disturbances, thought this a favourable juncture for him to stir. Accordingly, he transmitted, by the French mail, copies of a printed manifesto to the dukes of Shrewsbury, Marlborough, Argyll, and other noblemen of the first distinction. It was signed at the top, James R. and dated at Plombieres, the 29th of August, 1714, N. S. being a kind of manifesto or declaration of the pretender, asserting his claim to the crown of Great Britain. He says, "That the Revolution ruined the English monarchy, laid the foundation of a republican government, and devolved the sovereign power upon the people." He observes, "That when he found the treaty of peace was upon the point of being concluded, without any regard to him, he then published, in April, 1712, his protestation against it." He then gives his reason of his sitting still for some time past, in these remarkable words: "Yet, contrary to our expectations, upon the death of the princess our sister (of whose good intentions towards us we could not for some time past well doubt; and this was the reason we then sat still, expecting the good effects thereof, which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death) we found that our people, instead of taking this favourable opportunity of retrieving the honour and true interest of their country, by doing us and themselves justice, had immediately proclaimed for their king a foreign prince, to our prejudice, contrary to the fundamental and incontestible laws of hereditary right, which their pretended acts of settlement can never abrogate."

The copies of this manifesto being delivered to the secretaries of state, his majesty thought fit to forbid the marquis de Lamberti, minister from the duke of Lorraine, to appear at court, alleging that this affair could not have been transacted without the knowledge and countenance of his master, who gave an asylum at his court to the Chevalier de St. George. In vain did the duke of Lorraine deny his having been privy to this matter, and make the utmost concessions. His minister was given to understand, that the friendship of the king of England was to be purchased only by driving that wretched wanderer from his dominions; and as the duke would not comply with this condition, his minister withdrew from the kingdom.

Religion was now (as it ever had been since the first rise of the Whigs and Tories) brought in as a pretext to cover the political views of both factions. The high-churchmen complained, that impiety and heresy daily gained ground, from the infamous negligence of the Whig prelates. The lower house of convocation had, after the queen's death, declared, that a book lately published by Dr. Samuel Clarke, under the title of "The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity," contained assertions contrary to the orthodox faith. The matter was represented to the bishops. The doctor wrote an apology for his work, which was satisfactory to their lordships; but the lower house resolved, that it was no recantation of his heretical assertions. Thus stood the affair at the queen's death; and the dispute about the Trinity increasing, on the eleventh of December were published by authority, "Directions to the archbishops and bishops for preserving unity in the church, the purity of the Catholic faith concerning the Holy Trinity, and for maintaining the quiet and peace of the state." By these every preacher was forbid to deliver any other doctrine concerning the Trinity than what is maintained in the holy scriptures, is agreeable to the three creeds, and is consonant with the thirty-nine articles of religion; to indulge in bitter and virulent invectives against any persons whatever; and to intermeddle in the least with affairs of state or government. The like prohibition was extended to those who should write, harangue, or dispute on the same subjects.

The present parliament consisting chiefly of Tory members, it was judged altogether improper to indulge it in a longer continuance at this critical juncture: it was resolved to have one that would prove more favourable to the views of the court. Accordingly, on the fifth of January, 1715, a proclamation was published for dissolving the parliament, and on the fifteenth another was issued for calling a new one. This proclamation seems to have been dictated without the least regard to true policy, or the present dispositions of the people. The king therein expatiated upon his undoubted right to the crown; he complained of the evil designs of men disaffected to his succession; he declared his resolution to maintain the toleration in its utmost force; he represented the affairs of the kingdom as in a case of utter destruction, as well in respect to the trade and interruption of its navigation, as to the great debts of the nation, which, he said, had been very much increased since the conclusion of the last war. "We do not therefore doubt, added he, that if the ensuing elections should be made by our subjects, with that safety and freedom to which by law they are entitled, and which I am firmly resolved to maintain to them, they will send up to parliament the fittest persons to redress the present disorders, and to provide for the peace and happiness of our kingdom, and ease of our people for the future; and that in their choice of members, they will have a particular regard to such as had shewed a firm attachment to the protestant succession when it was in danger." What could be a greater satire upon the conduct of the preceding ministry? and were not those infinitely culpable, who, now they had the power to put into the mouth of a sovereign, an utter stranger to the people over whom he was invited to rule, sentiments which favoured more of the vindictive leader of an incensed party, than of the father and sovereign of a divided nation, whose party-distinction this proclamation seemed rather calculated to encourage, than to appease or conciliate.

And in fact what was the freedom of elections so warmly recommended by this proclamation, but a mere empty expression, since, before the writs were issued for the new parliament, the court was well assured that such members only would be returned as might be agreeable to them. The persons were in fact appointed before the returns were made. It is well known that the principal aim of all ministers is to secure a majority in parliament to second their views and projects; and although at first sight it may appear no easy matter to get such a number of different persons, most of them wholly unacquainted, or unconnected with a court, and who owe their right of representation, in all outward appearance, to the unbiassed suffrages of their fellow-citizens, the freest of all elections, to concur in promoting the interests of one or two particular men: yet such is the weight of ministerial influence on such occasions, that they can generally secure the greatest part of the multitude who have the nomination of these representatives: they make choice of some clever, active, insinuating person; one who has some weight and property in the county where he resides. This man is, as it were, the soul of the several meetings who assemble on these occasions; and where he votes, the bulk of the other electors are generally sure to follow. One or two such persons in a county once gained, the minister is pretty sure of carrying his point. The common people seldom consult reason in their choice of a representative. Imagination does the chief part of the work; and whoever can succeed in raising their hatred, or exciting their love, by some artful representation, may determine them to whatever party he pleases. During the greatest part of the reign of queen Anne, the Whigs were brought into universal discredit by their enemies, representing the great abuse the duke of Marlborough and his creatures made of their power, by endeavouring to subvert the monarchy and the established church, and draining the nation of its riches to prolong a ruinous war, in order to fill their own coffers, and get every place of power and profit into their own hands. The light in which these things were represented operated all the effect that was desired: the giddy populace, who a moment before were for continuing the war till France was made a province to Great Britain, and Lewis XIV. brought over in chains to London, suddenly changed their note, and joined in one general cry for peace. Marlborough, who had for many years been the idol of the nation, was now discarded and stripped of his employments; and so far was he from being pitied in his fall, that it was made a kind of merit to censure and revile him. As soon as a change of government happened, and that the new court appeared to adopt sentiments altogether the reverse of those which had prevailed in the preceding reign, the minds of the people were wrought upon by arguments of a different stamp. The former ministry were now loaded with the most injurious aspersions: the Tories were represented as traitors to the constitution of their country, who endeavoured to restore popery and tyranny: the peace was vilified as the most shameful and dishonourable to the nation that ever had been made; and the most enthusiastic praises now succeeded the venomous obloquies which had been lavished upon the character and conduct of the great general. Uncommon was the vigour which each party exerted in the elections for the parliament; the Whigs, however, had the moneyed interest on their side, and the countenance of the ministry; so that they had the pleasure to find a great majority of their party returned both for England and Scotland.

The new parliament met on the fourteenth day of March, when Mr. Spencer Compton was chosen speaker of the commons. On the twenty-first the king came to the house of peers, and delivered to the chancellor a written speech, which was read in presence of both houses, and was conceived in the following terms:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ This being the first opportunity that I have had of meeting my people in parliament since it pleased Almighty God of his providence to call me to the throne of my ancestors, I most gladly make use of it to thank my faithful and loving subjects for that zeal and firmness that hath been shewn in defence of the protestant succession, against all the open and secret practices that have been used to defeat it; and I shall never forget the obligations I have to those who have distinguished themselves upon this occasion.

“ It were to be wished that the unparalleled successes of a war, which was so wisely and cheerfully supported by this nation, in order to procure a good peace, had been attended with a suitable conclusion: but it is with concern I must tell you, that some conditions, even of this peace, essential to the security and trade of Great Britain, are not duly executed; and the performance of the whole may be looked upon as precarious, until we have formed defensive alliances to guaranty the present treaties.

“ The pretender, who still resides at Lorraine, threatens to disturb us, and boasts of the assistance which he still expects here to repair his former disappointments.

“ A great part of our trade is rendered impracticable. This, if not retrieved, must destroy our manufactures, and ruin our navigation.

“ The public debts are very great, and surprisingly encreased since the fatal cessation of arms. My first care was to prevent a further increase of those debts, by paying off forthwith a great number of ships which had been kept in pay, when there was no occasion for continuing such an expence.

“ Gentlemen of the house of commons,

“ I rely upon you for such supplies as the present circumstances of our affairs require, for this year's service, and for the support of the public faith. The estimates shall be laid before you, that you may consider of them; and what you shall judge necessary for your safety, I shall think sufficient for mine.

“ I doubt not but you will concur with me in opinion, that nothing can contribute more to the support and credit of the nation, than a strict observance of all parliamentary engagements.

“ The branches of the revenue formerly granted for the support of the civil government, are so far incumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds which remain, and have been granted to me, will fall much short of what was at first designed for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown: and since it is my happiness (as I am confident you think it yours) to see a prince of Wales, who may in due time succeed me on the throne; and to see him blessed with many children, the best and most valuable pledges of our care and concern for your posterity; this must occasion an expence to which the nation has not for many years been accustomed, but such as surely no man will grudge; and therefore I do not doubt but you will think of it with that affection which I have reason to hope for from you.

“ The eyes of all Europe are upon you, waiting the issue of this first session. Let no unhappy divisions of parties here at home divert you from pursuing the common interest of your country. Let no wicked insinuations disquiet the minds of my subjects. The established constitution in church and state shall be the rule of my government; the happiness, ease, and prosperity of my people, shall be the chief care of my life: those who assist me in carrying on these measures I shall always esteem my best friends; and I doubt not but that I shall be able, with your assistance, to disappoint the designs of those who would deprive me of that blessing which I most value, the affection of my people.”

There were several expressions in this speech which gave great umbrage to all thinking people, and shew the ministry either to have had very little policy, or else to have been sure of carrying all their points, when they could put into the mouth of their royal master a speech that seemed calculated rather to increase the unhappy divisions that already distracted the kingdom, than to conciliate the minds of the people to a new government: but such must ever be the misfortune of those princes, who, from want of understanding the language, manners, and disposition of those they are called to rule over, are obliged to act as others shall point out to them, who on such occasions never fail to consult the gratification of their own interests and passions before the real good of their country. Thus it was now; his majesty was made to express himself, in such a manner as portended measures that it was the interest of the crown to avoid, and suited the temper of the majority of the house, which breathed nothing but destruction to their political adversaries.

The addresses of the two houses were perfectly agreeable to the king's speech. The lords expressed their hopes that his majesty, assisted by the parliament, would be able to recover the reputation of the kingdom in foreign parts, the loss of which they would endeavour to convince the world by their actions was by no means to be imputed to the nation in general.

The commons, on their part, declared their astonishment at finding that any condition of the late peace should not yet be duly executed, and that care had not been taken to form such alliances as might have rendered the peace not precarious; that they could not observe, without resentment, that the duke of Lorraine, notwithstanding the representations of this court, still continued to furnish an asylum to the pretender to the crown of these realms, who had the presumption, by declarations from thence, to stir up his majesty's subjects to rebellion; but that what raised their indignation to the highest degree was, that it appeared from these manifestos, that his hopes were built upon the measures which had for some time past been taken in Great Britain: that they would make it their business to enquire into these fatal miscarriages; to trace out the nature of these pernicious measures, and to bring the authors of them to condign punishment.

These addresses, so flattering to the views of the new ministry, were not, however, carried without a warm opposition. In the house of lords the dukes of Buckingham and Shrewsbury, the earl of Anglesey, the archbishop of York, and other peers, as well secular as ecclesiastical, excepted against the last expression in the lords address, alleging, among other things, that it was injurious to the late queen's memory, and clashed with that part of his majesty's speech which recommended to both houses the avoiding the unhappy divisions of parties; and that it was unjust to condemn persons without first hearing them.

In the lower house sir William Wyndham, Mr. Bromley, Mr. Shippen, Mr. Hungerford, sir William Whitelocke, and other members, objected to passages of the same nature in the address which the commons had drawn up. General Ross insisted, “ That the condemning the peace, and censuring the ministers, was a reflection on the deceased queen, whose act the peace was; and that reflecting on the late queen could not be conceived to be very agreeable to his present majesty.” Sir William Wyndham in particular endeavoured to prove, that the peace had been very beneficial to this kingdom, and offered to produce a list, by which it appeared that the customs had increased near one hundred thousand pounds per annum. These gentlemen were answered by Mr. Walpole, Mr. Pulteney, Mr. secretary Stanhope, and sir Gilbert Heathcote, who declared that nothing was farther from their intention than to asperse the memory of the late queen: on the contrary, their wish and design was to vindicate her memory, by exposing and punishing those evil counsellors who had deluded her into pernicious measures; whereas the opposite party endeavoured to blacken and disgrace her memory, by loading it with all that odium which was only due to their destructive counsels: that the address, however, only condemned the peace, without affecting particular persons, who, as they ought in justice, so they might depend upon it, they never should be condemned without a fair trial. They observed, that the late negotiators had industriously circulated a report, that the present ministry would not attempt to call them to an account for their proceedings, but only to censure them in general terms; but that the falsity of this report should soon be demonstrated: that notwithstanding the endeavours which had been used to prevent a discovery of the late mismanagement, by conveying away secret papers from the Secretaries Office; yet the government had sufficient evidence against the late ministry, which would in a little time be laid before the house, when such things, they said, would come to light, as would by no means redound to the honour of the late administration*. After all, the address was carried by a majority of two hundred and forty-four votes against one hundred and thirty-eight.

It seems, that before the meeting of the parliament, all the papers of the earl of Strafford, late ambassador from queen Anne to the States-general, had been seized by an order from the new Secretaries Office. Mr. Prior had also been recalled from France, and had suffered himself to be so intimidated by the threats of the present ministry, that he had promised to reveal all he knew relating to the steps of Oxford's administration.

The Whig party now drove Jehu-like; and nothing but the blood of those who had firmly opposed them seemed capable of satisfying their vindictive disposition; wherefore lord Bolingbroke, who had hitherto appeared in the house of lords, as usual, and had ever spoke in the whole on the address with great freedom and confidence, finding that those in power were determined to push matters to extremity; and hearing that Prior, who had so scandalously betrayed his friends, was landed at Dover, thought it now high time to consult his personal safety, and on the twenty-seventh of March embarked for Calais, and so quitted the kingdom. At his departure, however, he left a letter, which was afterwards printed in his Justification.

In this paper he declared he had received certain and repeated intelligence, that a resolution was taken to pursue him to the scaffold: that, if there had been the least reason to hope for a fair trial, after having been already prejudged by the two houses of parliament, he should not have declined the strictest examination: that he challenged the most inveterate of his enemies to produce any one instance of criminal correspondence, or the least corruption in any part of the administration in which he was concerned: that if his zeal for the honour and dignity of his royal mistress, and the true interest of his country, had any-where transported him to let drop an unguarded expression, he hoped the most favourable construction would be put upon it: that he had served her majesty faithfully, in that especially which she had most at heart, relieving her people from a bloody and expensive war: and that he had always been too much an Englishman to sacrifice the interest of his country to any foreign ally whatsoever.

As for the earl of Oxford, he beheld unmoved the storm that was now gathering round his head. He wore an unembarrassed, and even chearful, countenance; declaring his innocence and freedom from guilt, and exposed the folly and inveteracy of the Whigs, who laboured to fix upon him the imputation of having secretly prepared the way for the restoration of the pretender, since, as he justly observed, no ministry that had the least regard to their own safety, could be supposed to harbour, and seek to promote, a design so repugnant to the inclinations of the people. Indeed the late ministry had the consolation to find many friends in the midst of the persecution raised against them, who boldly espoused their cause; and several respectable counties sent addresses to the king, approving of the peace, and of the measures pursued by the late queen's ministers: the former they declared to be general, solid, honourable, and extremely advantageous to the people of England. Nay, some individuals had courage enough to attack the present administration. Sir William Wyndham asserted in the house of commons, that the proclamation which the ministry had procured for dissolving the parliament, was not only unprecedented and unwarrantable, but even of dangerous consequence to the very being of parliaments. This spirited declaration threw the opposite party into a violent rage. To the Tower! to the Tower! was the general cry: but that was over-ruled; and sir William being ordered to withdraw, he was followed by one hundred and twenty-nine members. Those remained in the house resolved that he should be reprimanded by the speaker. He was then called in, and Mr. Speaker rebuked him in the following terms:

"Sir William Wyndham,

"I am to acquaint you, that the house is come to this resolution, that you be reprimanded in your place by me.

"You have presumed to reflect on his majesty's proclamation, and made an unwarrantable use of the freedom of speech granted by his majesty.

"This house has made their moderation appear, and shewn their lenity, by laying the mildest censure your offence was capable of: I am ordered to reprimand you, and do reprimand you accordingly."

To which sir William replied:

"Sir,

"I return you many thanks for what you have done, by the duty of your office, in so candid and gentlemanlike manner. As I am a member of this house, I very well know I must acquiesce in the determination of this house: but I am not conscious of any indignity to his majesty, or any breach of the privilege of this house; and therefore I have no thanks to give those gentlemen, who, under pretence of lenity, have brought this censure upon me *."

Three days after, the commons entered upon that business they seemed to have most at heart, the bringing the late ministry to disgrace and punishment. On the ninth of April, Mr. secretary Stanhope delivered to the house of commons the several papers (making fourteen large volumes) relating to the negotiations of peace and commerce and cessation of arms; and moved that they might be referred to a select committee of twenty-one persons, who should digest the substance of them under proper heads, and report them, with their observations, to the house. This was agreed to; the members of the committee were chosen by ballot †; and so eager were the Whigs to begin their work, that they met the same evening. Mr. Robert Walpole, who had been chosen chairman, being taken ill, his place was supplied by Mr. Stanhope: the whole number was subdivided into three committees, to each of whom a certain number of books (of the papers) were allotted, who proceeded very vigorously in their enquiries ‡.

‡ On the twenty-second of April, in the morning, was the famous total eclipse of the sun, a thing that had not happened for some centuries, in these parts, when the darkness for a small space, was such, that several stars appeared, and the birds betook themselves to roost, as if it had been a new night. It was

On the thirteenth of May there was a great debate in the house of commons about the civil list, which the court party were for settling on his majesty in the same manner, and to the like amount, as it had been granted to king William. This was strongly opposed by the Tories, who alleged, that the seven hundred thousand pounds granted annually to that prince, was subject to the payment of fifty thousand pounds per annum to the late queen, then princess of Denmark, twenty thousand pounds to the duke of Gloucester, and forty thousand pounds as a dowry to James's queen; lastly, they observed, that after the late queen's accession to the throne, the parliament finding the civil list revenues exceeded what they had been given for, it had taken near two hundred thousand pounds per annum out of them for other uses; notwithstanding which deduction, her majesty had honourably maintained her family, and supported the dignity of the crown. These arguments, however, were of little avail; the Whigs had now every thing in their power, and it was carried without division, that the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds should be granted annually for the civil list, during his majesty's life. There was another warm debate a few days after, upon a motion for an address against pensions, made by the Tory party. Mr. Robert Walpole stood up to oppose this motion, and urged, "that the house ought not to stint the king's beneficence, nor to debar him from the exercise of the most glorious branch of his prerogative, which is to bestow his favours on such as distinguish themselves in his service." He was seconded by Mr. Hampden, who observed, that all the pensions did not amount to twenty-five thousand pounds. In the end, the motion was rejected, though by a small majority only.

On the thirtieth of May, the lords took into consideration the bill for regulating the land-forces; which, after some opposition, was passed, with a few necessary amendments.

About this time the nation was engaged in a dispute of a very serious nature with the court of Sweden. This had begun before the queen's death, and was occasioned by the Swedish privateers taking many of our ships, which, with their cargoes, they confiscated, under pretence that we assisted and supplied the czar and his subjects with ships, ammunition, &c. contrary, as was suggested, to our treaties with the crown of Sweden. Mr. Jackson, her majesty's minister at Stockholm, had presented several memorials on the subject of these captures, without receiving any satisfactory answer; and therefore it was now thought expedient to make use of more effectual means, namely, the sending a strong squadron of men of war into the Baltic. The States-general also, whose vessels had shared the same fate with ours, found themselves obliged, after all pacific methods had been tried in vain, to have recourse to the same measures, in order to protect the commerce of their subjects.

This once resolved, a squadron of twenty sail was appointed for this service, and the command given to sir John Norris, who was then admiral of the blue, and who had sir Thomas Hardy, rear-admiral of the same squadron, to assist him. The fleet sailed from the Nore on the eighteenth of May, and arrived in the Sound on the tenth of June following; where finding the Dutch already arrived, it was determined, in a council of war, that the combined fleet should proceed together, with the English and Dutch merchantmen under their convoy, for their respective ports; which they performed accordingly by the close of the month.

Sir John Norris having sent an express to the court of Stockholm, in order to be satisfied whether the Swedes were determined to continue the seizing and confiscating our ships; or if they would enter into a negotiation, for determining in an amicable manner all disputes between the two nations, and receiving only a vague and uncertain answer, he resolved to proceed according to his instructions. About the middle of August the Danish fleet, consisting of twenty ships of the line, with the Russian squadron, joined the English and Dutch, and sailed up the Baltic. As the czar of Muscovy was at this time at Copenhagen, and designed to command his own ships, several consultations were held to regulate the command of the several squadrons of different nations then in that road, which together were called the Confederate Fleet. It was at last resolved to give the chief command of it to his czarish majesty; but so that sir John Norris should command the vanguard of the united fleet; the czar, the body of the line of battle; the Danish admiral, count Gueldenlew, the rear; and the Dutch commodore, with his squadron and five British men of war, should proceed with the trade of both nations for their respective harbours in the Baltic. According to this resolution, on the sixteenth of August, the czar hoisted his imperial flag, as admiral, on board one of his finest ships, and was thereupon immediately saluted by sir John Norris with a discharge of his cannon, which was followed by the Danish and Dutch; and these compliments being paid, his czarish majesty gave the signal for sailing. Being arrived off Bornholm*, they were informed that the Swedish fleet was returned to Carlscroon: the Swedes had at this time a numerous fleet, and in pretty good condition; but they were too wise was observed, that after the light growing fainter and fainter, as the moon advanced over the sun's disk, the total darkness came on instantaneously, as when a candle is extinguished by night, as soon as the eastern limb (or rim) of the sun was covered; as did the light in the same manner, when the moon left its western limb. This extraordinary phenomenon was much observed by Dr. Halley, Mr. Whiston, and all our eminent astronomers, who had before, with great exactness, calculated the time and manner of it.

The same month died Dr. Gilbert Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, famous for his excellent History of the Reformation, and other writings, and a great advocate for the Revolution, which made him many enemies. The marquis of Wharton died also about this time, as did the earl of Halifax not long after. The marquis of Wharton was a man of a fine genius, an able statesman and politician, and a great leader among the Whigs.

¶ Proceedings of the House of Lords.

* Bornhorn, an Island of Zealand, in Denmark, lying in the East-sea, sixteen miles from the extreme point of Seeland, and six from Ystad, in Schonen. It is about seven miles in length, and four in breadth. The coast is, in most places, inaccessible, on account of its dangerous rocks; and the landing-place defended with cannon. Since the inhabitants revolted from Sweden to Denmark, in 1658, Bornholm is become an hereditary part of the latter.

to hazard it against such an unequal force as that of the confederates. Sir John Norris therefore, after lying in the Sound till the middle of November, left a squadron of ships of war, under the command of commodore Cleveland, in the Baltic, to act in conjunction with the Danes and Dutch, for the farther security of the British trade, if necessary.

It was not the protection of our commerce only, that occasioned this expedition to the Baltic: his majesty, as elector of Hanover, had some disputes with the king of Sweden of quite a different nature; for having purchased from the crown of Denmark the duchies of Bremen and Verden, which had been taken from the crown of Sweden, he found himself obliged, in quality of elector, to concur with Denmark in declaring war against Sweden; and even before this was done, some English ships joined the Danish fleet, in order to distress the Swedes. Of this the Swedish minister complained by a memorial, delivered to lord Townshend, then secretary of state, dated October 3, 1715†. The Tories were very loud in their invectives against the expedition, in which they asserted the honour of the British flag had been prostituted, to serve the interest of another state, and in order to create an intercourse between the king's regal and electoral dominions.

The nation seemed now to labour under a general discontent. Notwithstanding proclamations against riots and orders of the justices for maintaining the peace, repeated tumults were raised in the cities of London and Westminster. A letter from one captain Wright, a discarded officer, containing some traiterous expressions, being intercepted, a reward of fifty pounds was offered by the government to any person that should apprehend the captain; and about the same time Mr. George Jefferies was seized at Dublin, with a packet directed to Dr. Jonathan Swift, dean of St. Patrick's. Several treasonable letters being found in this packet, were transmitted to England. Jefferies was obliged to give bail for his appearance, and Swift thought proper to abscond. The house of lords, to demonstrate their abhorrence of all who should engage in conspiracies against their sovereign, rejected, with indignation, a petition presented to them in behalf of Blackburn, Cassils, Bernarde, Meldrum, and Chambers, who had continued prisoners ever since the year 1696, for having conspired against the life of king William.

By this time the committee of secrecy was ready to deliver their report, and on the ninth of June Mr. Walpole, the chairman, moved, that a warrant might be issued for apprehending several persons, particularly Mr. Prior and Mr. Thomas Harley, who being in the house, were immediately taken into custody: then he read the report, which lasted from about one o'clock till about six in the afternoon; which may be reduced to the following heads:

"I. The clandestine negotiations with Mesnager, the French agent, which produced two sets of preliminary articles; the one private, for Great Britain only; the other general, for all the allies.

"II. The extraordinary measures pursued to form the congress at Utrecht.

"III. The trifling amusements of the French plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, by the connivance of the British ministers.

"IV. The negotiations about the renunciation of the Spanish monarchy.

"V. The fatal suspension of arms.

"VI. The seizure of Ghent, and Bruges, in order to distress the allies, and favour the French.

"VII. The duke of Ormond's acting in concert with the French general.

"VIII. The lord Bolingbroke's journey to France, to negotiate a separate peace.

"IX. Mr. Prior's and the duke of Shrewsbury's negotiations in France.

"X. The precipitate conclusion of the peace at Utrecht.

"XI. The sacrificing the Catalans.

"XII. Promoting the interest of the pretender."

The report having been taken into consideration, Mr. Walpole, on the tenth of June, impeached Henry, lord viscount Bolingbroke, of high-treason and other crimes and misdemeanors; the lord Coningsby afterwards standing up, impeached the earl of Oxford in the following remarkable words: "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand, but I impeach the head; he has impeached the clerk, and I the justice; he has impeached the scholar, and I the master: I impeach Robert, earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, of high-treason and other crimes and misdemeanors." Many members of unquestioned integrity, of both parties, seemed to condemn these precipitate measures; and even sir Joseph Jekyll, a member of the committee of secrecy, said, that he could not think the house had sufficient matter of evidence to impeach the earl of high-treason: but the chairman of the committee declaring, that, besides the proof contained in the report, they had also the enforcement of personal evidence, it was resolved to impeach him without a division. Mr. Prior was at the same time, and at the instance of Mr. Walpole, ordered into strict custody, without the liberty of pen, ink, paper, or the sight of any one friend.

On the twenty-first of June Mr. secretary Stanhope impeached James, duke of Ormond, of high-treason, and of other high crimes and misdemeanors. The duke was defended by Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Lumley, Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ward, Mr. Hungerford, and several others of both parties. Sir Joseph Jekyll, in particular, said, "That if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be shewn to that noble, generous, and courageous peer, who had, in a course of many years, exerted those great accomplishments for the good and honour of his country: that as the statute of Edward III. on which the charge of high-treason against him was founded, had been mitigated by subsequent acts, the house ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act against the duke, but only to impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanors." Nevertheless, after a very long debate, the question being put, was carried for his impeachment. It was thought his grace's name having been made use of as a signal for mobs and riots, was one thing that hastened on his impeachment, "High-church and Ormond forever!" being now as much the cry of the Tory mobs as "High-church and Sacheverel!" The duke's enemies did not fail to represent and aggravate these circumstances: they said, that he could not be ignorant of these tumults and riots, and that as he did not publicly disown those disturbers of the peace, his silence must be considered as an approbation of their conduct, and seemed to summon the people to a general insurrection. In short, the duke of Ormond perceiving that he was already prejudged by his enemies, consulted his own safety by withdrawing himself from the kingdom*.

The Whig party still continued to conduct every thing by a furious spirit of revenge. On the twenty-second of June the earl of Strafford was likewise impeached by Mr. Aislabe, for having advised the fatal suspension of arms and the seizing Ghent and Bruges, and for having treated the most serene house of Hanover with insolence and contempt. The bishop of London (Robinson) was in favour with the party in power, and therefore, though involved in the same guilt (if there was any) with the earl, he was passed over unnoticed: the Whigs, indeed, pretended that the bishop was entirely innocent of the secret negociation between France and England, and that he was not admitted to any of those secrets which constituted the criminal part of the earl's conduct.

The articles of impeachment against the earl of Oxford being prepared by the committee of secrecy, they were read, on the eighth of July, before the house of commons, and were in substance as follow:

"I. That he, Robert earl of Oxford and Mortimer, had entered into a negociation with France without the allies, and had agreed it should be kept secret.

"II. He had advised the queen to permit the coming of Mesnager; treated with him, and assumed, without authority, the royal power.

"III. He had prepared preliminaries, signed by Mesnager, and sent them to Holland, when a private treaty was, by his advice, concluded with France.

"IV. He had not regarded the representation of Buis, the Dutch minister, but declared the queen had made no such treaty, nor would do so, without the consent of the States.

"V. He had ordered the bishop of London to insist upon Spain, though by the preliminaries the duke of Anjou was acknowledged as king, and though he had persuaded the queen not to insist upon the restitution of Spain.

"VI. He had not procured satisfaction for the allies, but acted in concert with France.

"VII. He had advised the queen to accept of the duke of Anjou's renunciation, though Torci had declared it to be null and void by the fundamental laws of France.

"VIII. He had, with others, advised that the duke of Ormond should be ordered to engage in no battle or siege, to the ruin of the affairs of the allies; and afterwards sent an order to the bishop of London, to declare that the queen looked upon herself to be under no obligation whatsoever to the States.

"IX. He had advised that the duke of Ormond, with all the troops in the queen's pay, should separate themselves from the army of the allies; and not to pay the arrears due to those that refused.

"X. He had advised the fatal suspension of arms, and the sending lord Bolingbroke to France, to settle the terms.

"XI. He had treacherously advised the enemy how to gain Tournay.

"XII. He had advised and assisted in giving up Spain and the West Indies to the duke of Anjou.

"XIII. He had treacherously advised the ninth article of the treaty of commerce with France, and the giving the French liberty of fishing, and drying their fish on Newfoundland.

"XIV. He had taken Sicily from the house of Austria, and given it to the duke of Savoy, without any application from the duke.

"XV. He had caused the queen to make several speeches and declarations to the parliament, wherein the terms of peace and commerce were falsely represented.

"XVI. He had, as far as in him lay, destroyed the independency of the house of lords, by causing the queen to create twelve peers at once, to serve his ends."

To these were afterwards added the six following articles:

"XVII. He had not (as prime minister) advised the queen against the destructive expedition to Canada.

"XVIII. He had procured a warrant for thirteen thousand pounds for his own use.

"XIX. He had procured a warrant for five thousand five hundred and sixty pounds to his relation, Thomas Harley.

"XX. He had paid a large sum of money to king James's queen.

"XXI. He had received Patrick Lileth (alias Lawless) an Irish papist, as a foreign minister, and caused several sums of money to be paid to him.

"XXII. He had, with others, caused the Catalans to be exposed to the fury of an enraged revengeful prince, against whom the late queen had engaged them to take arms."

The first ten were, upon the question, severally agreed to; but a warm debate arose upon the XIth, by which he was charged with having counselled and advised the French king in what manner Tournay might be gained from the States-general, although it had been declared that the town of Tournay should remain to the States, towards forming a sufficient barrier: a great debate arose upon the question, Whether this article was high-treason? Sir Robert Raymond, formerly solicitor-general, Mr. Bromley, sir William Wyndham, the auditors Harley and Foley, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Hungerford (who had already spoken in favour of the earl of Oxford) maintained the negative, and were strongly supported by sir Joseph Jekyll. They were opposed by Mr. Walpole, Mr. Stanhope, lord Coningsby, general Cadogan, Mr. Boicawen, and Mr. Aislabe; and the article, being amended, was agreed to by a majority of one hundred and twenty. The rest of the articles being agreed to, the lord Coningsby, (attended by most of the members who voted for the impeachment) went up to the lords, and at the bar of the house impeached the earl of Oxford of high-treason, &c. demanding at the same time, that he might be sequestered from parliament and committed to safe custody. This demand produced a debate, Whether or not the earl should be so committed? in the course of which his lordship delivered himself to the following effect. "The whole charge, he said, might be reduced to the negotiations and conclusion of the peace. That the nation wanted a peace, he said, nobody would deny: that the conditions of this peace were as good as could be expected, considering the backwardness and reluctance which some of the allies shewed to come into the queen's measures: that the peace was approved by two successive parliaments: that he had no share in the affair of Tournay, which was wholly transacted by that unfortunate nobleman who had thought fit to step aside: that, nevertheless, he would venture to say in his behalf, that, if that charge could be proved, it would not amount to treason: that, for his own part, he had always acted by the immediate directions and commands of the late queen, without offending against any known law; and being justified by his own conscience, was unconcerned for the life of an insignificant old man: that if ministers of state, acting by the immediate commands of their sovereign, were to be accountable for their proceedings, it might, one day or other, be the case with all the members of that august assembly: that he doubted not but their lordships, out of regard to themselves, would give him an equitable hearing; and he hoped, that, in the course of the enquiry, it would appear, that he had merited, not only the indulgence, but even the favour of the government. My lords, said he, I am now to take my leave of your lordships, and of this honourable house, perhaps for ever. I shall lay down my life, with pleasure, in a cause favoured by my dear royal mistress. When I consider, that I am to be judged by the justice, honour, and virtue of my peers, I shall acquiesce, and retire with great content: and, my lords, God's will be done."

Before the question for committing him was put, the duke of Shrewsbury having acquainted the house that the earl was very much indisposed with the gravel, he was suffered to remain at his own house, in custody of the black rod. In his way thither he was attended by a great concourse of people, crying, "High-church, Ormond and Oxford for ever!" Next day he was brought to the bar, where he received a copy of the articles, and was allowed a month to prepare his answer: but, as if his enemies were apprehensive of shewing him too much indulgence, it was resolved to send him to the Tower on the sixteenth day of July, notwithstanding Dr. Mead declared that his life would be in imminent danger by being carried thither. The earl was attended to the Tower by a prodigious concourse of people, who all pitied the condition of this great (though now fallen) statesman, and openly exclaimed against his persecutors. In short, the nation in general was so exasperated against the Whigs for their rancorous and bloody proceedings, that tumults were raised in Staffordshire, and other parts of the kingdom, against the friends and adherents of the new ministry. A general spirit of discontent, so openly manifested, could not fail to fill them with alarms for their own safety; and it was thought expedient that the house of commons should address the king to put the laws against rioters vigorously in force. A new law, called the Proclamation, or Riot-Act, was prepared, and soon after received the royal assent, decreeing, that if any persons, to the number of twelve, unlawfully assembled, should continue together one hour, after having been required in his majesty's name to disperse, by a justice of the peace, or other officer, and heard the proclamation against riots read in public, they should be deemed guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy.

On the twentieth day of July the king went to the house of peers to give the royal assent to this and some other bills*, when he made a short speech to both houses; in which he told them, that a rebellion was actually begun at home, and that the nation was threatened with an invasion from abroad: he therefore expected that the commons would not leave the kingdom in a defenceless condition, but enable him to take such measures as should be necessary for the public safety. Warm and affectionate addresses were immediately presented by the parliament, and both houses desired his majesty to put the kingdom in a posture of defence, by increasing the number of forces both by sea and land. At the same time they suspended the Habeas Corpus act, by which his majesty might detain the persons of those whom he should suspect of conspiring against his person and government. A reward of one hundred thousand pounds was offered to such as should seize the pretender, dead or alive. Sir George Byng was sent to take the command of a fleet in the Downs, and sir John Jennings was sent to Scotland, where he hoisted his flag on board the Oxford, as commander in chief of the squadron then upon the coasts; general Erle was hastened to his government of Portsmouth; the guards were encamped in Hyde-Park: in a word, no precaution was neglected to secure the peace of the kingdom at home.

In the midst of these transactions the commons added six articles to these they had already exhibited against the earl of Oxford; and two days after, Mr. Walpole delivered the articles of impeachment against lord Bolinbroke, at the bar of the house of lords. The next day (August 5) a warm debate arose upon reading the articles against the duke of Ormond, in which several remarkable speeches were made: the several articles, however, were agreed to by a great majority. The first article charged the duke with corresponding with marshal Villars, the French general, while he commanded the British army in Flanders. The second, that he wickedly promised and engaged that he would not attack the French army, nor engage in any siege against France. The third, that he did falsely, maliciously, wickedly, and traitorously, adhere to the French king; and, in pursuance of a wicked promise he had secretly made with the marshal Villars, he endeavoured to persuade the general of the confederate army to raise the siege of Quesnoy; and when he could not prevail, marched off with the queen's troops, and gave the enemy's general advice of it. The other articles are, in effect, his conduct in Flanders, reduced into a charge; and both he and the lord Bolingbroke being fled from justice, bills were brought in to summon them to surrender themselves by the tenth of September, and in default thereof to attain them of high-treason, which passed both houses, and received the royal assent.

* Other acts passed at this time were, 1. For continuing the imprisonment of the conspirators against king William. 2. For the quakers affirmation, instead of their oath. 3. An act for the regulating the forces. 4. The malt-tax. Lastly, An act to explain an act of 12 Will. III. for the further limitation of the crown, &c.

On the thirty-first of August the articles against the earl of Strafford were agreed to by the commons, and carried by Mr. Aislaby to the lords, when the earl made a long speech in his own defence. He complained that his papers had been seized in an unprecedented manner. He said, that if in his letters or discourse he had dropped any unguarded expressions against some foreign ministers, while he had the honour to represent the crown of Great Britain, he hoped they would not be accounted criminal by a British house of peers. He desired he might be allowed a competent time to answer the articles brought against him, and to have duplicates of all the papers which had either been laid before the committee of secrecy, or remained in the hands of the government, to be used occasionally in his justification. This request was warmly opposed by several of the Whiggish noblemen, until the earl of Ilay observed, that in all civilized nations, all courts of judicature, except the Inquisition, allowed the persons arraigned all that was necessary for their justification; and that the house of peers of Great Britain ought not in this case to do any thing contrary to that honour and equity for which they were so justly renowned throughout all Europe. The house, influenced by these observations, resolved that the earl should be indulged with copies of such papers he might think necessary for his defence*.

The duke of Ormond and the lord viscount Bolingbroke having neglected to surrender themselves within the time limited by the proclamation, the house of lords ordered the earl-marshal to raze out of the list of peers their names and armorial bearings. Inventories were taken of their personal estates; and the duke's achievement, as knight of the Garter, was taken from St. George's Chapel at Windsor.

By this time a rebellion was actually begun in Scotland, under the earl of Mar, who hoped to be supported by a strong party in England. This nobleman, at the death of queen Anne, was secretary of state for Scotland, and was one of the first to congratulate the present sovereign on his accession; but not meeting with the countenance or encouragement which he expected, occasioned by his having joined in the measures of the late ministers, he, about the beginning of August, withdrew from London into the Highlands, where, prompted by resentment and ambition, he resolved to make an effort in favour of the pretender. The Scots were undoubtedly at this time universally disgusted, by the introduction of the malt-tax, and some other grievances they had suffered in consequence of the Union: and the Jacobites, who fondly and foolishly imagined, that all who were dissatisfied from these causes entertained the same sentiments with themselves, transmitted a memorial to the pretender, in which they assured him that the nation was wholly disaffected to the new government, and that his appearance in Britain would produce an immediate revolution.

The pretender, on receiving this invitation, resolved to take advantage of this favourable disposition. He had recourse to the French king, who still entertained a desire of raising him to the throne of Great Britain, and would, in all probability, have supported him powerfully; but he was taken off by death on the first day of September. This event occasioned a total change in the face of affairs: the regency of that kingdom had devolved to the duke of Orleans, who had neither the power nor the inclination to sacrifice the treasures of the state he governed, to support the interests of a wretched exile, who had very little prospect of attaining that crown he laid a claim to. Besides, the duke-regent could not, without manifest danger, begin his regency by breaking irretrievably with England, whose friendship it was at this time his interest to preserve. However, to secure appearances, he furnished him with a sum of money, and a small quantity of arms, but never intended to support him in earnest.

Mean while the Jacobites had proceeded too far to think of retreating with any safety, and therefore determined to put their all upon the issue of the field; and the earl of Mar having consulted with the marquisses of Huntley and Tullibardine, the earls of Southesk and Mareschal, the generals Hamilton and Gordon, and the other chiefs of the disaffected clans; and having drawn together about three hundred of his own vassals, set up the standard of the pretender at Brae-Mar on the fifth day of September, and then caused him to be proclaimed, first at Castletown, then at Perth, Aberdeen, Dundee, and several other places. On the first news of these proceedings, the government ordered the earls of Hume, Winton, and Kinnoul, the lord Deskford, Lockart of Carnwath, Hume of Whitefield, and other suspected persons, to be seized and committed close prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh. The squadron under sir John Jennings also kept a good look-out upon the coasts; but, notwithstanding their utmost vigilance, two vessels arrived from France, with arms, ammunition, and a good number of officers, who assured the earl of Mar the pretender would soon be with him in person. They at the same time acquainted him, that the duke of Ormond and the lord Bolingbroke, who had retired to France, hearing they were condemned and attainted by the parliament, had engaged in the service of the pretender. This news gave great satisfaction to the rebel party for some time; but the death of Lewis XIV. struck a general damp upon their spirits, and proved a terrible blow to their cause. The earl of Mar wrote repeated letters to the pretender to come over with the utmost expedition. In the mean time he assumed the title of lieutenant-general of the pretender's forces, published a declaration, exhorting the people to take up arms; and as there were still hopes that the duke of Ormond would make a descent upon Great Britain, and depended upon a rising in England, they were resolved to push their design†.

† Patten's Hist. of the Rebellion, 1715.

In the mean time the chevalier, finding that the duke of Orleans only amused him with empty promises, and that he could no longer expect the powerful succours that Lewis XIV. the unwearied friend of his family, had on every favourable occasion furnished them, applied to the Irish and Scottish regiments in the service of France, on whose fidelity he knew he could depend; and those, as well officers as private men, promised to shed the last drop of blood in their veins to procure his restoration: they would indeed have proved of infinite service to the chevalier's cause, had they accompanied him to Scotland: but the vigilance of our minister at the court of France deprived him of their assistance also. This minister was the earl of Stair, who then resided as ambassador at Paris. He was a nobleman of unquestioned honour and integrity; generous, humane, discerning, and resolute: he had signalized himself by his military talents during the late war in the Netherlands, and he now acted in another sphere with uncommon vigour, vigilancy, and address. He detected the chevalier's scheme while it was yet in embryo, and gave such early notice of it as enabled our court to take effectual measures for defeating the design. He had by dint of money won over an English priest, named Strickland, who was one of the pretender's chaplains, and a confidant of his. This man acquainted him with every step that the pretender took, and every project he formed. By means of this spy lord Stair obtained a list of the French officers who had engaged to accompany the Chevalier into Scotland, with an exact account of the quantity of arms, ammunition, and provisions that were to be embarked, and the number and names of the vessels that were to carry them over; and made such repeated and spirited remonstrances to the duke-regent on this subject, that the latter found himself under a necessity of giving our ambassador proper satisfaction. Accordingly he dispatched orders to all the sea-ports, prohibiting the officers and men of the regiments above mentioned, to quit the kingdom on pain of being treated as deserters. Thus the chevalier found himself in an instant deprived of the assistance he had placed such dependance on; and was soon after glad to pass over incog. to shew himself to his partisans; not so much from any hope of being able to revive their courage by his presence, as to acquaint them that they must no longer lay any stress upon the promises of assistance they had received from the court of France*.

Some of the adherents of the chevalier having made an attempt to surprize the castle of Edinburgh, which had been defeated by the vigilance and valour of colonel Stuart, lieutenant-governor of that fortress, general Wightman, who was then in Scotland, had orders to form a camp near Stirling, and distress the rebels as much as he could, till the arrival of the duke of Argyll, who, on the ninth of September, had been appointed commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, and soon after set out for that kingdom, accompanied by the duke of Roxburgh, the marquisses of Annandale and Tweedale, the earls of Sutherland, Selkirk, Loudon, Rothes, Haddington, and Fraser, with several other Scots peers, who determined to shew their loyalty to king George, by raising their respective clans to oppose the rebels.

Mean while, a dangerous conspiracy was discovered and prevented in England. Lieutenant-colonel Paul was imprisoned in the Gatehouse for enlisting men in the service of the pretender; the titular duke of Powis was committed to the Tower; the lords Lansdowne and Dupplin were taken into custody; and a warrant was issued for apprehending the earl of Jersey. The king, by the mouth of Mr. Secretary Stanhope, desired the consent of the lower house to seize and detain the persons of Sir William Wyndham, Sir John Packington, Mr. Edward Harvey, Mr. Thomas Forster, Mr. James Anstis, and Mr. Corbet Kynaston, who were members of the house, and suspected of favouring the invasion. The commons readily assented, and Harvey and Anstis being in town, were immediately seized; Mr. Forster took up arms in the North; Sir John Packington was, after examination before the council, honourably discharged; Mr. Kynaston absconded; Sir William Wyndham was seized at his own house in Somersetshire, by colonel Huske and a messenger: he found means, however, to escape from him; but being closely pursued, he thought proper to surrender himself, and was committed to the Tower. His father-in-law, the duke of Somerset, offered to become surety for his appearance; but the ministry rejected his bail, and even carried their resentment so far as to remove the duke from his office of master of the horse.

While these things were transacting, the king came, on the twenty-first of September, to the house of lords, and passed the bills that were ready. Then the chancellor read his majesty's speech, expressing his acknowledgement and satisfaction for the uncommon marks of their affection which he had received at this juncture; and the parliament was adjourned to the sixth day of October†.

The friends of the house of Stuart were very numerous in the western counties, where they made several tentatives towards an insurrection, and had actually formed a plan for the seizing of Plymouth and Bristol; all which attempts were prevented by the timely precautions of the government. On this occasion, the university of Oxford, who had generally distinguished itself by its anti-revolution principles, felt the rod of power: a regiment of foot was quartered here to over awe the university. The ministry, however, found it more difficult to suppress the insurgents in the North; where the earl of Derwentwater, the lord Widdrington, Mr. Forster, knight of the shire for Northumberland, and others, appeared in arms in October. Though their numbers were but small, yet they proclaimed the pretender, first at Warkworth, then at Morpeth, Hexham, and other places. They were all horse; not being able to entertain any foot for want of arms. They were at first strengthened by the junction of some lords from the west of Scotland, who, by the instructions of Mar, had raised some forces to assist the rebellion, as the viscount Kenmure, who set up the pretender's standard at Loughmaben, the earls of Nithsdale, Carnwath, and Winton, who joined the English rebels with their small forces at Rothbury. Soon after, they marched to Kelso, on the borders, and joined a body of Highlanders, whom the earl of Mar, after he had taken possession of the fruitful county of Fife, had found means to send over the Firth, under the laird of Mackintosh, and the lord Nairn.

General Carpenter having been sent by the government in pursuit of the rebels, with Hotham's regiment of foot, Cobham's, Molesworth's, and Churchill's dragoons, arrived at Newcastle on the eighteenth of October, from whence he soon set out to attack the rebels at Kelso. At his approach they shifted their quarters, and marched to Jedburgh. Here they were much divided in their councils: brigadier Mackintosh was for engaging the king's forces under general Carpenter, which were inferior in number; but Mr. Forster, who had now assumed the title of general of the English rebels, was against it. The earl was for marching back, and joining the earl of Mar, but the English were for marching into England, which was at last agreed to: but here a mutiny began among the Highlanders, who refused to stir out of their own country; nor could all the menaces or entreaties of the leading men among them prevail to alter their resolution; five hundred of them actually separated and returned home.

From Jedburgh they marched to Hawick, from thence to Langholme, and thence to Longtown in Cumberland, still endeavouring to avoid general Carpenter, who continued in pursuit of them. From Longtown they marched to Brampton, where Forster produced his commission of general, which had been sent to him by the earl of Mar; and, after having proclaimed the pretender, he proceeded to Penrith, where the sheriff, assisted by the lord Lansdown, and the bishop of Carlisle, had drawn together the whole posse comitatus of Cumberland, amounting to nearly twelve thousand men, who at first made a shew of opposing the rebels; but, upon their nearer approach, shamefully threw down their arms and fled. From Penrith, Forster proceeded to Appleby, being joined by very few in all these marches; then to Kendal, and so to Kirkby-Lonsdale, and here some Lancashire papists, with their servants and tenants, joining them, they marched forward, and arrived at Preston on the seventh of November. Here he having seized on six or seven pieces of cannon, proceeded to Preston, and would have gone farther; but general Wills, who had marched against the rebels with six regiments of horse and dragoons, had advanced to the bridge of Ribbel, before Forster was informed of his approach; who, on hearing thereof, immediately shut himself up in the town, barricading the streets, and making a proper disposition of his men to receive the attack of the king's troops. General Wills came before the town on the twelfth of November, and ordered brigadier Honeywood to attack that end of it which leads to Lancaster. The king's troops, however, met with so warm a reception, that they were obliged to desist from the attack, after having lost a considerable number of men. Next morning, general Carpenter, who had followed the rebels close at the heels during their marches, arrived, and joining his troops to those already before the place, it was now invested on all sides.

Forster, finding that all further resistance would be as fatal as fruitless, sent colonel Oxburgh with a trumpet to general Wills to desire a capitulation. The general replied, he would not treat with rebels: they had killed several of the king's subjects, and they must expect to pay for their lives with the forfeit of their own. The colonel said, that as the general was a man of honour, and an officer, he hoped he would shew mercy to people who were willing to submit. Wills answered, that all he could do for them was, that in case of their surrendering at discretion, he would prevent his men from putting them to the sword, until he should receive farther orders. He granted them till the next morning to consider what they would do, upon their delivering the earl of Derwentwater and Mackintosh as hostages.

Forster and his men accepted the terms proposed: but the Highlanders declared they would perish sword in hand, rather than submit in that manner; upon which general Wills would have sent their chieftain Mackintosh back, and have instantly attacked the town: in which case every man of them would have been cut in pieces. On a little reflection they did not chuse to run that risk, but with the rest of the rebels submitted themselves prisoners at discretion, to the number of four hundred and thirty-six English, and above one thousand Scots, many having found means to escape, and several had been killed in the attack. They were now disarmed, and put under a strong guard. All the noblemen and leaders were secured. Major Nairn, captain Lockhart, captain Shaftoe, and ensign Erskine, were tried by a court-martial as deserters, and executed. Lord Charles Murray, son of the duke of Athol, was likewise condemned for the same crime, but his sentence was respited. The common men were imprisoned at Chester and Liverpool; the noblemen and officers of most consideration were sent to London, and committed to the Tower and other prisons*.

Let us now see what became of the rebels in Scotland. It is remarkable, that on the very day that those under Forster were subdued at Preston, Sunday, November 13, the duke of Argyll, with about four thousand men, engaged the rebel army under the earl of Mar, consisting of about eight or nine thousand, at Sheriffmuir, near Dumblain, about four miles from Stirling. The battle was obstinate and bloody; various accounts were given of it, and both sides claimed the victory. What is certain from all the accounts is this, that the duke of Argyll, with the right of his army, soon put the left of the enemy to rout; but whilst he was pursuing them a considerable way with great slaughter, the right of the rebels charged the left wing of the royal army with such impetuosity, that in a few minutes both horse and foot were totally defeated, with great slaughter; and general Witham, who commanded them, fled at full gallop to Stirling, where he declared that the royal army was actually routed. Upon the whole, however, it appears by the consequences, that the royalists had the victory; for the earl of Mar, immediately after the battle, retreated to Perth, and the design he had formed of crossing the Forth to join his southern friends was entirely frustrated, and never afterwards attempted. The earl of Ilay, brother to the duke of Argyll, was in the action, behaved with remarkable bravery, and was wounded in his arm and side. Among the slain were colonel Hamen and captain Armstrong, his grace's aid de camp. About eight hundred of the rebels were slain, and many made prisoners, among whom were several persons of distinction.

Soon after the rebels sustained a more considerable blow, in the loss of Inverness, from which sir John Mackenzie was driven by Simon Fraser, lord Lovat, who had hitherto adhered to the pretender's interest, but now declared in favour of the government. By this means a free communication was opened with the north of Scotland, where the earl of Sutherland had raised a strong body of his vassals. The marquis of Huntley and the earl of Seaforth were obliged to abandon the rebel army, in order to secure their own territories, and in a little time submitted to the king. A considerable number of the clan of the Frasers, influenced by the example of their chief, lord Lovat, declared against the pretender; the marquis of Tullibardine withdrew from the army, to defend his own country; and the clans, seeing no likelihood of another action, began, as usual, to return to their habitations, it being customary with those people, never to remain long in the field, unless they are kept in constant employ*.

The rest of November and all December both sides remained quiet in their quarters; the duke of Argyll at Stirling, and the earl of Mar at Perth. In the mean time the pretender, notwithstanding the desperate situation of his affairs in Scotland, resolved to visit that kingdom; and posting through France in disguise, he embarked on board a small vessel at Dunkirk, and landed, on the twenty-second of December, at Peterhead, with six gentlemen in his retinue, one of whom was the marquis of Tinmouth, son to the duke of Berwick. He passed through Aberdeen incog. to Feterosse, where he was met and complimented by the earl of Mar, the earl Marischall, general Hamilton, and others of his adherents: from Feterosse he went to Dundee, and from thence to Scone, two miles from Perth, where he made his public entry on the ninth of January. Here he published several proclamations, particularly one for the convention of the states, and another for his coronation, and exercised other acts of royalty, which were all at an end almost as soon as they were assumed: for towards the end of January, the duke of Argyll, assisted by lieutenant-general Cadogan and other general officers, who were sent down to him, and reinforced by a good train of artillery and six thousand Dutch troops, that were claimed of, and sent over by, the States-general by virtue of treaty, marched from Stirling to attack the rebels at Perth, who, having now lost all hopes of any succours from France, upon his approach abandoned the place, and retired with the pretender to Dundee, and from thence to Montrose; where finding they were closely pursued by the king's forces, on the fourteenth of February a council was held, in which it was resolved that the pre-tender should go off in the evening. It happened fortunately for him, that there was just ready in the harbour a small ship that was designed to carry over a gentleman the chevalier was then to have sent to a foreign court; this ship was now pitched upon to transport himself and some few of his particular friends, whom he had to attend him; these were the ears of Mar and Melfort, the lord Drummond, and some other chiefs. There were no less than nine men of war cruising off the coast at that time, but the night proved so dark, that there was no seeing a vessel (especially a small one) at a quarter of a mile's distance; so going on board at nine o'clock in the evening, they put out to sea, and got out of reach of the king's cruisers before it was day-light; and coasting along the German and Dutch shores, they arrived in a few days at Graveline, in France. The rebel army had been all along made to believe, that the chevalier was to go along with them; thus, removing all jealousy, they were very tractable: but as soon as they found their prince had left them to shift for themselves, they became deaf to all order and dispersed; some submitted, and some were taken prisoners†. Such was the issue of a rebellion that proved fatal to many noble families; and that, instead of promoting the interest of the Stuart family, served only to strengthen the protestant succession in the house of Hanover. It must, however, be acknowledged, that this rebellion was, in a great degree, owing to the violent measures which the ministry had put in practice against their adversaries; and which, by the discontent it caused in the nation, first gave encouragement to the Jacobite party to make an effort in favour of the pretender.

During the progress of the rebellion, the parliament of Ireland met at Dublin, and gave proofs of the warmest attachment to the present government. They passed bills for recognizing the king's title; for the security of his person and government; for setting a price upon the head of the pretender; for suppressing tumults and riotous assemblies; and for attainting the duke of Ormond. They granted the supplies without opposition. All such members as had procured addresses to the late queen in favour of Sir Constantine Phipps, then lord-chancellor of Ireland, were obliged to acknowledge their fault, and were censured as guilty of a breach of privilege. They desired the lords justices would issue a proclamation against the popish inhabitants of Limerick and Galway, who, presuming upon their own interpretation of the articles granted by king William, claimed an exemption from the penalties imposed upon papists. They engaged in an association to defend the king and the protestant succession, against the pretender and all his open and secret abettors; and they resolved, that whatever forces his majesty should think fit to raise for that purpose, they would enable him to defray the expence of the same. They voted the earl of Anglesey an enemy to the king and kingdom, because he had advised the queen to break the army, and prorogued the parliament, when a bill was depending to attain the pretender; and they addressed the king to remove him from his council and service: a request which was accordingly granted‡. The lords justices granted orders for apprehending the earls of Antrim and Westmeath, the lords Netterville, Cahir, Dillon, and other persons suspected of disaffection to the government. Then they adjourned the parliament to the eighth day of March.

In the mean time the barrier treaty, after many difficulties and delays, which gave great reason to suspect that the imperial court meant not to conclude it at all, was finally adjusted, and signed at Antwerp by the plenipotentiaries of the emperor, the States-general, and the king of Great Britain, and sent over to our court to be ratified. By this treaty, the bounds of the imperial dominions in the Netherlands, as also of the States-general, were determined, and the emperor became guarantee of the succession of the house of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, as the States-general were before †.

On the ninth of January, 1716, the parliament met in England, when the king made a speech to both houses, in which he told them he had reason to believe the pretender was landed in Scotland; he congratulated them on the success of his arms in suppressing the rebellion; on the conclusion of the barrier-treaty between the emperor and the States-general, under his guaranty; on a convention with Spain, that would deliver the trade of England to that kingdom from the new impositions and hardships to which it was subjected, in consequence of the late treaties: he likewise gave them to understand, that a treaty for renewing all former alliances between Great Britain and the States-general was almost concluded; and assured the commons, that he would freely give up all the estates that should become forfeited to the crown by this rebellion, towards defraying the extraordinary expences incurred on his accession.

Addresses of thanks were severally presented by both houses. The commons, in theirs, declared, that they thought themselves obliged, in justice to their injured country, to prosecute in the most rigorous and impartial manner the authors of those destructive counsels, which had drawn down such miseries upon the nation. Their proceedings tallied exactly with their professions: they began by expelling Mr. Forster the house: they impeached the earls of Derwentwater, Nithsdale, Carnwath, and Winton, the viscount of Kenmure, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn ‥. These noblemen all pleaded guilty, except the earl of Winton, who petitioned for time to prepare for his defence.

On the twenty-fourth of January, the king coming to the parliament, to give the royal assent to the bill for continuing the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, he told the two houses, that the pretender was actually in Scotland, heading the rebellion, and assuming the state and title of king of these realms; and demanded of the commons such supplies as might discourage any foreign power from giving assistance to the rebels.

On the ninth of February, sentence of death was passed on the six lords who had pleaded guilty, by the lord-chancellor Cowper, who was appointed lord high-steward upon the occasion. Derwentwater and Kenmure were beheaded on Tower-hill, on the twenty-fourth of the same month: Nithsdale, who was to have been executed with them, had the good fortune to escape out of the Tower, the night before, disguised in woman's apparel, furnished and conveyed to him by his wife; Winton escaped from the same prison afterwards, as did Forster and Mackintosh out of Newgate. Some were executed in the country; eleven at Preston, six at Wigan, and five at Manchester: several were hanged at Tyburn, particularly colonel Oxburgh, Mr. Paul a clergyman, and Mr. Hall who had been a justice of peace. In short, some who were found guilty were transported, others reprieved, and those who were untried or reprieved took the benefit of the act of grace which was afterwards passed: but the earl of Mar, the marquis of Tullibardine, and some others, who fled from Scotland, were attainted by act of parliament §.

While the peers were under sentence of death, strong applications were made, both to the throne and to the parliament, by their wives, relations, and friends, for the royal mercy to be extended towards them. The king was inflexible; the commons rejected their suit; but the house of lords, at the instance of the earl of Nottingham, who thought mercy might be remembered in the midst of justice, agreed to an address, praying his majesty would reprieve such of the condemned lords as should deserve his clemency. To this petition the king answered, "That on this and all other occasions he would do what he thought most consistent with the dignity of his crown and the safety of his people ¶." The lords were ordered for execution; and the ministry, in revenge for the earl of Nottingham's interfering in this business, procured his lordship to be dismissed from his place of president of the council; and his brother, the earl of Aylesford, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, his son, lord Finch, one of the lords of the treasury, and his kinsman, lord Guernsey, master of the jewel-office, were turned out at the same time.

The rebellion was now indeed suppressed, but the rigour exercised towards the delinquents rendered the ministry hateful to all who had a sense of humanity. They perceived the effect their conduct had produced, they dreaded the meeting of a new parliament, which was now near at hand, and they resolved to establish their administration beyond the power of opposition to hurt, by a step equally bold and unconstitutional, viz. by bringing in a bill for enlarging the term of the continuance of parliaments. This is the famous Septennial Act, whereby this and future parliaments were continued seven years, unless sooner dissolved by the crown, instead of three years, as by the Triennial Act, passed in the reign of king William. There were very great and long debates upon this bill in both houses: the true and zealous lovers of their country, as well Whigs as Tories, both in and out of the house, opposed it with all their force; they spoke, they wrote against it, and, by their arguments and discourses, proved the danger which might result from it, beyond all contradiction. The ministry, however, were sure of a majority; they let their adversaries exhaust their rhetoric, and when the question for the bill came to be finally put, in the lords house, where it had been first introduced, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of sixty-nine voices against thirty-six: nevertheless twenty-four lords protested against it; and in the commons, to whom it was afterwards sent down, by a majority of two hundred and sixty-four against one hundred and twenty-one; and soon after received the royal assent. Such of my readers who may be desirous to see the several arguments used for and against this bill, may have their curiosity satisfied by perusing the Collection of Parliamentary Debates at this period, an abstract only of which would be much too bulky for this work; I shall therefore content myself with observing, that, however necessary the ministry might represent this statute to be at that juncture, when they alleged, by reason of the seditious and rebellious spirit that still appeared in the nation, especially among the common sort, a new election might have thrown the kingdom into a flame; yet it has been thought by many wise, able, and dispassionate persons, that such an act may prove dangerous to the constitution, as it must give ministers a great influence over parliaments.

On the twenty-sixth of April died that great lawyer and statesman, the lord Somers; and some time before, Mr. Robert Walpole had been made first commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer.

The rebellion being now utterly quelled, and tranquility in great measure restored to these kingdoms, his majesty resolved to visit his German dominions, where he foresaw a storm gathering from the quarter of Sweden. Charles XII. was extremely exasperated against the elector of Hanover, about the affair of Bremen and Verden, and resolved to be revenged on him as king of Great Britain. His majesty had received intimations of some sinister designs adopted by that prince against himself, and this had chiefly determined him to make a voyage to the continent: but as there was a clause in the act of settlement, whereby, after it took place, the sovereign was not to go out of the kingdom without the consent of parliament, this clause was repealed in a new bill, that passed through both houses without any difficulty.

On the twenty-sixth of June, his majesty closed the session with a speech upon the usual topics, and intimated his design of visiting his dominions in Germany; and gave them to understand, that he had constituted his beloved son, the prince of Wales, guardian of the kingdom in his absence. About this time his majesty was pleased to make several creations, among which sir Richard Onslow was made a baron, and the earl of Portland was raised to the dignity of a duke; general Cadogan, who had signalized himself in queen Anne's wars, and had been very serviceable in suppressing the rebellion in Scotland, was also made a lord, and afterwards an earl; sir Henry St. John, father to the late lord Bolingbroke, was created baron St. John of Battersea; prince Ernest, the king's brother and bishop of Osnabrug, was created duke of York, and afterwards made a knight of the Garter, together with prince Frederic, son to the prince of Wales, and father to our present most gracious sovereign: the duke of Devonshire was now appointed president of the council in the room of the earl of Nottingham. These promotions were attended with unexpected disgraces: the duke of Argyll and his brother, the earl of Ilay, being deprived of all their employments. The removal of these noblemen was the more surprising, as they had all along been warm advocates for the protestant succession; had the principal hand in extinguishing the rebellion in Scotland, which secured to his majesty the peaceable possession of his throne; and were firmly attached to the present government. Whatever was the cause, certain it is, they were not only dismissed from the service, but, to shew that there were no hopes of their being restored, their places were disposed of; general Carpenter being appointed commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, and governor of the island of Minorca, in the room of the duke of Argyll; and the duke of Montrose lord-register of Scotland, in the room of the earl of Ilay*.

On the seventh of July the king embarked at Gravesend, landed on the ninth in Holland, through which he passed incognito to Hanover, and thence set out for Pyrmont, to drink the waters for his health. He had scarcely left England when the two parties that divided the nation, broke out into fresh animosities and outrages against each other; the loose disorderly multitude being ready to run into any excesses that their respective leaders dictated. The Whigs had formed themselves into societies or clubs, which were used to meet at several houses in the city and suburbs, called Mug-houses, from the vessels they used to drink out of, where Whiggish healths were toasted. The Roebuck in Cheap-side was one of the most famous of those mug-houses; and that in Salisbury-court, Fleet-street, became so by the following circumstance. The company there having on some occasion given extraordinary demonstration of their hatred and animosity to the leading men of the opposite party, by malicious heats and reflections, the mob of that party coming to the knowledge of it, were so enraged, that on the twentieth of July they came and attacked the mug-house, which was kept by one Mr. Read, and would have demolished it, if the company there had not sent for a reinforcement from another mug-house in Tavistock-street. This made the assailants fly for the present, though many of them returned, and kept hovering about the house the two following days. At last, on the twenty-third, one Vaughan, who had been a blue-coat boy at Bridewell hospital, instigated the mob to go to the mug-house and revenge their late affront: they followed him with loud huzzas of "High-church and Ormond! down with the mug-house!" Mr. Read finding they intended to demolish his house, bid them keep off, or he would fire amongst them; but they not regarding him, he discharged his piece, and killed Vaughan on the spot, for which he was afterwards tried and acquitted. The mob still continuing their outrages, breaking the windows, pulling down the sign, gutting the house, breaking and destroying the furniture, &c. the sheriffs of London came and ordered the proclamation against riots to be read; but this not availing, a party of the guards were ordered to march to the place, and as soon as they approached, the mob dispersed; but five of the rioters were taken, who, being tried and convicted, were hanged at the end of Salisbury-court, in September†.

I have already observed, that the king's principal intent in going over to the continent was to secure his German dominions from the king of Sweden, and Great Britain from the designs of the pretender, who, laying hold of the enmity which Charles of Sweden now entertained against his Britannic ma-

Jeſty, prevailed on the Swede to eſpouſe his intereſt, and even to form a regular deſign for effecting his advancement to the throne of Great Britain. It was, indeed, amazing that a prince already overwhelmed by ſo many and ſuch powerful enemies, ſhould think of adding to their number by practices of this kind; but whoſoever conſiders the genius and ſpirit of Charles XII. will eaſily conceive that it was natural enough for him to embrace any expedient, how dangerous ſoever, which ſeemed to promiſe the diſſolving the confederacy by which he was oppreſſed. In order to guard againſt the attempts of his enemies, king George very prudently reſolved to contract alliances with foreign potentates.

The death of Lewis XIV. had greatly altered the ſtate of affairs between Great Britain and France. The regent, duke of Orleans, by virtue of king Philip's renunciation, and the death of all the princes in France ſprung from Lewis XIV. was become next heir to the minor king, and conſequently it was his intereſt to cultivate the friendſhip of ſuch ſtates as were likely to ſupport his title againſt the king of Spain, and particularly of England. King George was well aware of this, and reſolved to make his own advantage of it. He durſt not, as king of Great Britain, declare war againſt the Swedes, though he had done it as elector of Hanover; nor could he be reconciled with him, unleſs he reſtored the two duchies of Bremen and Verden; the only way therefore was, to compel that warlike prince to make peace. In this ſituation it was abſolutely neceſſary for king George to make alliances with ſuch powers as could moſt annoy him, in caſe they became his enemies. Accordingly, he began by ſounding the duke of Orleans, whom he found as ready as he could wiſh to enter into a league with him. The States-general, who only aimed at peace and ſecurity, as readily came into meaſures, from which they had much to expect, and little or nothing to fear. General Cadogan for England, the abbé du Blois for France, and the penſionary Heinfius for the States-general, negotiated this affair with ſo much ſecrecy, that the treaty was finiſhed almoſt before it was known to be in hand*.

By this treaty, which was known by the name of the Triple Alliance, the regent of France engaged that the pretender ſhould immediately depart from Avignon, where he then reſided, to the other ſide of the Alps, and never be ſuffered to return to Lorraine or France on any pretence whatſoever; that no rebellious ſubjects of Great Britain ſhould be allowed to reſide in that kingdom; and that the treaty of Utrecht, with reſpect to the demolition of Dunkirk, ſhould be fully executed to the ſatisfaction of his Britannic majeſty. The treaty alſo contained a mutual guaranty of all the places poſſeſſed by the contracting powers; of the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the throne of England, as well as of that of the duke of Orleans to the crown of France; and a deſenſive alliance, ſtipulating the proportion of ſhips and forces to be furniſhed to that power, which ſhould be diſturbed at home, or invaded from abroad.

No ſooner this treaty came to be known than it excited great diſcontents, both in France and England. The people of the former nation exclaimed, that the regent had ſacrificed the honour and intereſt of France to his own ambitious views. In England, the party in oppoſition to the miniſtry found fault with this alliance, not without the appearance of reaſon on their ſide. They alleged, that the ſucceſſion was ſufficiently ſecured by the treaty of Utrecht; nor was there any occaſion for engaging foreign troops, which, on pretence of an invaſion, might be introduced at any time, to force upon the people the meaſures of a miniſtry, however deſtructive to the honour or real intereſt of the nation. The king of England and the regent little regarded theſe clamours, having each ſecured the point he had chiefly at heart.

As to the king of Spain, he was with good reaſon highly offended at this alliance, which he complained of in the bittereſt terms, and from this time took all meaſures to diſconcert this confederacy.

King George did not prove ſo ſucceſſful in his negotiations with Sweden as he had been in thoſe with France. Charles XII. would not hearken to any propoſals until Bremen and Verden ſhould be reſtored. His Britannic majeſty was equally determined not to part with thoſe which he conſidered as a fair purchaſe: in fine, the rupture between the courts of Hanover and Sweden became every day more implacable, and proved extremely prejudicial to the commerce of England, and had well nigh entailed upon the kingdom another invaſion, much more formidable than that which ſo lately miſcarried; for the diſaffected in England, ſtill purſuing their deſigns in favour of the pretender, turned their eyes on the king of Sweden to accompliſh it. Charles reliſhed the enterprize, which at once flattered his ambition and revenge; nor was it diſagreeable to the czar of Muſcovy, who was alſo applied to, and who had taken diſguſt againſt the elector of Hanover for having offered to join the Swede againſt the Ruſſians, provided he would ratify the ceſſion of Bremen and Verden.

Count Gylleberg, the Swediſh reſident at London, was the perſon pitched upon to manage the conſpiracy in England, and baron Sparr at Paris, with the Engliſh Jacobites there, and other friends of the pretender; while baron Gortz, the prime miniſter and favourite of the king of Sweden, was diſpatched as envoy to the Hague, which he was to ſecure as the center of union to the ſeveral negotiations on this and the other ſide of the water. The ſcheme appears to have been very plauſible; a number of veſſels had been bought up, under different pretexts, which were appointed to rendezvous at the Swediſh port of Gottenburgh, about the latter end of the month of March, the ſeaſon when the eaſterly winds (which are fair for bringing over ſhips to England) generally prevail. On board theſe were to be embarked eight thouſand foot ſoldiers, and four thouſand horſe, all picked men; together with a formidable train of artillery, and provisions and arms for fifteen or twenty thouſand men. The confederates had made themſelves ſo ſure of being joined by the malcontents here on their firſt landing, that the plot was entruſted to a very few perſons only in England; neither was there any formal treaty drawn up between the parties engaged in this affair: the mutual intereſt they had in the success of their scheme was thought a tie more binding than the most solemn engagements. By the end of the year the project was ripe for execution, and was postponed only until the army should be reduced, and the Dutch auxiliaries sent back to their own country, which was expected to be done as soon as the parliament should meet.

These negotiations could not, however, be so privately managed but part of them transpired; and king George, who was then in Hanover, was informed of the intention of his enemies: upon which, he resolved to return immediately to England, where he arrived towards the end of January, 1717. His first act was, to order a detachment of foot-guards to secure count Gyllemborg, the Swedish minister, with all his papers. Baron Gortz, who had been in Holland, and was coming over to England to assist Gyllemborg in the conspiracy, hearing what had happened to his colleague, and finding their projects were discovered, returned to Holland; and upon the British minister's application to the States, Gortz, with his two secretaries, and all his papers, were seized at Arnheim in Guelderland, after flying from place to place to avoid the pursuit he knew was made after him. By his and Gyllemborg's papers, the whole plot was discovered.

In the mean time, the other foreign ministers at the court of London, alarmed at the seizure of the Swedish envoy, complained to the ministry of this outrage committed against the law of nations. The two secretaries, Methuen and Stanhope, wrote circular letters to them, importing, that in a day or two they should be made acquainted with the reasons of this extraordinary proceeding. They were, generally, satisfied with this intimation; but the marquis de Monteleone, the Spanish ambassador, replied, that he was extremely sorry no other way could be found to preserve the peace of the kingdom than that of arresting the person of a public minister, and seizing all his papers, which were the sacred repositories of his master's secrets; and that, in whatever light those two facts might seem to be understood, they very sensibly wounded the law of nations. This, however, was a mere cavil: the king of England had acted consistently with the strictest principles of justice in imprisoning his enemy. As Gyllemborg, the Swedish ambassador, had violated the law of nations, by conspiring against the prince to whom he was sent in a public character, the English had an undoubted right to dispense with the observance of the same law, by arresting his person: but all the world was surprized to see the Dutch imprison the baron de Gortz, in order to gratify the king of England, an instance of complaisance not to be paralleled in history, and by which they not only violated a most sacred law, by seizing the person of the prime minister of the king of Sweden, who had formed no plots against them, but they acted in direct contradiction to the spirit of that inestimable liberty which hath drawn so many strangers of other nations into their country, and is the foundation of all their greatness †.

tary Stanhope laid before them copies of letters between count Gyllemborg, the barons Gortz, Sparr, and others, relating to the design of raising a rebellion in his majesty's dominions, to be supported by a force from Sweden. The letters being read in both houses, occasioned addresses full of the most lively expressions of loyalty and zeal, and of resentment against the proceedings of the persons engaged therein. The commons passed a bill prohibiting all commerce with Sweden, a branch of trade which was of the utmost consequence to the English merchants. They voted ten thousand seamen for the ensuing year, granted about a million for the maintenance of guards, garrisons, and land-forces, and passed the bill relating to mutiny and desertion. The house likewise voted four and twenty thousand pounds for the payment of four battalions of Munster, and two of Saxe-Gotha, which the king had taken into his service to supply the place of such as might be, during the rebellion, drawn from the garrisons of the States-general to the assistance of England. This vote was not carried without a violent debate. The demand was inveighed against as an imposition, seeing no such troops had ever served. A motion was made for an address, desiring that the instructions of those who had concluded the treaties might be laid before the house; but this was over-ruled by the majority. The supplies were raised by a land-tax of three shillings in the pound, and a malt-tax. Orders were also issued for Sir George Byng to sail with a strong squadron to block up the Swedish ships in their harbours; the letters of Gortz and Gyllemborg were printed, in vindication of the conduct of the king of England towards the Swedish minister. Charles XII. was in Scania when he received these printed letters, together with the news of the two ministers being imprisoned, upon which he gave immediate orders for arresting the English intendant at Stockholm, with all his family and domestics. The Dutch resident was forbid the court, and strictly watched in all his motions. Charles, mean while, neither avowed nor disclaimed the proceedings of de Gortz: too proud to deny a scheme which he had once approved, and too wise to acknowledge a plot which had thus been stifled in its birth, he maintained a disdainful silence towards England and Holland. The czar took a very different course: as his name was not expressly mentioned, but only obscurely hinted at, in the papers of Gortz and Gyllemborg, he wrote a long letter to the king of England, complimenting him upon the discovery of the plot, and assuring him of the most inviolable friendship. King George read his protestations without believing them, tho' he thought it most prudent in the present case to pretend that he did *. A plot contrived by private men, says Mr. de Voltaire, is annihilated the moment it is discovered; but a conspiracy formed by kings, the more it is known the stronger it grows.

Before I proceed to the relation of the events of the year 1717, I must take notice that the Turks had, in the year 1715, made an irruption into Christendom, and possessed themselves of Peleponnesus, which the renowned Morosini had taken from them about the close of the seventeenth century, and which had been ceded to the Venetians by the peace of Carlowitz. The emperor, who guarantied that peace, found himself hereupon obliged to declare war against the Turks, and the supreme command of the Imperial troops was conferred on prince Eugene, who, about the autumn of the year 1716, obtained a complete victory over the infidels at Peterwaradin upon the Danube. The battle was fought on the fifth day of August, N. S. The Imperial army did not exceed sixty thousand men, that of the Turks amounted to an hundred and fifty thousand, commanded by the grand vizir Ali, favourite of the sultan Achmet III. who was mortally wounded in the engagement. The infidels were totally defeated, with the loss of all their tents, artillery, and baggage; so that the victors gained an immense booty †. To return to England.

Notwithstanding the commons had shewn themselves so liberal in their supplies, the court was still craving; and, on the third of April, Mr. secretary Stanhope brought a message from his majesty, demanding an extraordinary supply, that he might be the better enabled to secure his kingdoms against the danger with which they were threatened from Sweden: and Mr. Stanhope at the same time moved, that a supply should be granted to his majesty for that purpose. This message roused the house from that indolent acquiescence which they had hitherto fallen into, in regard to every proposition of the court. Several members stood forth to oppose this motion; but no one distinguished himself more on this occasion than Mr. Shippen, who said, it was a great misfortune that the king was as little acquainted with the parliamentary proceedings as the language of the country; that the message was unparliamentary and unprecedented, and in his opinion penned by some foreign minister. He had been often told, that his majesty had retrieved the honour and reputation of the nation; a truth which appeared in the flourishing condition of trade; that the supply demanded seemed to be inconsistent with the glorious advantages which his majesty had obtained for the people. He was seconded by Mr. Hungerford, who declared, that for his part he could not understand what occasion there was for new alliances; much less, that they should be purchased with money. He expressed his surprize, that a nation, so lately the terror of France and Spain, should now seem to fear so inconsiderable an enemy as the king of Sweden. The motion was supported by Mr. Boscawen, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, and others; but some of the Whigs spoke against it; and Mr. Robert Walpole was silent. The speaker and Mr. Smith, one of the tellers of the Exchequer, opposed this unparliamentary way of demanding the supply: the former proposed, that part of the army should be disbanded, and the money applied towards the making good such new engagements as were deemed necessary. After long and warm debates, it was, however, resolved, that two hundred and fifty thousand pounds be granted to his majesty for the purposes mentioned in his message*: but it was carried by a majority of only four voices.

This small majority was owing to a misunderstanding about this time among the courtiers. To whatever cause it was owing, it is certain there was some difference between the king's friends, which occasioned the removal of some, and the resignation of others. So long ago as in December, the lord Townshend, on the arrival of an express from Hanover, was removed from his place of principal secretary of state, to the great surprize of most people; and though after the king's return he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, yet immediately after the debate on the above-mentioned supply, the granting of which he had vehemently opposed in the house of lords, he received a letter from Mr. Stanhope, acquainting him, that his majesty returned him thanks for his past services, but had no farther occasion for him as lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. The very next day Mr. Robert Walpole waited on his majesty, and resigned his posts of first commissioner of the Treasury and chancellor of the Exchequer; as did Mr. Pulteney his of secretary at war, and Mr. Methuen that of secretary of state: their example was followed soon after by the duke of Devonshire, who quitted the presidentship of the council; and now the ministry underwent an almost total revolution. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Addison were appointed secretaries of state; Mr. Stanhope became first commissioner of the Treasury, and chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr. Craggs was declared secretary at war; the earl of Berkley was constituted first commissioner of the Admiralty, in the room of the earl of Orford, who resigned; the duke of Bolton obtained the government of Ireland; and was succeeded in the post of lord-chamberlain by the duke of Newcastle.

The parliament, at his majesty's desire, had adjourned from the sixteenth of April to the sixth of May; when being met, he, by the mouth of the lord-chancellor, made a speech to both houses, in which he gave them to understand, that the fleet under sir George Byng, which had sailed to the Baltic to observe the motion of the Swedes, was safely arrived in the Sound. He told them, that he had given orders for the reduction of ten thousand soldiers, as well as directions to prepare an act of indemnity. He desired they would take proper measures for reducing the public debts, with a just regard to parliamentary credit; and that they would go through the public business with all possible dispatch and unanimity.

Agreeable to his majesty's intimation in his speech, the parliament now set about reducing the interest on the public debts, in order for lessening the principal thereof gradually. These debts were comprehended under the two heads of redeemable and irredeemable incumbrances. The first had been contracted with a redeemable interest; and these the public had a right to discharge: the others consisted of long and short annuities, granted for a greater or less number of years, which could not be altered without the consent of the proprietors. Mr. Robert Walpole had projected a scheme for lessening the interest, and paying the capital of those debts, before he left the Exchequer. His plan was approved; but when he resigned his places, the ministers made some small alterations, which furnished him with a pretence for opposing the scheme. The government, however, in order to carry this good and great end into execution with success and security, treated with the Bank and South-sea companies, to whom a great part of the national debts were due, and brought them to agree not only for the reduction of the interest on their own respective capitals from six to five per cent. but for the Bank's advancing or lending to the public (when wanted) two millions five hundred thousand pounds, and the South-sea company the sum of two millions, at five per cent. interest, to be in readiness for paying off such of the proprietors of the orders of four lotteries in the reign of queen Anne, and of other redeemable annuities, as should demand their principal money to be paid to them, instead of accepting of five per cent. in lieu of their present interest of six per cent. This salutary scheme was at length effected, in consequence of three several acts passed this session of parliament, under the names of the General-Fund act, the Bank act, and the South-sea act.

By the first, entitled, "An act for redeeming the duties and revenues which were settled to pay off the principal and interest on the orders made forth on four lottery-acts, &c. commonly called the General Fund," the said two companies were empowered to borrow money on their common seal, or to make calls on their proprietors for enabling them to advance to the public the two sums above specified; the said reduction of interest to commence from and after Michaelmas 1727: for which interest a new annual fund was hereby established, and has ever since been called the General-fund, amounting to seven hundred twenty-four thousand eight hundred forty-nine pounds, six shillings, and ten pence. Hereby measures were so well concerted by the government, that all the proprietors of those redeemable debts acquiesced in the said reduction of their interest from six to five per cent. without borrowing any part of the said two millions five hundred thousand pounds of the Bank, or of the two millions South-sea company, stipulated as before-mentioned*.

By the second, entitled, "An act for redeeming the several funds of the Bank, pursuant to former provisions of redemption," &c. † the governors and company declared themselves willing to accept of five per cent. interest for all the debt due to that corporation, in lieu of their then allowances, and to advance the above-named two millions five hundred thousand pounds, if called for; and the Bank was hereby to deliver up two millions in Exchequer-bills, for which they were to have an annuity of one hundred thousand pounds, redeemable on one year's notice after Christmas 1717. This is called the Aggregate Fund, first established by an act of the first year of king George (cap. xii.) tho' not particularly applied to the lessening of the national debts till now. Hereby also the Bank was to have three per cent. per ann. and one penny per cent. per diem (instead of two pence formerly allowed) for circulating of the sum of two millions five hundred and sixty-one thousand and twenty-five pounds, being the remaining Exchequer-bills, till fully cancelled from Christmas 1717; so that the whole capital of the Bank was hereby increased to five millions three hundred seventy-five thousand and twenty-seven pounds, seventeen shillings, and ten-pence. But their original capital of one million six hundred thousand pounds was to continue at six per cent. interest, to the first of August 1742.

By the third, entitled, "An act for redeeming the yearly fund of the South-sea company," &c. ‡ the South-sea company's present capital being ten millions, and their present annual fund being six hundred thousand pounds, their fund was now reduced from six to five per cent. i. e. from six hundred thousand pounds to five hundred thousand, from and after Midsummer 1718, besides their yearly allowance of eight thousand pounds for charges of management. The company was also hereby empowered to borrow money on their common seal, either for the purposes of this act, or for carrying on their trade, or other necessary occasions, at such interest as they should think fit, and for any time not less than for six months; and altho' their fund may hereafter be redeemed, (viz. on one year's notice after Midsummer 1723) yet their trade and corporate capacity was hereby to continue for ever. This was, in the style of the Exchequer, called the South-sea fund.

By all which savings, viz. by one per cent. on the funds before-named, and by one penny per cent. per day saved for the future on the Exchequer bills hereafter to be circulated, a good beginning, or foundation, was laid for the famous sinking fund, amounting to three hundred twenty-three thousand four hundred and thirty-four pounds, seven shillings, and seven-pence half-penny, per ann. Moreover, for the greater conveniency of the proprietors of the before-named lottery orders, and debts at the Exchequer hereby ranged under this new general fund, they were brought from the Exchequer to the Bank, and erected into a transferable stock, at five per cent. interest. The said yearly saving or surplus was hereby to be solely applicable to the discharge of the principal and interest of such national debts as were contracted before Christmas 1716.

Thus out of the before-named three funds, called the Aggregate, the General, and the South-sea fund, was formed the Sinking Fund, being purely the surplus or savings out of those funds by the several reductions now and afterwards made in the rates of interest and allowances; and as these have at different times been lessened, and annual or other payments have been made to the creditors of the public act of the "Sinking Fund," it has proportionally increased. As a proof of the great advantage arising from this reduction of the interest on the national funds, and the establishment of a fund for farther lessening the public debts, I shall here observe, that, instead of lowering the prices of the several stocks at market, they were found to rise considerably in price; particularly South-sea stock, which, at Lady-day of this year 1717, was but one hundred three-fourths per cent. but got up to eleven hundred and twelve one-half by Michaelmas following.

The earl of Oxford, who had now remained near two years a prisoner in the Tower, finding the session likely to come to an end without taking his case into consideration, presented a petition to the house of Lords, praying, that his trial might be brought on. The lords assented to his request: Westminster-hall being prepared for the purpose, and the lord-chancellor Cowper constituted high-steward for the occasion, the earl, on the twenty-fourth of June, was brought from the Tower by water, and conducted to the bar; when Mr. Hampden, one of the managers for the commons, recapitulated the charge against his lordship in a long speech. Then Sir Joseph Jekyll (lately made master of the rolls in the room of Sir John Trevor, deceased) stood up to make good the first article of the charge; but as he was proceeding, the lord Harcourt signified to their lordships, that he had a motion to make, and they accordingly adjourned to their own house. There he represented, that a great deal of time would be unnecessarily consumed in going through all the articles of the impeachment; that if the commons could make good the two articles for high treason, the earl of Oxford would forfeit both life and estate, and there would be an end of the matter; whereas, to proceed in the method proposed by the commons, would draw out the trial to a prodigious length: and, that it would be a great hardship upon a peer, who had already undergone so long a confinement, to appear every day at their bar, like a traitor, and be, at last, found guilty only of high crimes and misdemeanors. He therefore moved, that the commons might not be permitted to proceed in order to make good the articles against the earl of Oxford for high crimes and misdemeanors, till judgment should be first given upon the articles for high treason.

After a long debate this motion was carried in the affirmative: there arose upon this a difference between the two houses, the commons being resolved to proceed in their own way, and the lords as strenuously adhering to theirs. The lower house demanded a free conference, which was refused by the upper. The dispute grew more and more warm: the lords sent a message to the commons, importing, that they intended forthwith to proceed to the trial of the earl of Oxford. The commons answered this intimation, by adjourning themselves to the third day of July. Hereupon the lords repairing to Westminster-hall, took their places, ordered the earl to be brought to the bar, and caused proclamation to be made three times, for his accusers to appear and make good the impeachment against him. Having waited for a quarter of an hour, they adjourned to their own house, where, one or two excepted, they gave their votes for the discharge of the earl of Oxford; then returning to the hall, they ordered him immediately to be set at liberty. The commons were enraged at the escape of this nobleman, whom they had marked out for destruction; and as a last effort of their malice, they resolved that the king should be addressed to except him out of the act of grace which was intended to be brought into the house. This address his majesty was pleased to comply with, and also forbade the earl to appear at court.

On the fifteenth day of July the earl of Sunderland delivered, in the house of peers, the act of grace, which passed through both houses without any difficulty. From this indemnity were excepted, the earl of Oxford, Mr. Prior, Mr. Thomas Harley, Mr. Arthur Moore, Crisp, Nodes, Obryan, Redmayne the printer, and Thomson, the assassins in Newgate confined since the reign of king William, and the clan of Macgregor* in Scotland. By virtue of this act, the earl of Carnwath, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn, were immediately discharged; but the lord Duffus was continued in prison, with an allowance of three pounds per week. All the gentlemen who lay under sentence of death in Newgate were dismissed, as were those that were detained, on account of the rebellion, in the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and other prisons in the kingdom. The yearly value of the forfeited estates in England and Ireland amounted to forty-seven thousand six hundred and twenty-six pounds, eighteen shillings and five pence half-penny; the rents of those in Scotland were estimated at twenty-nine thousand six hundred and ninety-five pounds, six shillings, and eight pence, sterling.

The act of grace being prepared for the royal assent, the very day on which it was presented the king went to the house of peers in the afternoon; and having given his sanction to all the bills that were ready, he closed the session with a speech on the usual topics.

A famous controversy was begun and carried on about this time, occasioned by Dr. Hoadley, bishop of Bangor's sermon before the king, entitled, "The nature of the kingdom of Christ, shewing it not to be of this world." This sermon made a great noise, and innumerable pamphlets were wrote on both sides. The bishop was generally thought to have the better of his antagonists, who, not content with their opposition in a private capacity, thought to have silenced him by means of the convocation which was then sitting. The lower house appointed a committee to draw up a representation to the upper house, against the positions advanced in his sermon, and in a farther performance of his, entitled, "A preservative against the principles and practices of the non-jurors." The committee censured both; but, to put an end to these heats, the convocation was prorogued, and have scarce ever sat since.

During these transactions, his majesty had thought fit to appoint sir John Norris envoy-extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the czar of Muscovy; and, as if things began to be so disposed as to admit of a peace in the North, a resolution was taken to discharge count Gyllemborg, and that baron Gortz should be released from his confinement in Holland, which was accordingly performed; yet the storm did not entirely blow over,

* It seems the family or clan of Macgregors, alias Campbells, had been in rebellion in the time of king James I. and were reduced; but on king James's death they took up arms again, not so much on any state account, as to plunder the Lowlands, and injure the country; whereupon a remarkable act passed against them. By this act they were all, at the age of sixteen, to appear before the privy-council, and give surety for their good behaviour; and, in order to their extirpation, no minister, within the bounds of the Highlands, were to baptize any male child with the name of Gregor or Macgregor. The famous Rob Roy, head of the clans, being in the rebellion, occasioned perhaps the exception, by which the whole family of the Macgregors were excluded the benefit of the act of grace.

In the spring of this year the czar made an excursion to the court of Versailles, where he proposed to the duke of Orleans to conclude a treaty, which, had it taken place, would have completed the greatness of Muscovy. His design was to compromise matters with the king of Sweden, who would yield to him some large provinces, to deprive the Danes of the empire of the Baltic Sea, to weaken the English by a civil war, and make all the trade of the North center in Russia. With this view, he proposed to the regent of France to act as mediator between Sweden and Muscovy, and to make a league offensive and defensive with these two crowns and that of Spain. This proposal, however, was rejected by the duke of Orleans, and communicated by him to king George. The czar, after leaving France, had an interview with baron Gortz at Amsterdam. This statesman, now at liberty, behaved like an implacable enemy, prompted not only by the powerful motives by which he had been formerly actuated, but instigated by a spirit of revenge, on account of his late imprisonment. He assured the czar, that in less than three months he would, in conjunction with a single plenipotentiary from Russia, remove every obstacle that retarded the conclusion of a peace with Sweden. Peter, over whom Gortz had acquired an absolute ascendancy, agreed to suspend all operations against Sweden until that term should be expired. A congress was opened at Abo, but the conferences were afterwards transferred to Aland. The articles were soon adjusted, and an alliance formed that was wholly to change the face of affairs in Europe: the substance of which, as it was found among de Gortz's papers after his death, was as follows: the czar was to keep the whole of Livonia, and part of Ingria and Carelia, to himself, and to restore the rest to Sweden. He was to join his efforts to those of Charles XII. in order to restore Stanislaus to the throne of Poland, and to enter that country with eighty thousand Russians, to dethrone the very king in whose defence he had waged a war of ten years continuance. He was to furnish the king of Sweden with a number of ships, sufficient to transport ten thousand Swedes to England, and thirty thousand to Germany. The united forces of Peter and Charles were to attack the king of England in his German dominions, especially in Bremen and Verden, and were likewise to be employed in re-establishing the duke of Holstein, and compelling the king of Prussia to agree to a treaty, by which he would be deprived of those territories which he had seized.

Baron Gortz set out from Aland for Fredericstadt in Norway, which Charles was then besieging, with the plan; but before he arrived, Charles was killed by a cannon-ball from the town, while he was visiting the trenches. Gortz was immediately arrested and brought to the scaffold by the nobles of Sweden, whose hatred he had incurred. The death of Charles produced an entire change in the face of affairs: Sweden was obliged to submit, while the czar, the king of Denmark, and king George, as elector of Hanover, remained in possession of what they had acquired. Although these affairs did not fall out till towards the end of the following year, I have thrown them together in this place, in order to prevent any farther recourse to them †.

Soon after the close of the session of parliament in England, his majesty received advice by count Volkra, the imperial minister, that prince Eugene had gained a decisive victory over the Turks at Belgrade, which was followed by the surrender of that town, the key of the Ottoman empire. King George had not yet received the investiture of the duchies of Bremen and Verden; and until that could be procured, it was necessary to espouse with warmth the interests of the emperor. This begot a misunderstanding between our court and that of Spain. Philip V. taking advantage of the emperor's being engaged in a war with the Turks, had, at the instance of the cardinal Alberoni, his prime minister, equipped a strong armament in the course of this year, the command of which was bestowed upon the marquis de Leda, who, in pursuance of the order of his court, set sail from Barcelona, and, landing at Cagliari, the capital of the island of Sardinia, which belonged to his Imperial majesty, had reduced the whole island to subjection. This proceeding Philip pretended to justify by a manifesto, in which he alledged, that the archduke (for he had not yet acknowledged Charles VI. as emperor) had, contrary to the faith of treaties, encouraged and supported the rebellion of his subjects in Catalonia, by frequent succours from Naples and other places, and particularly that he had caused the grand inquisitor of Spain to be seized, though furnished with a passport from his Holiness. However, his Catholic majesty promised, by the marquis Beretti Lardi, his ambassador at the Hague, to proceed no farther, and to suspend all operations, that the powers of Europe might have time and opportunity to contrive expedients for adjusting all differences, and securing the peace and balance of power in Italy: and he even agreed to refer the decision of this important affair to the king of Great Britain and the States-general. These powers undertook the office. Conferences were begun between the ministers of the emperor, France, and Holland; and these produced, in the course of the following year, the famous quadruple alliance, which was intended to settle the affairs of Europe on a better foundation than the treaty of Utrecht had left them, and to fix the general tranquillity for ever: yet, by unforeseen accidents, to which human policy will ever be liable, this alliance proved the cause of an immediate war between us and Spain, and in its consequences has been productive of innumerable troubles.

By this treaty, the terms of which were already fixed, though not executed till some months afterwards, it was stipulated, "That the king of Spain should restore to the emperor, within two months after the ratification of the articles, the kingdom of Sardinia, and renounce all right and claim to the dominions of the emperor in Italy and the Netherlands; consent to the emperor's being put in possession of Sicily, and renounce the right of reversion of that kingdom to the crown of Spain, as settled by the treaty of Utrecht; on condition, however, of having Sardinia in exchange: that the emperor should renounce, for himself, his heirs and successors, all right and pretension to any dominions, of which the king of Spain was acknowledged rightful possessor, by the treaty of Utrecht: that he should own Philip as lawful king of Spain and the Indies, and give him the titles and prerogatives belonging to that dignity: that the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, should be accounted as male fiefs of the empire, and should descend, in default of male heirs, to the queen of Spain's eldest son; but that none of these duchies should ever be possessed by a prince, who was at the same time king of Spain, nor should the king of Spain ever take upon him the guardianship of that prince: that the king of Sicily should restore that kingdom to the emperor, within two months after the ratification of the articles: that, in return, the emperor should give to the king of Sicily, the island of Sardinia, which he should enjoy, with the title of king, but the right of reversion, in default of heirs male, should be reserved to the crown of Spain: that the kings of Spain and Sicily should be allowed three months to consider, whether they would accept to reject the terms proposed; and if, contrary to the wishes of all Europe, they should continue refractory, the mediators should join their forces, and compel them to submit: that, if any of the mediators should be attacked, on account of the succours lent to the emperor, the others should declare war against the aggressor, and not lay down their arms till the emperor was put in possession of Sicily, and established in the firm enjoyment of his Italian dominions: that, if either of the kings should accept the terms proposed by the allies, he should join his forces with those of the mediators, in order to oblige the other to comply: and, finally, to show that nothing but justice and peace was intended, it was expressly stipulated, that as soon as the emperor was put in possession of Sicily, he should renounce all pretensions to Spain and the Indies, whether king Philip acceded or not, inasmuch as the guaranty of the mediators would be to his Imperial majesty, a security, equal to the renunciations of the Spanish monarch, for Sicily, the Italian dominions, and the Netherlands*.

The crown of Spain was highly displeased with this provision made for its interest; and though the emperor seemed to be very well contented at this juncture, yet, as soon as Spain was compelled to accept what was now offered her, he also grew dissatisfied with this partition, and we have never since been able to keep them both in temper, or preserve ourselves from being involved in their quarrels, as the reader, in the course of this work, will be sufficiently informed. Philip still continuing to make great preparations by sea and land, king George and the regent of France interposed their admonitions, but to no purpose. At length his Britannic majesty resolved to have recourse to more substantial arguments, and ordered a strong squadron of ships of war to be fitted out with all expedition.

In this critical situation things were when the parliament met, on the twenty-first of November; but before I relate their transactions, I must take notice, that on the second of November her royal highness the princess of Wales was brought to bed of a prince, who, on the twenty-eighth, was christened by the name of George William, the ceremony of whose baptism occasioned an unhappy difference between the king and the prince of Wales. It seems his royal highness had intended the bishop of Osnabrug, his uncle, should have stood god-father; but his majesty, in compliance with the custom which prescribed that one of the principal lords of the court, commonly the lord-chamberlain for the time being, should stand as second god-father, had ordered the duke of Newcastle to stand: the prince imagining the duke had officiously forced himself into this honour, expressed himself in very warm terms of resentment to his grace, after the ceremony was over. The king being acquainted with this, and taking the prince's resentment as expressed against himself, sent him orders to leave St. James's; which he did, and went and resided at Leicester-house, whither he was accompanied by the princess his consort, though it was signified to her, that she might stay at St. James's as long as she judged convenient. The young princess and the young prince (who died in February following) remained at St. James's with his majesty, orders having been given that her royal highness might have full liberty to visit them whenever she thought proper. After this, whenever the king went abroad, he committed the administration of the government to lords-justices. This difference farther divided the friends of the royal family; for as all in the king's service were forbid to visit the prince's court at Leicester-house, most of his royal highness's servants forbore going to St. James's.

The king, in his speech to both houses, acquainted them, that he had reduced the army to very near one half, since the beginning of last session; he expressed his desire, that all those who were friends to the present happy establishment, might unanimously concur in some proper method for the greater strengthening the protestant interest, of which as the church of England was unquestionably the main support and bulwark, so would she reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing from the union and mutual charity of all protestants. Addresses of thanks having been presented by both houses, the commons proceeded to take into consideration the estimates and accounts, in order to settle the establishment of the army, navy, and ordnance; ten thousand men were voted for the sea-service, and the sum of two hundred and twenty-four thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven pounds was granted for defraying the expences of the navy.

On the fourth of December, the supply for the army fell under deliberation in the house of commons, when a very warm debate ensued upon the number of troops that ought to be maintained. Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Walpole, were for restricting them to twelve thousand men only; the courtiers affirmed, that sixteen thousand were absolutely necessary. In the course of the debate, Mr. Shippen having made use of some expressions highly reflecting upon the king's person and government, he was voted to the Tower by a great majority. At length the number of land-forces was fixed at sixteen thousand three hundred and forty-seven effective men; and

About this period there appearing to be a considerable scarcity of silver coin in England, by reason our gold coin was rated too high in price; and the great sir Isaac Newton being thereupon consulted by the lords commissioners of the treasury, he advised the reduction of the value of guineas from twenty-one shillings and six pence, to twenty-one shillings; which was accordingly done by approbation of the house of commons, who addressed the king for that purpose; at which rate they have continued ever since: whereby, in some measure, the silver coin, which before had been exported in exchange for gold, was kept at home.

In the beginning of the year 1718, a design against the king's life was discovered; the author of which seemed fitter for Bedlam than Newgate. His name was James Shepherd, a young man under twenty, who, by frequenting Jacobite seminaries, and reading their books, had worked himself up to such a pitch of enthusiasm, that he wished ardently for an opportunity to assassinate the king, and actually wrote a letter to one Mr. Leake, a nonjuring clergyman, proposing a scheme for effecting his horrid design, which he called "smiting the usurper in his palace." Leake, terrified at such a letter being left for him at his lodgings, went and communicated the contents of it to sir John Fryer, an alderman of London, who advised him to secure the writer when he should call for an answer: this was accordingly done, and being carried before the alderman, was by him committed to Newgate. The young traitor was so far from repenting of his execrable design, that upon his trial he openly avowed it, declaring that he thought it would have been a meritorious deed. He was accordingly convicted upon his own confession, and executed at Tyburn on the seventeenth of March.

The same day the marquis de Paleotti, an Italian, and brother to the duchess of Shrewsbury, suffered the like fate, having been convicted and condemned for the murder of his own servant, in a transport of passion. Great intercession was made for him by his sister the duchess, and some foreign ministers; but his character was so detestable, that all the favour he could obtain, was to be executed by himself.

The principal affair which engaged the attention of the parliament this session, and which produced much heat and altercation among the ministers, was the bill for regulating the land-forces, and punishing mutiny and desertion, which was considered as an encroachment on the liberties of the people and the constitution of the kingdom, inasmuch as it established martial law, and wrested from the civil magistrate the cognizance of crimes and misdemeanors committed by the officers and soldiers of the army. One of the principal arguments made use of by the promoters of the bill (among whom general Stanhope, lately created viscount Mahon and baron Elvaſton, particularly distinguished himself) was, that by the power of trying such offenders being confined to the civil courts, the affair was frequently subject to so many delays, that before the trial could be brought on, the friends and relations of the delinquents had opportunity to exert their interest and procure their pardon; by which justice was eluded, and great encouragement given to mutiny and disobedience. The utility of this argument was clearly exposed, and the danger that might arise from such a power vested in the crown, amply set forth, by the gentlemen in the opposition. But what could an handful of persons do against the much greater number of those who were ready, for the sake of preserving their places, or their pensions, to sacrifice the liberties and interests of their fellow-subjects to the will of a minister? After a violent debate, the bill was carried by a great majority in both houses, though several lords entered their protests.

This affair being discussed, a bill was brought in, for vesting in trustees the forfeited estates in Great Britain and Ireland, to be sold for the use of the public; for giving relief to lawful creditors, by determining their claims; and for the more effectually bringing into the respective Exchequers, the rents and profits of the said estates, till sold. The time of claiming was prolonged; the sum of twenty thousand pounds was reserved out of the estates of Scotland, for erecting schools; and eight thousand pounds for building barracks in that part of the kingdom*.

The sums granted by the house of commons for the ordinary of the navy being found insufficient to answer the designs that had been formed by the administration, the king was prevailed on to send a message to the commons, on the seventeenth of March, in the following terms:

"Geo. Rex.

"His majesty being at present engaged in several negociations, of the utmost concern to the welfare of these kingdoms, and the tranquility of Europe, and having lately received information from abroad, which makes him judge that it will give weight to his endeavours, if a naval force should be employed where it was necessary; does think fit to acquaint this house therewith; not doubting but that, in case he should be obliged, at this critical juncture, to exceed the number of men granted this year for the sea-service, the house will at their next meeting, provide for such exceedings†".

This message was brought to the house by Mr. Boscawen; and an address, promising to make good such exceedings, if they were found necessary, was moved for, by Mr. William Strickland, and agreed to without a division; which was highly agreeable to the court. The next day the king thought fit to make some alterations at the navy-board, and also to appoint the earl of Berkeley vice-admiral, and Matthew Aylmer, esq. rear-admiral of Great Britain: the latter was soon after raised to the dignity of a baron of the kingdom of Ireland.

On the twenty-first of March the king went to the house of peers; and having passed the bills that were ready for the royal assent, ordered the parliament to be prorogued. Soon after, viz. on the eighth of April, earl Cowper, lord-chancellor, resigned the great seal, which, after having been a short time in commission, was given to Thomas, lord Parker, lord chief justice of the king's Bench, afterwards created earl of Macclesfield; who was succeeded as lord chief-justice by sir John Pratt. About the same time, Mr. Lechmere was made attorney-general, in the room of sir Edward Northey; the earl of Sunderland president of the council, and first commissioner of the treasury; John Aislabie, esq. chancellor of the Exchequer; lord Stanhope and James Craggs, junior, esq. were appointed secretaries of state; the latter in the room of Joseph Addison, esq. to whose thoughtful and speculative genius that office was not very agreeable. Lord Stanhope and lord Cadogan were soon afterwards made earls, by their respective names.

While these steps were taking, a great number of large ships were put into commission, and such other measures pursued as rendered it evident, that the fleet now fitting out would not prove a fleet of parade. The king of Spain, on his part, equipped a very considerable armament, which in the beginning of June set sail; but the destination of it was not known. In the mean time, the marquis de Monteleone, ambassador from Spain, presented a memorial to the British ministry, importing, that his master could not, without some degree of suspicion, behold such preparations, which seemed to indicate an hostile design; and would prove, if continued, destructive to the good intelligence that subsisted between the two crowns. The reason the ministry assigned for acting with so much vigour was, their resolution to maintain the neutrality of Italy, which they thought his Catholic majesty had lately infringed, by seizing on the island of Sardinia. Mean while, the negotiations between the English and French produced the quadruple alliance, of which we have already spoken, and by which the king of England and the regent of France prescribed a peace between the emperor, the king of Spain, and the king of Sicily; but his Catholic majesty, foreseeing that Sicily was to be delivered up to the emperor, had resolved, by the advice of cardinal Alberoni, his prime minister, a man of infinite abilities and discernment, to seize that island for himself: thither it was the Spanish fleet was really bound.

About the middle of the month of March sir George Byng was appointed admiral and commander in chief of the squadron intended for the Mediterranean; and on the twenty-fourth of May following he received his instructions, which were to this purpose: "That he should, upon his arrival in the Mediterranean, make instances with both parties to cease from using any further acts of hostility; but in case the Spaniards do still insist, with their ships of war and forces, to attack the kingdom of Naples, or other the territories of the emperor in Italy, or to land in any part of Italy, which can only be with a design to invade the emperor's dominions, against whom they have declared war by invading Sardinia; or if they should endeavour to make themselves masters of the kingdom of Sicily, which must be with a design to invade the kingdom of Naples; in such a case, you are, with all your power, to hinder and obstruct the same. If it should so happen that, at your arrival with the fleet under your command in the Mediterranean, the Spaniards should already have landed any troops in Italy, in order to invade the emperor's territories, you shall endeavour amicably to dissuade them from persevering in such an attempt, and offer them your assistance to help them to withdraw their troops, and put an end to all farther acts of hostility: but in case your friendly endeavours shall prove ineffectual, you shall, by keeping company with, or intercepting their ships or convoy; or, if it be necessary, by openly opposing them, defend the emperor's territories from any farther attempt."

The admiral sailed the fifteenth of June, 1718, from Spithead, with twenty ships of the line of battle, two fire-ships, two bomb-vessels, and a store-ship. He arrived at Cape St. Vincent on the thirtieth day of that month, when he dispatched his secretary, Mr. Allix, to Cadiz with a letter to colonel Stanhope (the late earl of Harrington) the king's envoy at Madrid, wherein he desired that minister to acquaint the king of Spain with his arrival in these parts in his way to the Mediterranean, and to lay before him the instructions he was to act under with his squadron, of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter.

The envoy shewed the letter to cardinal Alberoni, who, upon reading it, told the colonel with some warmth, that his master would run all hazards, and even suffer himself to be drove out of Spain, rather than recal his troops, or consent to any suspension of arms; adding, that the Spaniards were not to be frightened; and he was so well convinced of their fleet's doing their duty, that if the admiral should think fit to attack them, he should be in no pain for the success. Mr. Stanhope then shewed his eminence a list of the British squadron, desiring him to peruse it, and to compare its strength with that of their own. The cardinal, after running over the paper, threw it on the ground in a great passion; which Mr. Stanhope perceiving, used all his endeavours to pacify him. At length he promised to lay the admiral's letter before the Catholic king, and to let the envoy know his majesty's resolution. It was, however, nine days before Mr. Stanhope could obtain this answer and send it away, the cardinal probably hoping that the admiral would delay taking vigorous measures in expectation of it, and perhaps put into some of the ports of Spain, and thereby gain time for the fleet and forces to secure a good footing in Sicily. At length, however, the admiral's own letter to Mr. Stanhope was sent back, with a note under it, as follows:

"Sir, His Catholic majesty has done me the honour to tell me, that the chevalier Byng may execute the order he has from the king his master.
Escorial, July 15, 1718.

The Cardinal ALBERONI."

Mr. Stanhope seeing things tending to a rupture, gave private and early notice of his apprehensions to the English merchants settled in the Spanish sea-ports.

The admiral pursuing his voyage with unfavourable winds, was joined off Gibraltar by vice-admiral Cornwall with two ships of the line. On the twenty-third of July he anchored with the squadron off Port Mahon. Here he received advice that the Spanish fleet had been seen the thirtieth of June off Naples, steering south-east; upon which he dispatched away expresses to the governor of Milan and viceroy of Naples, to inform them of his arrival in the Mediterranean; and having relieved the garrison of Minorca, he sailed from thence thence on the twenty-fifth of July, and arrived on the first of August in the bay of Naples, to the great satisfaction of the German government, who, by the lucky arrival of the admiral, were relieved from the terror they had been under of a Spanish invasion. Sir George Byng, on his arrival at Naples, was informed by the viceroy, count Dauh, that the Spanish army, amounting to thirty thousand men, commanded by the marquis de Leda, had landed in Sicily, reduced Palermo and Messina, and were then employed in the siege of the citadel belonging to this last city. The viceroy at the same time acquainted the admiral, that he had resolved to embark two thousand German foot, under the command of general Wetzels, who were to take possession of the citadel of Messina and fort Salvador, in pursuance of an agreement with the duke of Savoy, who, finding that at all events he was to lose the island, contrived to lose it so as he might get something for it. The German forces were to be escorted by the British fleet, which sailed for that purpose from Naples on the sixth of August, and arrived on the ninth in view of the Faro of Messina*; in doubling which he discovered two Spanish scouts, and also learned from some of the country vessels, that the Spanish fleet was lying to, in order of battle; upon which the admiral immediately detached general Wetzels with the German troops to Reggio, under convoy of two ships of war; then he stood through the Faro after the Spanish scouts that led him to their main fleet, which before noon he discovered in line of battle, amounting to twenty-seven sail, large and small, besides two fire-ships, four bomb-vessels, and seven galleys; they were commanded in chief by Don Antonio de Castaneta, under whom were the four rear-admirals Chacon, Mari, Guevara, and Cammock.

On the sight of the English squadron they stood away large, but still in order of battle. The English admiral followed them all the rest of the day and the succeeding night. In the morning, being the eleventh of August, N. S. rear-admiral Mari, with six Spanish ships of war, and all the galleys, fire-ships, bomb-vessels, and store-ships, separated from the main fleet, and stood in for the Sicilian shore; upon which sir George Byng detached captain George Walton, in the Canterbury of sixty guns, with five more ships, in pursuit of them; and they were soon engaged. The admiral himself continued to chase their main fleet, and about ten o'clock the battle began. The Spaniards were totally defeated, and all their admirals taken, except Cammock, who made his escape to Malta, with three ships of war and as many frigates. Notwithstanding this victory, the Spanish army still prosecuted the siege of Messina with such vigour, that the governor surrendered the place by capitulation on the twenty-ninth day of September, and the garrison was transported to Syracuse and Reggio. A treaty was now concluded at Vienna between the emperor and the duke of Savoy; they agreed to form an army for the conquest of Sardinia, in behalf of the duke, who, in the mean time, engaged to evacuate Sicily; but, until his troops should be conveyed from that island, he engaged that they should co-operate against the king of Spain.

That monarch, excessively provoked at the unexpected blow, which had in a manner totally destroyed the naval force he had been at so much pains and expence to rear, was not slow in expressing his resentment. On the first of September rear-admiral Guevara, with some ships under his command, entered the port of Cadiz, and made himself master of all the English ships that were there; and at the same time all the effects of the English merchants were seized in Malaga, and other ports of Spain, which, as soon as it was known here, produced reprisals on our part†: but it is now time to leave the Mediterranean, in order to give an account of what passed at home§.

The parliament met on the eleventh of November; and one of the first things they went upon was the affair of Spain, which had indeed engrossed all public conversation from the time of defeating their fleet, some looking upon that as one of the noblest exploits performed since the Revolution; while others considered it as an action dishonourable to England, being inconsistent with the rules of good faith, for the observance of which she had always been so famous; and when an address of congratulation to his majesty was moved for by lord Carteret on the success of his arms over the Spanish fleet, and to justify that measure, it was warmly opposed by the dukes of Buckingham, Devonshire, and Argyll; the earls of Nottingham, Cowper, Oxford, and Illy; the lords North, Grey, and Harcourt, in the house of peers; and by Mr. Sheppard, Mr. Freeman, sir Thomas
